

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Otago Miners' Association—Public Works—Port Chalmers Wharf—Native Land Purchases—Counties Bill—Education Boards Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

OTAGO MINERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PYKE asked the Premier—(1.) If the Government will take into favourable consideration the recommendation of the Gold Fields Committee, as set forth in a "Report on the Otago Central Miners' Association Correspondence," and appoint a Commission to inquire (during the recess) into the question of the validity of water licenses granted under the Gold Fields Acts in force, and the relations between licenses so granted and the ordinary riparian rights of landowners and others? (2.) Also, if the Government will further authorize such Commission to inquire generally into existing gold fields legislation, with the view of having a complete and comprehensive measure prepared, dealing with the question aforesaid? He might explain, in asking this question, that he did so in consequence of the recommendation of the Select Committee, which was based upon the consideration of the correspondence which had passed between the late Premier and the Otago Central Miners' Association. The correspondence of the Association contained a recommendation that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the question of the validity of water licenses granted under the Gold Fields Act in force, and the relations between licenses so granted and the ordinary riparian rights of landowners and others, and also to inquire generally into existing gold fields legislation, with the view of having a complete and comprehensive measure prepared, dealing with the questions aforesaid. The Committee having considered this matter, recommended in their report that it should be done. He felt it to be his duty, as Chairman of that Committee, thoroughly agreeing with the report, to ask the Hon. the Premier the question standing in his name.

Major ATKINSON, in reply to the honorable gentleman, might say that the Government would take these recommendations into their favourable consideration, without committing themselves to saying that they approved of the whole of them. They had not yet had time to consider the matter; but they were really desirous to meet the views both of the Committee and the miners on this question. Whether they would consider it necessary to appoint a Commission during the recess was a point which they had not yet decided. They would, at any rate, take such steps as they thought necessary in order to insure a properly-considered Bill being introduced to the House during the next session of Parliament.

PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the Minister for Public Works, if he will inform the House when the Public Works Estimates are likely to be laid on the table? He said that honorable members generally would like to have the Public Works Estimates laid on the table at the earliest possible date.

Mr. RICHARDSON replied that the Public Works Estimates would be laid on the table on Monday next.

PORT CHALMERS WHARF.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the Minister for Public Works, whether provision will be made for carrying out the recommendation of the Engineer-in-Chief with regard to wharf extension at Port Chalmers (page 35, Public Works Statement)? With regard to this question, the Engineer-in-Chief had reported that "The increasing traffic at Port Chalmers renders necessary a further extension of the wharves, and I recommend an expenditure of £30,000 for this purpose." In the Public Works Statement, page 9, there were various works referred to and recommended to be undertaken, but there was no notice taken of the expenditure of the £30,000 for this wharf. A reference was made to the construction of a new wharf at Onehunga. Now, it was a matter of considerable importance that at Port Chalmers there should be sufficient acaccommodation for shipping. Last summer there was very great lack of accommodation, and a large number of vessels had to lie out in the stream. There were eighteen or twenty English vessels in the port in the month of January last, and they could not get alongside the wharf to discharge or load cargo. He therefore hoped the Minister for Public Works would be able to give a favourable answer to the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON said this matter was still under the consideration of the Government. A very important question arose in reference to this matter. The Otago Harbour Board were incurring a very large expenditure, with the view of enabling large vessels to come from Port Chalmers to Dunedin. It was, therefore, a matter of very serious consideration to the Government whether they would be justified in incurring a large additional expenditure at the present time to improve the wharf accommodation at Port Chalmers, in the face of the enormous expenditure which the Otago Harbour Board were going to with the view of affording accommodation to shipping at Dunedin. On Monday next, when the Public Works Estimates were brought down, he would make a statement to the House, when he would be able to inform the honorable member of the final decision come to by the Government on this matter.

NATIVE LAND PURCHASES.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they will lay the report of Mr. Wilson, Land Purchase Commissioner, before this House before the close of the session? He asked this question with the view of reminding the Government of the promise made some time ago to lay this report on the table.

Major ATKINSON said the papers to which the question referred were being copied, and he was informed that they would be laid on the table of the House during the evening sitting.

"(2.) Every person whose name appears on the voters' roll shall be entitled to vote at every election occurring in the riding of the county in which he is enrolled according to the following scale, that is to say,—

"(a.) If his rateable property, whether in one or more tenements, is valued on the valuation roll as hereinafter provided at less than fifty pounds, he shall have one vote.

"(b.) If such property is so valued at not less than fifty but less than one hundred pounds, he shall have two votes.

"(c.) If such property is so valued at not less than one hundred but less than one hundred and fifty pounds, he shall have three votes.

"(d.) If such property is so valued at not less than one hundred and fifty but less than three hundred and fifty pounds, he shall have four votes.

"(e.) If such property is valued at three hundred and fifty pounds and upwards, he shall have five votes."

Mr. W. WOOD proposed to strike out all the words after the word "enrolled," in subsection 2, down to the words "three votes," in subsection c.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 4th October, 1876.

First Reading—Third Reading—Agent-General—Personal Explanation—Debtors and Creditors Bill.

The ACTING-SPEAKER (the Hon. Major Richmond, C.B.) took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

THIRD READING.

The Wellington College Bill.

AGENT-GENERAL.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary,—(1.) From what date the Hon. Sir Julius Vogel will commence to draw salary as Agent-General? (2.) Whether or not the Government is to pay the cost of passage to England of Sir Julius Vogel and his family? (3.) Whether or not travelling allowances will be paid during the voyage; and, if so, at what rate per diem? (4.) Whether or not the Agent-General will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office? (5.) Whether or not he will be called upon to find security for the discharge of his duties? He asked these questions without wishing to offer any disrespect to Sir Julius Vogel, but with the view of eliciting information on the points on which it was usual to obtain information, and which he thought it would be satisfactory to the Council to obtain. As regarded the first three points, which he would class together, he might state what was his object in asking the question in that particular form. He believed that the Agent-General in the matter of travelling allowances ranked with Ministers, and that his travelling allowances were upon the same scale. He asked the question because he thought the system was open to some objection, and he wished, by eliciting information on the subject, to draw attention to the fact that under the existing system of travelling allowances, it would be found—and he did not speak without warrant—that a person in the position of Sir Julius Vogel would be entitled to draw his salary from the time of his appointment, and during his voyage to England. He would ordinarily, and he (Mr. Waterhouse) considered properly, have a certain allowance made for travelling expenses for himself and family to Europe. To either of these points he took no exception whatever; but, in accordance with the system at present in force, he would likewise be entitled to a travelling allowance of four guineas in addition to his full salary. He asked the questions with a view to directing attention to a practice which he thought required amendment. With regard to the fourth question, when Sir Julius Vogel was in the Government, he himself laid down the rule that the Agent-General should not be employed in any other way than in connection with the duties of his office; and, as honorable members would recollect, in consequence of that the Agent-General applied to withdraw from his position as Director of the National Bank. He thought this would be considered a proper question, particularly under the peculiar circumstances in which Sir Julius Vogel was going Home as Agent-General; and he thought it very desirable that the Council should be informed whether the same rule would be applied to this appointment as to the last one. The last question referred to the finding of security. He found that in the Parliamentary Papers laid before them, the Government, of whom Sir Julius Vogel was the head, in reference to the Crown Agents of the colony, stated,—

“That, without implying anything against the honor of the present occupants of the office, the Government are of opinion that they are not justified in continuing to place such responsibility in the hands of any two gentlemen who might hold the position, without having any guarantee from the Imperial Government or any substantial security.”

He believed the universal practice of the other colonies was that the Agent-General found security for the performance of the duties of his office. He could speak positively with regard to South Australia, whose Agent-General was required to find very substantial securities.

*The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that the answer of the Government to the first question was, that Sir Julius Vogel would commence to draw his salary from the date of his acceptance of the office. With respect to the second question, he might say that the Government was to pay the cost of his passage; and he might observe, in connection with that reply, that when the appointment was first offered to Sir Julius Vogel it was offered to him on the same terms and conditions as it had formerly been offered to Dr. Featherston. Upon looking into the whole question of allowances and expenses attendant upon that first appointment, it was found that they were very much in excess of what it appeared to the Government necessary to incur at present, and an arrangement of a much more reasonable and economical character had been made with respect to Sir Julius Vogel in the present instance. The answer to the next question was that no travelling allowances would be paid during the voyage. With respect to the fourth question, the Government would expect the Agent-General to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office. With respect to the fifth question, there appeared to the Government no reason why Sir Julius Vogel should be treated in a different way from what the former Agent-General was treated with regard to finding securities; it was not proposed to ask for any such security.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES asked the Colonial Secretary to explain more particularly his reply to his second question. That was with respect to the more economical mode in which Sir Julius Vogel's family were to be conveyed Home.

*The Hon. Dr. POLLEN referred to the total amount of cost. Dr. Featherston remained in the colony for two or three months after the appointment was made, and a certain amount was set apart for the passages of his family and himself. He was also allowed to draw travelling allowance during the whole time. All this would be altered in the present case, and the allowance now was a fixed sum. He could not mention the particular amount at present, but he could assure the Council that they would regard it as a reasonable amount, and as being less than in the case of the first appointment.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—Sir, before proceeding to the ordinary business, I wish to make a few observations of a somewhat personal character, though they may be generally interesting to the Council. With a view to putting myself in order, I shall move, That the House at its rising do adjourn till to-morrow at half-past two o'clock. My object in rising is to call attention to a misunderstanding that has most unfortunately arisen during the last few days, and which has served more or less to embitter the tone of our discussions in reference to the conduct of the business of this Council. In previous discussions upon the subject I have not been in a position to fortify myself with any authoritative statement of what took place on the 27th September, when the Hon. Mr. Hall undertook the charge of the Government business in this Council, during the absence of the Hon. Dr. Pollen. To-day, for the first time, a copy of Hansard containing an account of what took place on that occasion has been placed in my hands, and I am now in a position to discuss the matter with a full and accurate account of what took place. The cause of the misunderstanding that exists between the Hon. Mr. Hall, myself, and others is attributable to the fact that honorable members' memories do not serve them equally well as to the circumstances that occurred on the day on which the Hon. Mr. Hall took charge of the Government business. I will now state from Hansard exactly what took place, and honorable members will then be in a position to judge for themselves as to whether the view I have taken upon this subject is the correct one or not. This day week, the Hon. the Speaker communicated to us the fact that the Hon. Dr. Pollen was indisposed. Upon that occasion you, Sir, in a very proper manner rose in your place in the House, and, with a view to expedite the conduct of business at this advanced period of the session, suggested that the business on the Order Paper should be proceeded with, and you added that "the Council would, no doubt, feel grateful if the Hon. Mr. Hall would undertake to conduct the business on behalf of the Government." When that proposition was made, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore rose, and took exception, on constitutional grounds, to the business being proceeded with in the absence of a Ministerial representative, inasmuch as he stated that it would be hardly fair to hold the Government responsible for the action of any honorable gentleman whom we might ask to conduct the business of the Council. Upon that the Hon. Mr. Hall rose and stated that he had that day seen the Hon. Dr. Pollen, who had expressed his "very great regret at the unavoidable delay which had taken place in the business, and asked him (Mr. Hall) if he would undertake to conduct through the Council the formal business of the Government—that business not involving questions of policy, and upon which no serious discussion would arise. He agreed to do so, if it were the wish of the Council. Any question involving a grave matter of policy he would, of course, not ask the Council to proceed with. He hoped the Council would understand that he would only conduct the business for the Government if it was the wish of the Council." There are two points in these remarks to which I wish to draw special attention. The first is the honorable gentleman's own statement that he had been requested by the Hon. Dr. Pollen to undertake to conduct through the Council the formal business of the Government. It will be seen that there is here no assertion of the fact that in the course of the discussion there would be a certain amount of Ministerial responsibility arising from his conducting the business, such as we understood the honorable gentleman last night to state would be the case. On the contrary, the fair inference from these words, and, to my mind, the only inference to be drawn from these words, is that he would conduct only the formal business of the Government, reserving all matters involving questions of policy, or any matters upon which serious discussion would arise, and which would necessitate the presence of a Ministerial representative in our midst. The second point to which I wish to draw the attention of the Council is this: that the offer of the honorable member was "to undertake the conduct of business not involving serious questions of policy. He agreed to do so if it were the wish of the Council. Any question involving a grave matter of policy he would of course not ask the Council to proceed with." The honorable gentleman was followed by the Hon. Mr. Menzies; and here I may remark that the latter honorable gentleman does not appear on this occasion to have made use of some observations that were made on a former occasion, and which I referred to yesterday. The honorable gentleman simply suggested the propriety of proceeding with the business on the Order Paper, and stated that there was no one who would fall more naturally into the place of the Colonial Secretary than the Hon. Mr. Hall. I followed the Hon. Mr. Menzies, and stated that I would not oppose the proposal to proceed with the Orders of the day, provided it were understood that matters likely to involve the policy of the Government, or to lead to much difference of opinion amongst ourselves, should be postponed till a representative of the Government was present. Nothing more took place upon the subject, and, with the general concurrence of honorable members, the Hon. Mr. Hall proceeded to take his place upon the Government benches, and to conduct the business of the Government. Now, it is quite clear—and I do not think any honorable member will attempt to controvert the assertion—it is quite clear that upon this occasion there was a distinct understanding that no business involving questions of policy, or upon which serious discussion would arise, should engage the attention of the Council. That cannot for a moment be doubted. It was in the nature of a distinct understanding; and, when an honorable member makes such an offer to the Council, I regard it as I would regard an offer made in private life. That being the undoubted state of the case, I now proceed to the next step. On Thursday, we had disposed of various matters on the Order Paper, when, in the course of business, you, Sir, called upon the next Order of the day, which was the Public Works Bill. The Hon. Mr. Hall then got up in his place, and expressed his readiness to proceed with the Bill if the Council desired that he should do so. Evidently he regarded it as being of a somewhat different character from the other matters which had engaged the attention of the Council; and so far the honorable gentleman was undoubtedly correct. A discussion arose upon this question forthwith. I cannot exactly remember whether many honorable members spoke upon the subject, but I have a very distinct remembrance of the nature of the discussion itself, in which I, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, and some other honorable members took part. It was objected that the Bill ought not to be proceeded with in the absence of a Ministerial representative, as it involved the most important question of public policy before the Council at that time. It had not been considered elsewhere, and a great amount of discussion was likely to arise. These were the objections urged against proceeding with the Bill; and after they had been urged, the matter was put to the vote, when, by the casting vote of the Speaker, it was decided to continue the discussion. I do not wish to say a single word to aggravate any honorable member in this discussion; but I think honorable gentlemen will recognize that there was, in the first case, a distinct understanding that questions affecting the policy of the Government, and questions calculated to create considerable discussion, should not be brought forward, and that afterwards that agreement was broken. I shall say no more; but I think those two facts cannot fail to put me right, and those with whom I am acting, in the estimation of honorable members.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—Sir, if no other honorable members desire to address the Council, I shall make a few remarks upon the subject. I think, first of all, it would be well to refer to one's former understanding. After having looked over the report that appears in Hassard, I hold it entirely bears out the view which I expressed last night in Committee, and which is very nearly identical with that which the honorable member who lately represented the Government, Mr. Hall, has expressed on more than one occasion. The honorable gentleman placed himself in the hands of the Council; but questions which involved the policy of the Government, and clauses of Bills which involved the policy of the Government, he was willing to postpone. That is the course which, so far as I can see, the honorable member adopted during the extremely long discussions that have taken place upon the few clauses which were under consideration during the two last evening sittings of last week, and on Monday evening. I altogether dissent from the view that the action which has been taken in any way infringes the understanding, so far as I comprehend the term, into which the Hon. Mr. Hall entered on Wednesday afternoon: for it will be remembered that the evening sittings of Thursday, Friday, and Monday were nearly all occupied with the consideration of a very few clauses of the Public Works Bill. If my recollection serves me right, the Committee on Thursday afternoon began the consideration of the Bill at clause 89, and in the course of three evening sittings it arrived at clause 111. The honorable gentleman who has just sat down complained that large questions of policy, and clauses contained in a Bill of very great importance, were being treated in a manner contrary to the understanding which had previously been arrived at, to the effect that serious questions of policy which were contested should be postponed. If any honorable members will look at the alterations made, and remember the debates on the various clauses as they came forward in succession, they will see that the alterations are of very little importance, are mostly as to matters of detail, do not in any way involve questions of privilege, and did not deserve the very prolonged consideration given to them, and the manner in which it was given. The Council will very well remember that these questions were debated, not merely clause by clause, not merely paragraph by paragraph, or subsection by subsection, but almost line by line; and they will remember that the very few members who apparently combined to arrest the progress of the Bill in that way seemed to hail with delight any question that arose which was likely to lead to a general discussion on the most trivial points. The impression left upon the minds of members of the Council was, not that any great constitutional question was being fought out, but that some little matter of personal pique instigated certain members of the Council to arrest the progress of the Bill, till a certain amount of unpleasantness—I might almost say insult—was inflicted upon the honorable member who represented the Government. The action taken for several evenings was not an action which is very common in this Council; and I think that in the experience of any honorable member it will be found that, with hardly an exception, questions which have been brought up have been discussed on their merits. Sometimes honorable members may have party feelings in considering a particular question, but it is very rarely indeed that any except new members have any party feelings; and new members, soon after coming into the Council, cease to continue to hold them. The general rule will apply that all questions are considered upon their merits; but it was painfully evident that in the course of the discussion which occurred on the clauses to which I have referred on the nights I have mentioned, debate was not raised at all upon questions of principle or upon the merits of the Bill, but simply upon matters of personal pique. Honorable members who carried on the opposition to these clauses professed to represent the views of the Council; but upon different occasions, when they had an opportunity of testing that, they very carefully abstained, in a manner which was very stingingly referred to last night, from taking the decision of the Committee. The honorable member who sat down just now referred to this understanding as being binding on the Hon. Mr. Hall on the one part, and on the persons who accepted it on the other. But, Sir, who accepted that understanding? Surely my honorable friend Mr. Waterhouse does not profess to stand forward as representing the Council upon such an occasion. I apprehend, as I said last night in Committee, that each individual member might agree to an understanding to a greater or less extent, as he pleased; and the result of the understanding of the Council, and the nature of the agreement, could very easily be tested by a division: and any decision thus arrived at would at once ascertain whether the Hon. Mr. Hall was really carrying out the pledge which he had given individually to agree to the wishes of the Council and to be guided by them. The conclusion to which I think most of the members of the Council must have come upon this subject is that really it was not so much a profound belief that a departure had been made from the general understanding which had been come to; but some minor circumstances which might have created an undercurrent of feeling which had produced the action, the obstructive action—I may be pardoned for calling it obstructive—I say so because I believe it—which marked the conduct of honorable members. Sir, I will take the liberty of digressing from this question to one more special to myself. The Hon. Mr. Robinson the other evening charged me with having been similarly obstructive in respect to a different matter upon a former occasion; but he spoke in so good-humoured a tone that no one could take offence at his strictures. I think, if the honorable gentleman had been in the Council constantly and regularly during the debate on the New Zealand University Bill, he would have seen that the opposition was to certain clauses only; and after having debated the 2nd and 3rd clauses, and a new clause, a single division was taken on each, and I withdrew all further opposition. I think, Sir, that is a very different course from deliberately obstructing a Bill by opposing not only clause after clause, but section after section and line after line, and discussing a question for it might be an hour. Probably if the honorable member had been in his place, and not fitting about backwards and forwards from the Council Chamber to other places, he might have seen that the parallel did not hold. The truth is that the honorable member had been like a lovely, gay humming-bird, flitting about from flower to flower, sipping honey from each, and has been spasmodic and intermittent in his attendance in the Council Chamber, or he would have observed that the opposition which he censures was only with regard to certain principal points, and was not at all of a factious character. I do not mean to blame the honorable member for not being constantly in the Council. There might be other places in which he might find greater attraction, even as a humming-bird might find the honey sipped from one flower much more attractive than that sipped from another. If the honorable gentleman's attendance here had been more regular, he would have noticed, in respect to that matter to which he had referred, that there was nothing more than legitimate opposition to the Bill. I do not know whether I should say much more with regard to the action that has been taken, if it were not that the honorable gentleman who has just addressed the Council upon a former occasion applied an expression to my honorable friend Mr. Hall which I think he was not justified in using. I was not present at the time, but I find from the report that he charged the honorable member with a breach of faith, and complained of having been entrapped, which, I submit, he was not justified in doing. And I further say that, if he supposed such an accusation really would hold, he showed a very considerable amount of bad taste in referring to it in such a way; because it appears to me, Sir, if any member of this Council is bound to talk in moderate and forbearing language it is that honorable gentleman, when he considers that he most of all the members of this Council is indebted to the Council for the forbearance it has shown towards himself in reference to action of his that might have laid him open to very severe remarks and caustic criticism. The honorable gentleman, at all events, should not be too ready to take up reproach against another honorable member, even if he supposed he was open to criticism.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Sir, I had hoped we should not have had this discussion to-day. Last night I deprecated its renewal, and honorable gentlemen will give me at least credit for having been sincere when I said then that I hoped that would be an end of it. However, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse has his own reasons for bringing the matter forward, and I had intended to have allowed him to be answered by the Hon. Mr. Hall, if he had any answer; and if not, to have let the subject drop. The Hon. Mr. Hall did not take up the glove himself, but put forward another champion.

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—The honorable gentleman is mistaken. I intend to address the Council before the debate closes.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The Hon. Mr. Hall did not pick up the glove himself, but another champion came forward for him; and, we have been treated to a speech which, I am thankful to say, has very seldom been equalled in this Council for irritating—I will not use the word "offensive"—but irritating and unpleasant remarks about other honorable gentlemen, and a series of imputations of motives which the honorable gentleman, in my opinion, had not the smallest right to make. Last night the honorable gentleman made a speech of a somewhat similar character, and I took no notice whatever of his remarks. Several honorable gentlemen asked me why I allowed them to pass without any observations; and I said because I hoped, by showing moderation myself, that I might induce that honorable gentleman to desist from a course which has recently become very disagreeable, and which he appears to me to be continually adopting. For that reason, I took no notice of the remarks, however unpleasant to me, he made last night, and passed on and answered the Hon. Mr. Hall. To-day several honorable members showed him, I think, while he was speaking, that what he was saying was disagreeable to them. One or two proposed to interrupt him, but he has been allowed to say all he had to say. I only hope he may not be answered in the same tone as he has spoken. I wish to draw his attention to this circumstance: that perhaps he has no idea himself how offensive were some of the advice he gave and some of the remarks he made. For instance, he has been lecturing us upon our bad taste, upon our personal pique, and upon our obstructive action, upon being banded together, taking action not based upon principle, and so on. Now, in all he has said, if he only said it to annoy and affront, I should at another time not have allowed his remarks to pass in this Council without challenging them, and requesting the Speaker to interfere; because, if our discussions are to assume that character, two can play at that, and the honorable gentleman can be answered in the same way if it is desirable. But as I think it is not desirable, I hope the good sense of the Council will stop the honorable gentleman. I have had several occasions this session to complain of the way in which the honorable gentleman has spoken, sometimes personally towards myself, and sometimes towards other people. But the honorable gentleman says these things in an unimpassioned quiet tone that does not suggest at first that he speaks from any very strong feeling; and it is not until now, when it has got so bad, that I am obliged to complain. The honorable gentleman should remember that humour is not given to every one. Wit would not be valued if it were epidemic upon the population; and awkward stilted jokes from people with no sense of humour are exceedingly disagreeable. I dare say the Hon. Mr. Robinson knows how to give the honorable member an answer that may suit him, but he was making some little jokes about my honorable friend. I take some of those little jokes to affect myself. The Hon. Mr. Robinson has possibly offended the honorable gentleman by going out occasionally to smoke or do something else when one of those extraordinarily long, wearisome, and monotonous speeches about the University Bill were being made by the honorable gentleman. I have no doubt he did do so, and I have done so too; and in fact, whenever I hear the honorable gentleman on that and one or two kindred subjects in which I do not usually interest myself very much, I also go out and wait until he is done. There is no great harm in that. Everybody has not got so versatile a mind as to be able to give useful attention to every subject that can possibly be brought before Parliament; and sometimes we can consider what we are going to do about something else better in another room, where we are not disturbed by a speech upon a subject with which we are not acquainted; and I have very often gone away on that account. I am not aware that there was any combined action in this matter at all. There was certainly no opposition in the proper sense of the word "opposition." There was no doubt a great inclination to allow the Bill to be proceeded with. The honorable member says we ought to have been satisfied with one division. We were not satisfied with one division; we took a great many divisions, and once the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse declined to divide. There was only one division that I am aware of that he declined to take, and that particular division was not taken, not because the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse and those who were of the same opinion were afraid to divide, but for a totally different reason. It was because quite a different issue was raised—an issue which was raised by the last speaker, and thrown down on the floor of the House; and we were challenged to vote upon a subject which had no relation whatever to that which had engaged our attention before. What we were asked to vote upon was whether or not the Council approved of the Hon. Mr. Hall. That honorable gentleman made an appeal to us about his long services, and asked us whether we were or were not—

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—The honorable gentleman is not correct. I made no appeal about my long services. I beg he will be accurate when speaking of me. I did not make any appeal.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The honorable gentleman said—and I think the recollections of other honorable gentlemen will bear me out—that he had been twenty years in Parliament.

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Am I correct in saying that was not a long service?

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—I never made any appeal on account of my services. I was complaining that something had been done to me which I said had never been done to me during the twenty years I had sat in Parliament.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The honorable gentleman may not call that an appeal. I say the honorable gentleman discoursed for some time upon a matter perfectly personal to himself, and during that discourse he alluded to the circumstance—if he does not like the word "appeal"—that he had sat for twenty years in Parliament. He did not intend to ask honorable gentlemen to vote on the subject, but to vote whether or not they approved of him in the action he had recently taken. During the course of his remarks he had said he would first go on with the Municipal Corporations Bill, which was all the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had asked for. So the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, probably not wishing to express any opinion in relation to the Hon. Mr. Hall, and being quite satisfied to know that the Public Works Bill was not going to be proceeded with until the Municipal Corporations Bill was finished, rose in his place and said that, as he appeared to have gained his object, he would not trouble the Council to take a vote. Now the Hon. Mr. Menzies has upon several occasions taunted the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, myself, and others who have voted in the same way, with not daring to take up the challenge. That was what he calls not daring to take up the challenge! Upon what one clause, and upon what one amendment, did we not accept the challenge? Sometimes, to save time when we were in a minority, we did not challenge a division. As a rule, the divisions were challenged by the other side, and as a rule they were won by us, and the majorities on the other side were usually one or two. Every amendment nearly upon which we put any stress has been carried, and the clauses which we wished to amend have either been postponed or amended as we wished. Consequently, no person has any right to say that our arguments had no reason in them at all, and were purely advanced for the purpose of obstructing the business. Our desire was to be careful with this Bill, and very careful; because until last night we did not know that the Government would be responsible for the concessions that were made. If the Hon. Mr. Hall agreed with us in an amendment, it did not follow that the Government would support it in another place. Last night that was told to us, and the result was that we got through a few more clauses than usual. The Hon. Mr. Menzies said that the clauses over the discussion of which so much time was spent are very unimportant clauses. I say, on the contrary, that they are the most important clauses in the Bill. They are clauses which touch us, and as to which our experience would be most useful. Most of us being country residents, and having had considerable experience of Road Boards and road matters, having every year to put our hands pretty liberally into our pockets to promote the traffic of our neighbours, they were just the very clauses in which honorable gentlemen were most likely to take an interest. And I think the result of our discussions has been to show that we did understand the subject, and that we brought experience to bear, which the drawer of the Bill, however successful he has been in framing it in other respects, could not be expected to have. The Hon. Mr. Menzies said that he complained of the obstruction at the time. As I said before, I am not going to follow him in imputing motives or giving disagreeable reasons for his action. But I have this to say: that I do not think one amendment was brought forward or one subject raised for discussion upon which that honorable gentleman did not speak at least three times as long as any other member of the Council. He spoke on every subject without fail, and with a consistency which, I think, could hardly be exceeded; and I think he voted sometimes one way and sometimes the other. If there was nothing to speak about, upon what ground did the honorable gentleman open his mouth at all? If it were purely a factious opposition to the passing of that Bill and those clauses—if it were only done to waste time—why did the honorable gentleman allow himself to be seduced into following our example? Why did he speak at all if there was nothing to speak about? If our amendments were foolish, and only proposed for the purpose of wasting time, why did the honorable gentleman throw himself into the fray? The fact of the matter was that there was something to argue and something to consider; and I dare say that in one or two instances we were beholden to the honorable gentleman for the remarks he made during his addresses to the Council. What I demur to is not to his speaking—he has a right to speak as he pleases, and as long as he pleases—but he has not got a right afterwards to say that the subjects of discussion were puerile, unworthy of attention, only raised for an obstructive purpose, and to delay business, when he himself entered into those discussions upon every occasion. I hope we shall not, for the future, fall into the habit of bringing such accusations as the honorable gentleman has brought against several members, chiefly sitting on this side of the House, who were influenced only by a desire to try to amend and improve the Public Works Bill.

* The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I would like to say one word in reply to the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse's remark that the memory of honorable members did not seem to serve them equally well in regard to this matter. I was present during the whole time, and the impression upon my mind, from what the Hon. Mr. Hall stated, was that, whereas he was under the impression that an agreement had been entered into, that impression was not so generally entertained by the Council. I noticed that, when the Hon. Mr. Hall was explaining the kind of charge that he was prepared to take of Government business, and the limitation which he would put to his responsibility, he said, as I thought very cleverly qualifying his previous statement, that in all these matters he would place himself in the hands of the Council. I therefore understood clearly that no definite compact, agreement, or understanding had been entered into by the Council as such. That was the interpretation I put upon the explanatory language that passed between honorable members on that occasion. For my own part, I was so desirous that the public business should be proceeded with, that I was certainly no party to any agreement by which the business of the country should be checked for what appeared to me to be immaterial reasons. It appeared to me that on the Public Works Bills no serious discussion ought really to have arisen. There was no great or important principle at stake; and I could not understand a certain warmth of feeling which grew out of it, and which seems to have lived to this moment. I could not trace that warmth of feeling at all to the special gravity of the portions of the Bill which we were at the time considering. I have but one word more to say with reference to what was stated by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, when he alleged that the Hon. Mr. Hall had made an appeal to this Council when he alluded to his twenty years' service in Parliament. It is only fair to bear in mind that such reference was essentially collateral—essentially an unimportant section of the argument which the honorable gentleman submitted to the Council at the time. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had made an attack upon the honorable gentleman which appeared to me to be unusually severe, and very uncalled for, when, drawing a glowing picture of the virtues, amiability, business capacity, and modesty of demeanour of the Colonial Secretary, he contrasted his conduct of public business with that of the Hon. Mr. Hall, in a manner rather unfavourable to the latter. It is clear to me that the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse overrated the whole difficulty of the position. The Hon. Mr. Hall, in replying to the honorable gentleman, said,—

"Inasmuch as it has now been made a personal matter between the Colonial Secretary and me—inasmuch as it had been alleged practically, and in so many words, that I am not fit to conduct the business of the Council, I hope that honorable gentlemen, in order to relieve me from such a position, will allow this matter to go to a division, in order that I may know whether I am to receive the support of the Council or not."

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Hear.

* The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—My honorable friend says "Hear." I would draw his attention to this fact: that, for all practical business purposes, the Hon. Mr. Hall merely stated that he had been twenty years in this Legislature without any such attack having been made upon him.

How was it possible for the Hon. Mr. Hall to conduct the business of this Council without receiving reasonable support, under such circumstances? I only address myself to the subject for the sake of making it clear, and in justice to the Hon. Mr. Hall. My honorable and gallant friend said that the Hon. Mr. Menzies had taken exception to honorable members leaving the Council. I will draw his attention to this fact: that when the Municipal Corporations Bill came on at the desire of honorable members on the other side, I looked round, and I found that the honorable gentlemen who had advocated the consideration of the Bill had gone.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I was not away.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—The honorable gentleman amongst others was gone.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I was here the whole time.

* The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—After that emphatic statement, all I can say is that my eyes are at fault; I did not see the honorable gentleman. Be that as it may, I merely wish to point out that considerable pressure was brought to bear on the Council to induce it to discontinue the consideration of the Public Works Bill, and go into the consideration of the Municipal Corporations Bill. The Hon. Mr. Hall, in a considerate manner, acceded to that request; but those who ought to have been present to consider the Bill were not here. I then got up and moved that the first clause of the Bill might be read, so as to give time. I then drew attention to the fact that those honorable gentlemen who appeared to be interested in the Bill were not present to discuss it. I said I was not prepared to go on with that measure, and must decline all responsibility for a measure which I was not prepared to consider. I say, then, in a sort of justice to honorable members all round, that there has been a great deal of misconception with regard to the whole of this matter; and I do not think there has been sufficient cause for my honorable friends to make so much of it as they have done.

* The Hon. Mr. ACLAND.—I do not wish to prolong this discussion unnecessarily, but I would like to add a word with regard to what the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse has said in reference to what he considered the appeal made by the Hon. Mr. Hall to the Council. If I remember rightly, the honorable gentleman's statement was made in consequence of some severe remarks made regarding him by some honorable members. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse said he had been entrapped by the honorable member; and he (the Hon. Mr. Hall) said that he had been twenty years in Parliament, and that such a charge had never before been made against him. It was not an appeal made by him to the Council, but a charge had been made against him which had never been made before. I hope the Hon. Colonel Whitmore will excuse me for pointing out what seems to me to be an inconsistency in his speech. He began his speech by saying that there was no party opposition, and that no agreement had been made; and further on he says, "The divisions were won by us and by the arguments on our side."

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The members who take the same views usually sit on one side of the Council, and those who took different views appeared to be on the other side. I particularly explained that there was no compact; and when I talked about "we," I meant we who sit on this side of the Chamber.

* The Hon. Mr. ACLAND.—The amendments that were proposed were necessary in some cases, and even the Hon. Mr. Hall himself said then they were very good amendments. As to the discussion upon the Public Works Bill being a discussion between the Government and honorable members, it was nothing of the sort. The greatest discussion of all was upon the subject of windmills, and honorable members took opposite views during that discussion. There certainly was no appearance of the Council taking up one side as against the Government. I will just make one other remark in defence of the Hon. Mr. Menzies. It has been said that he spoke three times as much as any other honorable member. I may be very much mistaken, but I certainly do not think that what the honorable gentleman said on that Bill was more than the Hon. Colonel Whitmore had said himself.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—It appears to me that we are wasting a good deal of time upon this matter, and I am afraid to say anything lest I should make the same mistake which other honorable members have fallen into. I think we ought to be all satisfied with what has been said. It is quite clear that there has been some misunderstanding between the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse and the Hon. Mr. Hall. It was understood that we should not proceed with any difficult clauses of the Bill. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse was under that impression, no doubt. The Hon. Mr. Hall did not view the matter in the same light as the honorable gentleman, and hence this unfortunate misunderstanding, which is very much to be regretted. I think it would be much better not to say one word more about the matter.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I am not going to occupy much of the time of the Council in discussing this matter; but as a charge has been made against the Hon. Mr. Hall with regard to the conduct of the business, I think it is only right that members of the Council who were present should express their opinion as to what was the nature of this understanding which was supposed to have been entered into. I thought possibly this discussion would not have arisen; that all causes of irritation which undoubtedly did exist had been removed last evening, and that this matter would not have again arisen. The whole thing seems to have been a misunderstanding as to the terms on which the business of this Council was to be carried on. That is how I understand the matter. The real question is not as to the words used. The words were stated by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse very fairly as they appear in Hansard, and as we understand them. The only question, therefore, seems to be whether that understanding was carried out, and whether it was carried out, as the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse pointed out last night, not only according to the letter, but in the spirit in which it was intended. That is the question we have before us now, and it is desirable that we should not introduce any other matter of irritation than what has arisen already. Speaking for myself, it appears to me that the only business gone on with since the Hon. Mr. Hall undertook charge of the Government business has been such as was of no importance—of no vital importance politically, or upon which there was no serious difference of opinion as to principle between members of this Council. It seems to me that the only question which appears to have been fought was the matter contained in the Public Works Bill, and that, as was pointed out by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, was more a matter of detail, and one relating to which many of us had much experience in the working of local institutions. The matters referred to were such as we were certainly able to give valuable opinions on, founded upon our knowledge and experience; and they were not such questions as required to be held over as questions of large Government policy. I think they were but questions of detail; and the divisions which have taken place in this Council prove that they were matters upon which there was no Government policy at stake. We had members from all sides of the House voting in different directions upon each separate amendment; and, as I understood last night from the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, and many of those honorable members around me, they were voting really upon the merits of the question under discussion, in order to make the Bill as perfect a one as it possibly could be made, more especially as the Bill had been first introduced into the Council. But no real question of policy was at stake, because the question of the policy of the Bill had been already decided on the second reading. Therefore I feel that it is only justice to the Hon. Mr. Hall to say that, as far as I understand the arrangement entered into, it had been most faithfully carried out, not only in the letter, but also in the spirit, and in accordance with the wish of the Council. Of course, it is a matter on which each individual can form an opinion; and, if the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse thinks that the spirit of the agreement has not been carried out, his understanding of the agreement differs very much from mine.

* The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall not make any apology for troubling the Council with a few words. No doubt the Hon. Mr. Menzies will be very much gratified to have the discussion prolonged, and he may take credit for its proceeding to such a length, on account of the very kind remarks he felt justified in making. The Hon. Mr. Acland has just stated, with reference to a remark about the time taken up by the Hon. Mr. Menzies on all occasions, that the amount the latter said was not at all equal to that said by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore. That I perfectly admit. I do not think that anything the Hon. Mr. Menzies says is at all equal to what the Hon. Colonel Whitmore says; but the only difference is that the Hon. Mr. Menzies takes six times as long to say it. The honorable gentleman, in the course of this debate, has referred to his conduct on a previous occasion, with reference to which I made some remarks about his obstructing the business of the Council. He told us that when the University Bill was before the Council he did not divide on this or that occasion. Now, he certainly did divide the Council several times. On one occasion the division was 17 against 8 for the honorable gentleman. On another occasion the division was 11 against 6 for the honorable gentleman; yet even that division did not satisfy him; and when I charged him with recommitting the Bill, he said he did not recommit the Bill. The honorable gentleman was quite correct. He did not indeed move to recommit the Bill; but how did it happen? Honorable gentlemen will scarcely credit it; but, according to his own admission, the mistake arose from his want of knowledge of the forms of procedure. My honorable friend Dr. Grace has referred to comparisons drawn between the Hon. Mr. Hall and the Hon. Dr. Pollen—whom I am delighted to see in his place—but not with regard to his carrying on the business any better than the Hon. Mr. Hall. I do not want to draw any comparisons, and I think it is a pity that any comparisons have been drawn. However, I think the Hon. Mr. Hall will find that he has made a mistake, and we have not found him so friendly on all occasions as we would expect. I will leave the Council to judge of the good taste of the remarks made by the Hon. Mr. Menzies. I will only say that if the honorable gentleman would take it into his head to gather sweetness from every flower, and would spend a little more time in the lobby, the House would be a great gainer. I do not think there is a single subject which comes before the House on which the honorable gentleman does not speak, and, if he possibly can, half a dozen times. But he does it in such a smooth sort of way that, unless honorable gentlemen are taking notice particularly, he might speak once or twice without anybody being aware of it. The Hon. Dr. Grace also said, with reference to a few words that fell from the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse as to what took place on another occasion, that we were really calling into question the ability of the Hon. Mr. Hall to conduct the business of the House. But I must say that on one or two divisions the real question has not been submitted to the House. The Hon. Mr. Hall has on one or two occasions stated that he would look upon the division as a reflection upon himself. I do not think that was a fair way of putting it, because, if I thought my voting one way would be a reflection on the Hon. Mr. Hall, I would vote in another direction whether it was contrary to my opinion or not. But this was the state of matters: We did not know the position we were in till last night. The Hon. Mr. Hall will recollect that when the question arose it was altogether on constitutional grounds that objection was taken to proceeding with the Public Works Bill; and yet, when we called the honorable gentleman's attention to this, and stated last night that we had not any one in the Government or with sufficient authority to proceed with a measure of this kind, the honorable gentleman rose in his place, and told us that he had never been asked the question whether the Ministry would be bound by any action he took in regard to amendments in this Bill. I say that we objected on constitutional grounds that we had no regularly appointed Minister in this Council, and that to my mind was tantamount to the question, Can the Hon. Mr. Hall take this responsibility on himself or not? I think that, if we had been fortunate enough at an earlier period to have obtained the intimation we received last night, all this discussion and angry recrimination might have been avoided. It has no doubt been gratifying to one or two honorable gentlemen; because there are some people who, when they find a little sore, are never satisfied unless they are probing it with a stick. I would recommend those honorable gentleman in future to use a little honey instead of vinegar.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL.—I am sorry that I am unable to pass over this occasion without making one or two remarks. But I can assure the Council that they will be as few as possible, and that in making them I shall not say one word which I can avoid to cause irritation in the mind of any honorable member. I must first set right the Hon. Mr. Robinson, who said there were one or two occasions on which I asked the Council to vote on personal grounds.

* The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.—I said it was not putting the question fairly;—that if the question was put in such a shape as to reflect upon the Hon. Mr. Hall in any way whatever, I would certainly vote the other way, even contrary to my opinions.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL.—My honorable friend is not correct in saying that I put the question as a personal matter on more than one occasion. I put it in that way on one occasion in which I had hoped a vote would be taken, but on which no vote was taken; and I did so because I thought it was a question of confidence. It was impossible for me to do otherwise with any due respect to myself or to the Council in which I sit. I do not think the Hon. Mr. Menzies requires much defence from me; but I would point out that the Hon. Mr. Robinson was incorrect when, in referring to what took place on the New Zealand University Bill, he said that the Hon. Mr. Menzies raised the same question over and over again. The question raised by the honorable gentleman on the third reading of the Bill was entirely different from that which was disposed of before—and so much so that although in all previous divisions I had voted against the honorable member, in the last division I voted with him. I do not think it necessary to take any notice of the speech made by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore. He has made one or two references to myself which I do not know whether he intended to be irritating and offensive, but I think the Council will bear me out in saying that it is not necessary for me to take any notice of those remarks. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse has, in an exceedingly temperate manner, referred to the misunderstanding which appears to me to have taken place; and I will, in a few words, and in the same temperate tone, give my view of the case. I can only say that, if the honorable gentleman's previous references to the subject had been made in anything like the same language, we should not have had anything like the unpleasantness of the last few days. The honorable gentleman complains that the understanding which was entered into, when I undertook to occupy temporarily the place of my honorable friend the Colonial Secretary, has not been adhered to—has been broken. The arrangement, as I understand it, was this: that, on the part of the Hon. Dr. Pollen, I stated, as reported in Hansard,—

"He (Mr. Hall) would undertake to conduct through the Council the formal business of the Government—that business not involving questions of policy, and upon which no serious discussion could arise. Any question involving a grave matter of policy he would of course not ask the Council to proceed with."

Any agreement thus made could only be an agreement between the Hon. Dr. Pollen, through myself, and the Council; and I submit that it was for the Council, as we came to the various notices on the Order Paper, to put its own interpretation on what that agreement required—to decide whether any matter was a grave measure of policy, involving serious differences of opinion, or was a matter of administration or detail, which we could advantageously discuss in the absence of the Colonial Secretary. This is the point I would beg honorable gentlemen to bear in mind: that the interpretation of this understanding necessarily rested with the Council, and with my honorable friend; so far as the Colonial Secretary was concerned, I communicated with him every day, stating what business was to come forward, and taking his wishes on the subject. I then proposed it to the Council; and if it appeared to the Council at any time that I was proposing to go on with business in contravention of the understanding which had been arrived at, then I say it was for the Council to say so, and I should at once have taken their decision. I will illustrate the case by referring to one or two measures that did come before us. Take the Native Reserves Bill. I at once proposed we should not go on with that Bill until the Hon. Dr. Pollen returned. The Debtors and Creditors Bill was a measure involving questions of public policy, and was likely to give rise to considerable difference of opinion. Therefore it was postponed from day to day. I asked my honorable friend the Hon. Mr. Mantell not to proceed with a Bill which was in his charge—the Crown Redress Bill—until the Colonial Secretary was able to appear in his place, and I am glad to say the honorable gentleman has not done so. The same remark applies to the Gold Duties Bill, which is in charge of the Hon. Mr. Bonar. These were measures involving questions of public policy, and, in compliance with the understanding referred to, were postponed until the Hon. Dr. Pollen should be able to take part in the discussion. But we did agree to go on with other Bills, which might fairly be considered to involve questions of policy. There was the Post Office Bill, providing for the introduction of post-cards, to which the very strongest objection was taken in some quarters. My honorable friend the Hon. Colonel Brett saw in that system a means of sapping the peace and happiness of every family in the country; and yet that was not regarded as a question of policy which required to be postponed. The same with the Cromwell Racecourse Bill. That Bill did not involve a question of public policy, it is true; but there was a very wide difference of opinion in regard to it. Then there was the Maori Representation Bill, which certainly did involve a large question of public policy; but the Council agreed to proceed with it. There was a great difference of opinion in regard to the Thames Water Supply Bill; but it was gone on with. The two important Bills which it is now necessary to refer to were the Municipal Corporations Bill and the Public Works Bill. Both are consolidating Bills, which repeal a large number of existing Acts, and re-enact their provisions in a more concise form. The honorable gentleman raised no objection to the Municipal Corporations Bill being proceeded with at once. But he objected to the Public Works Bill being gone on with, and I am sure honorable members will bear me out when I say that upon that occasion I said I was entirely in the hands of the Council. I said, "If the Council will express its opinion on the subject, and will say it is not desirable to go on with this measure, I shall acquiesce most cheerfully." I asked my honorable friend opposite if he would adopt the same course—to leave it to the Council, and, if the Council decided against him, that then he should offer no obstruction of an unusual character. On that occasion, the Council expressed its opinion against the honorable gentleman by a majority of one; and as he did not think it desirable to take another division upon the Bill, its consideration was proceeded with. I think I have said all that is necessary to clear myself from the imputation of having broken the understanding or agreement made with the Council, and therefore I shall abstain from making any further remarks, although I have grievances and complaints which I might reasonably make. I shall abstain, in the hope that the present unpleasantness may be forgotten, and that we may return to that harmonious state of things which has hitherto existed. I thank members of this Council for the support they have accorded me since I have filled the place of my honorable friend the Colonial Secretary.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—Honorable gentlemen will understand me when I say that I have listened to this discussion with considerable pain. My honorable friend the Hon. Mr. Hall has said that he was in daily communication with me respecting the business of the Council, but he has not said that he did not inform me of the position of embarrassment in which he was placed in this Council in his effort, for which I shall always feel grateful to him, to carry on the business of the Government during my unavoidable absence. When my honorable friend undertook to conduct the business in the Council on my behalf, there could have been no doubt that the Government made itself responsible for the action of the honorable gentleman, and regarded his proceedings as those of a Minister, and for which they would hold themselves accountable. But when my honorable friend placed himself in the hands of the Council, as he plainly stated, there should have been no cause for dissatisfaction: in fact, the misunderstanding which appears to have arisen might have been removed at once by an expression of opinion on the part of the Council as to whether or not the particular clause or Bill did or did not involve a question of policy. I do not know upon what particular portions of the Public Works Bill the discussion to which reference has been made took place; but I may say, with reference to the whole Bill, that, with the exception of the question whether or not a consolidation of the laws relating to public works was desirable, there is no portion of the details upon which any question of policy can be said to hinge. If there had been any such question arising out of any particular clause, it was competent for the Council to express its opinion by a definite vote; and I am quite sure my honorable friend would at once have bowed to that expression of opinion, and postponed the consideration of the clause. While thanking my honorable friend, I can only express my regret for the embarrassment and trouble which I have brought upon him; and I hope that the unpleasantness which has arisen will terminate with the present discussion.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I purposely introduced this subject in a very guarded manner, because I was anxious not to say a word which could have the effect of embittering the feeling which has arisen in reference to this matter. I regret that the feeling which animated me was not shared in by the honorable gentleman who followed me (the Hon. Mr. Menzies), who, instead of endeavouring to cast oil on the troubled waters, sprinkled vitriol all round. I will not follow the honorable gentleman in all his remarks, nor will I endeavour, in anything I am about to say, to change the opinion in reference to this matter at which he has already arrived. The honorable gentleman has called attention to the fact that three evening sittings were taken up by the Council in considering twenty or thirty clauses of this Bill, endeavouring to show thereby that a good deal of time had been wasted in ill-feeling. Why, the very fact that three evening sittings were taken up in the consideration of these twenty or thirty clauses shows that, in spite of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Hall, we did proceed to consider questions which were calculated to create serious discussion. The honorable gentleman has likewise said that I should be very careful not to say anything that would provoke honorable members, because, as he observed, no member of the Council had laid himself more open to caustic criticism than myself. Sir, I should be one of the last men to ask for forbearance from the members of this Council if I felt that I did not deserve it. If I laid myself open to caustic criticism, why did the honorable gentleman not discharge his duty as he ought to have done, and pour vials of wrath upon my head? The honorable gentleman considers that I laid myself open to caustic criticism, because some three years and a half ago I felt it to be my duty to resign my position as a member of the Government to which I belonged. That was the only occasion upon which I laid myself open to caustic criticism, and I had it heaped upon me in abundance. Looking at the circumstances now at a distance of three and a half years, I do not regret the course I adopted. I felt myself in a false position, and I determined, at any sacrifice of private friendship, to get rid of that false position. I may have been wrong, but I preferred my own freedom and independence to the emoluments of office or the possession of power. The honorable gentleman likewise said that this discussion was raised upon matters of personal pique, and that there were minor circumstances which produced an undercurrent of feeling. All I would ask is that the honorable gentleman will not measure other people's corn by his own bushel.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I did not say matters of personal pique; I said motives of personal pique.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I took down the honorable gentleman's words, and he distinctly said "matters of personal pique." Sir, I indignantly deny the charge, and I call upon the honorable gentleman to substantiate it. It is a base, calumnious charge. I have always been on the most cordial terms with the Hon. Mr. Hall; I have always been the first to support him; I looked up to the honorable gentleman with great respect; and, if he will permit me to say it, I admire him for the thorough backbone he has got. I may sometimes take exception to a certain stubbornness of character which he manifests, but I admit that that is the strength of public character. When this matter came up, I took exception to it on constitutional grounds; and it was upon those constitutional grounds that I opposed the honorable gentleman. There had never been any difference of feeling between us; and I regret, no one more than myself, that in this matter there should have been any difference of feeling between us. With reference to the remarks of other honorable members, I have brought up this matter simply to set myself right with the public. I have shown what was the nature of the understanding arrived at, and I have referred to the proceedings in Committee, which commenced this matter; and I leave it to the public who care to make themselves acquainted with the subject, and who read Hansard, to decide whether I have been right or whether I have been wrong. I ask leave to withdraw the motion that the Council at its rising do adjourn till three o'clock to-morrow.

Leave given, and motion withdrawn.

DEBTORS AND CREDITORS BILL.

On the motion for the third reading of this Bill,

* The Hon. Mr. HART moved, That the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering in Committee the fitness of appointing provisional trustees to act in the administration of bankrupt estates, instead of Registrars of the Supreme Court and trustees appointed by Registrars. His object in moving for the recommitment of the Bill was this: that the measure, which had undergone a large amount of consideration, should, when passed into an Act, have an enduring character, so that this Council and this Parliament might not, next year, be called upon by a very strong expression of opinion upon the subject to again amend the law relating to bankruptcy. He had striven in vain to ascertain—beyond a certain expression which fell from his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary, upon the last occasion when the subject was before the Council—what was the reason which induced the Government to depart from the practice under the Act of 1867, which, as far as his experience and opportunities of observation went, had worked very well, and to put into the hands of the Registrars of the Supreme Court a duty which seemed to him to be incompatible with their position, incompatible with the powers given to them under this Bill, and one which, so it seemed to him, they had not the means at their disposal properly and adequately to discharge. The Registrar of the Supreme Court was bound at all times to attend the Court when it was sitting, and had many duties to perform which were inconsistent with the duty imposed on him by the Bill. He could bear testimony that the Registrars were not provided with adequate means and instruments for fulfilling that duty. It had been suggested that they could make use of the bailiffs of the Resident Magistrates' Courts; but these bailiffs had so much to do at present that they could not perform their functions in carrying out the judgments of the Court: that was the case as regarded Wellington at all events. He believed there was not one in the profession in the colony who did not recognise the fact that the duties of Registrar of the Supreme Court and of bailiff in bankruptcy were two incompatible sets of duties—he spoke without exception as to the profession. The return which he moved for early in the session, and which was made in a couple of lines a few days ago, showed that the bulk of the estates which had passed into bankruptcy during the last two years under the operation of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 were administered by official trustees. Out of 363 cases commenced in 1874, the number in which the official trustee became trustee by reason of the failure of the creditors to meet was 298; and out of 587 cases in 1875, in 363 cases, by reason of the creditors failing to meet, the official trustee became trustee by law. Beside this, in 1874, in forty-five cases the official trustee was nominated by the creditors to undertake the administration of the estate, and in thirty-three cases in 1875, leaving for 1874 thirty-two cases only in which the creditors appointed a trustee other than the official trustee; and in 1875, out of 587 cases, only sixty-three in which any other trustee was appointed. That unmistakably showed as a rule that the creditors had confidence in the trustees appointed to carry on the business. Under those circumstances, he objected to the argument which had been adduced that the Government was not bound to provide machinery for attending to the business of those who were not attending to their own business. That suggestion involved an assumption which was hardly correct. It assumed that, when creditors of bankrupts or insolvents did not meet to appoint a trustee, it was because they neglected their business. In very many cases, it was because they could not neglect their business in order to attend those meetings. The meeting was generally appointed to be held in some chamber attached to the Supreme Court, and many of the creditors might be dispersed throughout the country. Many of them might be persons engaged in business which they could not safely leave to other persons to attend to, or they might have no other person to whom to leave their business during their absence. The dividend to be received out of the estate might be one of a very uncertain character. The creditors might fail altogether to see the notices, and might not attend in consequence of not having seen the notices. Under those circumstances, he thought it was well there should be some competent person appointed by the Government who would be responsible for the management of those estates, rather than that the appointment should be made by the Registrar, or, in case he could not find a trustee to act for him, that he himself should do the work. He was not aware that there had been any complaint made respecting the official-trustee system. If there had been, he had not heard of it; and, as he had said, the whole profession, he believed, were of one mind on the subject, and were of opinion that an official trustee was the proper person to be appointed. The official assignee was known; his place of residence was known; and in case of any estate going into his hands, it was easy for the creditors to apply to him for any information with regard to that estate, and so the appointment would act well for the creditors as well as for the Court itself. There was another point which might be raised, and that was that the responsibility arising out of such an appointment fell upon the Government making it. It did not appear to him that there was any difference in responsibility, as far as the Government were concerned, whether the officer was a named and known officer appointed by the Government, or whether he was an officer appointed by the Registrar, which was to be the case by the provisions of the Bill as it stood at present. If the creditors failed to meet, the Registrar was to appoint one of the creditors, or some other person willing to accept the trust, who was afterwards to be called "creditors' trustee." If he could not find any creditor or any other person to accept the trust, he was himself to take it and carry it through; and at the end of twelve months, if no order was made by the Court in the meantime, he was to pay the money into the hands of the Colonial Treasurer. But that which appeared to him the strongest argument against that system was, that he believed it would be generally agreed that the first and most important step to be taken was without delay to take possession of the insolvent's estate; that there should be the shortest possible time between the declaration of the insolvency, or the act which constituted the insolvency, and the taking possession of the goods; and he was quite satisfied that one whose business it was specially to look after those matters would be able far more promptly to take the steps necessary for taking possession than the Registrar of the Supreme Court would; that he would have under his eye persons who would be competent to do what was necessary under the circumstances, and, as a rule, to conduct the business far better. As recommended by the Chamber of Commerce at Auckland, he believed it would be better that such a person should be a commission agent, and one accustomed to dealing with business of that kind, and not to the Registrar of the Supreme Court, who had very many questions of law, and very many other questions quite inconsistent with the character of a man of business of that stamp, to deal with. By making the Registrar of the Supreme Court a trustee in bankruptcy, they would be making him an accounting party, having accounts to pass open to question with the creditors and with the insolvent himself, and which would, if an official trustee were appointed, be determined by the Registrar himself. He thought the two positions were inconsistent on that ground, as well as on others, and therefore he had been most anxious to bring this question before the Council.

*The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said this question was fully discussed in Committee, and he hoped the Council would affirm the decision at which it had arrived on that occasion. He differed with very great diffidence from the honorable and learned gentleman who had last spoken, who on a matter of this kind might be supposed from his experience to speak with very much greater authority than he (Dr. Pollen) could do; but it appeared to him that the principle for which the Government were contending was a large one which should not be confounded with mere details. The system of official assigneeism had been under trial in the colony for a very great number of years, and no one could say that it had worked satisfactorily. The very fact of it not working satisfactorily—the very fact that the process of winding up insolvent estates had become so severe a tax upon estates themselves as very often to be regarded as destructive—was one of the causes which led, in the last session of the Assembly, to the adoption of a principle for which the Government at least expected that there should be a fair trial. The Act of last session, defective as it was found to be in a great many of its details, was accepted on all sides on account of this change of principle, and of the provision which it contained imposing upon creditors the duty of looking after their own affairs. The table which his honorable friend had prepared for the Council simply showed that, as he had previously stated, the creditors relied upon a kind of special Providence in the person of the official assignee to look after their affairs in matters of bankruptcy. Out of 587 cases which were stated to have been commenced in 1875, in 863 no creditors could be got together to take the smallest trouble about their own affairs, and the official assignee came into possession because there was no meeting of creditors. There was no reason whatever that he could see why the State should continue to provide machinery of this kind, which experience not only on this side of the line but in England had shown to be entirely obnoxious and unsatisfactory. They had had an Inspector in Bankruptcy and a regular establishment which had not worked well, and it would be a grave mistake to re-establish that system. He thought that, at all events, they should give this Bill in its present form a trial for one year. Gentlemen, for whose opinions he was sure his honorable and learned friend would have great respect, thought that in its present form the Bill was one that might be worked exceedingly well, and he hoped it would be allowed to remain as it was. The objection that the Registrar of the Supreme Court had more duties to perform than he could possibly fulfil was not, he thought, a sufficiently powerful one to induce the Council to give up the view it took on a former occasion with respect to this Bill. The duties imposed upon the Registrar by the measure were light, and purely of a technical character. That officer was named because it was necessary to name somebody, and he had the power of divesting himself of all responsibility, if circumstances rendered it necessary. He was not able to say more on the subject at present than to express a hope that the Bill would be allowed to remain, and that the system would have a trial for one year, until they saw what its effects were.

* The Hon. Mr. HART, in reply, said it was not on the ground of the Registrar having more than he could possibly do at present that he had proposed this change in the Bill. It was because the duties which were cast upon him by this measure were incompatible with the duties performed by him at present. And, with regard to the suggestion that creditors, by refraining from meeting, neglected their own business, and that the creditors should not be encouraged so to neglect their business, he would mention that in various other directions the Government had provided machinery for attending to the affairs of those who did neglect their own business. He would refer, as a special instance of that kind of interference, to an Act which not long since passed through the Council. He meant the extension of the duties of the Public Trustee to the case of the estates of absentees who for ten years had been without agents in the colony. He did not know a more striking instance of interference for the benefit of those who failed to attend to their own duties than that. So far, therefore, as the principle went of non-interference with those who failed to attend to their own business, he took it that the Council had shown by that Act that the principle was not carried out. He would not trouble the Council at any further length. He was not very well at present, but he had thought it his duty to bring the matter forward.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 4th October, 1876.

First Reading—Abolition Act—Immigration and Public Works Appropriation—Counties Bill—Attorney-General Bill—Public Health Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READING.

The Protection of Animals Bill.

ABOLITION ACT.

Sir G. GREY said that, before the business was proceeded with, he would like to ask a question of the Government without notice. It was a question of a most important nature, and was to the following effect:—It appeared from a memorandum addressed by Ministers to the Governor that they had received some opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown as to the powers of the General Assembly to pass the Abolition Act, and he wished to know whether or not such an opinion had been given. If it had been given, he would ask that it should be at once laid on the table, as it was of the greatest importance.

Major ATKINSON said that perhaps the honorable gentleman would give notice of his question, and then there could be no doubt that it would be answered.

Sir G. GREY thought this was a matter of so much importance that he would be justified in pressing it. All their proceedings were based on the supposition that such an opinion had not been given. He hoped the Government would not refuse to give the information he asked for.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was only by leave of the House that a question could be asked without notice; and if Ministers declined to answer it now, the honorable member for the Thames would have to give notice.

Sir G. GREY would in that case give notice that he would ask the question next day.

IMMIGRATION AND PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATION.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Minister for Public Works, if he intends this year to provide for the requirements of the year by a Bill similar in purpose to "The Immigration and Public Works Appropriation Act, 1875"? As the Hon. the Minister for Public Works would know very well what his object in asking this question was, he would therefore simply ask it.

Mr. RICHARDSON said there would be a similar Act introduced.

COUNTIES BILL.

The House went into Committee on this Bill.

Clause 119.—Governor may appoint auditors.

Sir G. GREY moved, That the word "Governor" be struck out, with the view of inserting the word "Council" in lieu thereof.

Question put, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

First Schedule.—Description of counties.

"Thames County—Is bounded towards the north by the southern boundaries of the Coromandel County hereinbefore defined; towards the east by the ocean; towards the south by a line from Ngakuriawhare to the summit of the Aroha Mountain, being the northern boundary of the Tauranga Confiscated District, by the production of that line to the Thames (Waihou) River; and towards the west by the centre of that river and by the Firth of Thames to the commencing point."

Sir G. GREY moved, as an amendment, That all the words after "towards the east by the ocean," be struck out, with a view to inserting the following words: "on the west by the ocean to the mouth of the Piako River; thence to Pakorokoro; thence by a due line west to the summit of the ridge which forms the eastern watershed of the Piako River; along the summit of that ridge to the sources of the Piako; thence on the south by a straight line to the summit of the Aroha Mountain, and thence by a straight line to the ocean at Waihi."

The Bill was reported to the House with amendments, which were ordered to be considered on Friday.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL BILL.

Mr. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it would be in the recollection of the House that the matter was referred to the Disqualification Committee, which brought up the following report:—

"Your Committee have considered whether any of the provisions of 'The Attorney-General's Act, 1866,' have been infringed by the present Ministry, and have to report that there seems to be considerable doubt whether this Act does not limit the Governor to the selection of some person not a member of the Assembly as Attorney-General; and if there be such limitation, then there has been a clear infringement of the provisions of the Act. In the opinion of your Committee, such a doubt should at once be set at rest by an Act containing provisions that would allow the Governor to select either a member of the Assembly or some one outside the Legislature as Attorney-General. Your Committee also consider it is inadvisable to have it enacted that an Attorney-General can only be removed on the address of both Houses. Should one outside the Legislature be appointed, the office should be held at the pleasure of the Governor."

In pursuance of that resolution, a Bill had been prepared and distributed some time ago for the purpose of carrying out the proposals of the Committee. Honorable members would understand that the position of the Attorney-General was this: In the early times of this colony, when it was first established, the Queen appointed three different officers from England—the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney-General, and the Colonial Treasurer. No alteration was made from that mode of appointment till the time when responsible government was introduced. From that time up to the year 1866, the Attorney-General continued to be a political officer, and sat in the General Assembly as a Minister. In 1866, however, an alteration was made. The arrangement was found to be inconvenient by the Government of the day; and it was determined that the gentleman who now holds the office of Chief Justice should hold the office of Attorney-General under a new tenure—a tenure totally different from that under which Attorneys-General were appointed anywhere else. The office was for the future to be held on the same terms as those under which a Judge of the Supreme Court holds office—that is to say, during good behaviour. Such an Act might have been convenient for the time at which it was passed; but on the whole he thought it never should have been passed; and it appeared to him that the time had arrived when a totally different arrangement should be made, and that the Ministry should appoint an Attorney-General either to hold a position in the Ministry or out of it, whichever might be most convenient. Matters had entirely changed since 1866. There were then only two lawyers in the House, whereas now there were fourteen or fifteen. It was thought it would conduce to the better management of the business of the House if the Attorney-General held a seat in it. This Bill would afford an opportunity for his doing so. With these few observations, he would move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MURRAY did not intend to speak upon the Bill, but merely wished to ask whether it proposed to increase the number of Ministers from seven to eight.

Mr. WHITAKER said, if the honorable gentleman would look at the last clause, he would find it stated, "Nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to authorize the appointment of more than seven members of the Executive Council, inclusive of the Premier." Whatever was done with that question, the Bill left it entirely untouched. It allowed the Attorney-General to be a political or non-political officer, at the discretion of the Government of the day.

Mr. REYNOLDS intended to oppose the second reading of the Bill. He was aware, as the honorable gentleman had said, that there were fourteen or fifteen lawyers in the House; but he thoroughly disapproved of making the Attorney-General a political officer. It was true that prior to 1866 it was found desirable to have an Attorney-General in the House; but from that date up to the present time, no difficulty whatever had been experienced either by the Government or the Legislature in carrying on the business without a political Attorney-General. From the experience which members had gained, it was found that the necessity for such an officer had passed away. The Attorney-General had a great deal to do in giving advice, not only to his colleagues, but also to the Governor and the House; but, apart from that, he had no great faith in a political Attorney-General. He might be peculiar in his views; but he thought the opinions of a political Attorney-General were generally shaped to suit his political views. He based that opinion upon his own political experience. He knew one political Attorney-General who prepared a Bill, and shortly after went out of office; and because the Bill was introduced in the following session, and had the name of another honorable member (Mr. Bathgate) at the head of it, the moment it came before the Legislative Council, of which he was a member, he looked at it, and, for no other reason than that it had been carried through this House by Mr. Bathgate, he moved that it be read a second time that day six months. It was a very necessary Bill, and, as a matter of fact, was the same Bill he had himself prepared for introduction; but because he was no longer Attorney-General he objected to it. He did not say that all Attorneys-General were alike; but there were instances where an Attorney-General, the moment he went into office, reversed everything that had been done by his predecessor. The present system had worked very well during the last ten years, and he knew of no sufficient reason why it should be altered.

Mr. MOORHOUSE regretted that a gentleman of so much experience should give so bad an account of the lawyers. The Attorney-General was a lawyer necessarily holding a very exalted position among his fellows, generally a man who aspired to be a Judge, and it was monstrous to suppose that a leading lawyer occupying such a position would stultify himself by propounding bad law. He recommended himself in the highest degree in his profession by stating sound law; and it was a very great advantage to the House to have, assisting in its debates, gentlemen of such high character and great learning as the Attorney-General ought to be. He regretted that the honorable member for Port Chalmers should have given expression to such statements. He had been a member of the Government, and it was a bad thing that expressions of suspicion should be thrown out against men eminent in their profession—men whose ambition had no limit except the highest possible distinction upon the Bench. It was not likely that an Attorney-General would deliberately prove his unfitness for such a position by giving bad law. He could quite understand the Attorney-General being a partizan; he could understand his being a very keen politician; he could understand his counselling a Cabinet to act in accordance with his political views; but he could not understand the possibility of a distinguished lawyer publishing his dishonesty and unfitness by stating unsound law.

Bill read a second time.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

Mr. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it dealt with one of the most important subjects that could possibly come before the House. It embraced many provisions of an Act recently passed in England, and, as far as the principle was concerned, the House would have no difficulty in affirming it. There were, however, a great many clauses in the Bill, and he hoped they would receive careful consideration in Committee.

Mr. BOLLESTON said there was one point he wished to call attention to. He had read the Bill through carefully, and there was no doubt it was a considerable improvement on the existing Act. It also contained provisions rendered necessary by the change in the form of government; but a question had arisen particularly with regard to one of the cities of New Zealand which deserved consideration. The operation of a Bill of this sort should not be limited to the areas comprised within town belts, but should extend to the suburban districts. The district which should be governed by a Local Board in a city like Christchurch should not be simply a borough, but a borough with a suburban district; and he would suggest to the honorable member that, when the Bill was in Committee, provision should be made for extending the boundaries of local districts, in case of the boroughs, municipalities, and suburban districts lying close together. In the case of the city of Christchurch, he believed the "drainage district" was a district that could very properly be made into a local health district. It was needless to point out that there was a kind of affinity between the two subjects, and he believed the Drainage Board would be a very proper Board to have vested in it the functions that devolved on a Local Board under this Bill. The subjects they dealt with—those of health and drainage—were so closely connected that the Public Health Board was the proper body to work the Public Health Act.

Mr. REID thought that this was a very important Bill; but at the stage of the session at which they had arrived, they could not do it justice. He had very great regard for the public health, but he thought the health of honorable members required some little consideration. He submitted that, looking at the very important business they had to deal with, and believing that the present Act in regard to this matter, if properly administered, would be quite sufficient to carry on for another nine months, the consideration of this matter now would be a waste of time. He hoped the House would not waste any more time during the present session. The House had no time to consider the business already before them, but now a new Bill of 160 clauses was introduced. He would be very loth to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, and he would suggest that a much more graceful way of dealing with it would be to put off the committal to that day three weeks, and he thought that possibly by that time they would be settled down to business, and be able to consider it thoroughly. He would suggest to the Postmaster-General that they should read the Bill a second time now, in order affirm the principle, which seemed to be considered a great deal in regard to some Bills; and having affirmed the principle they should leave it until they had disposed of more important business, and then they could consider it at leisure.

Mr. BOWEN hoped the honorable gentleman would not object to the second reading of the Bill, which had received a great deal of attention in another place. The Bill was to a very great extent an improvement on the existing Act. It would not occupy much of the time of the House although it looked a very long Bill, for a large portion of it consisted of mere machinery clauses. The existing law had been found insufficient and unsatisfactory, and the proposed changes would make it altogether unworkable. It was therefore impossible to postpone legislation for another session.

Mr. STOUT thought the Government should have taken the hint of the honorable member for Taieri. The Government had, during the whole of the session, wasted the time of the House by introducing Bills which were not of pressing necessity, and this was one of them. There had been dozens of little tinkering Bills brought in, and the time of the House and of Committees had been wasted, while the more important Bills of the session had been left over until the end of it. He would therefore move, That this Bill be ordered to be read a second time this day month. If the business of the session was not then closed, the Bill could come on again for second reading. He believed the Bill was a good one; but if the Government hoped to get their important measures through, they would have to give up some Bills, and this was one that might be postponed until next year.

Mr. SHEEHAN could not join the party of the extreme left on the present occasion, and would be sorry to see the Bill thrown out in the way proposed. If it had been now first introduced in the House and had not passed the other Chamber, it would be a different matter. But the Bill had passed through the ordeal of the Legislative Council, and with all respect for the House, he would say he had very great confidence in Bills which came from the Council, for he thought they got far more consideration there than they did in the House. The existing law relating to public health was very unsatisfactory indeed, and there was ample evidence of that in the part of the country from which he came. Its working was found to be difficult, and likely to lead to expensive litigation, and he thought the Government had done well to introduce a Bill based upon the experience they had gained during the last few years.

Mr. HUNTER would support the views of the last speaker, for this was a very important Bill. He might perhaps be pardoned for saying that if honorable members would talk a little less and work a little more the House would be able to pass many useful measures. Some Bill of this kind was necessary, and honorable members ought not to leave their places in Parliament this session without passing a Bill so much required as this was.

Mr. ROLLESTON said the honorable member who moved that the Bill be read a second time that day month could scarcely be aware that the change in the form of government would actually leave the present Public Health Act without any means for its administration. At present the central Boards consisted, first of all, of the members of the local Executive, and they would soon cease to exist. He was quite aware that the existing Act had not worked altogether satisfactorily, but here, as in England, the question of dealing with the public health in the best possible manner was but a tentative matter. He did not believe, if the House considered this Bill for months, that it could be made thoroughly satisfactory. But it would be a pity to drop the measure this session. Having had some little experience as a member of one of the Boards of Health, he was able to say that great progress was being made in dealing satisfactorily with the public health. It required a great deal of caution and tact on the part of local bodies, and the local bodies required a great deal of coaxing and instruction to bring them up to a sense of what was necessary to be done to preserve the public health. He hoped the honorable member would not press his amendment.

Mr. LUMSDEN hoped the honorable member would press his amendment. He thought this was a Bill which could very well stand over till next session. The existing Public Health Act was quite sufficient to enable people to provide efficiently for the public health; but what was wanted was health officers. Judging from the filthy state of the town of Wellington—the filthy drains that were running under people's noses—he would say that it was a health officer that was wanted here. He was sure that, under the existing Act, steps would be taken to purify the town, and make it clean and decent-looking. In the town from which he came, they had ample powers to keep up a decent appearance, on the surface at any rate, and they had a system of underground drains for taking away all foul matter. If there were no powers to compel sanitary improvements in the city of Wellington, he would agree at once to have this Bill carried with the greatest despatch. But he believed there were ample powers in the existing law. If the honorable member for Wellington City, who advised others to talk less and work more, would advise the civic authorities to attend to the public health, it would be better for the town.

Mr. BRANDON agreed with the honorable member for Avon that the passing of the Public Health Bill this session was absolutely necessary, and he hoped the House would agree to the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY thought the House should pay due consideration to Bills which came from the other branch of the Legislature, where great care had been bestowed upon them. When Bills had been so framed that the clauses would work well and were sent from the Upper House, this House ought to consider them carefully; or, if they did not, what could they expect when their Bills went to the Legislative Council?

Mr. REID said it was only a certain amount of work that men could get through and give their attention to. He had no faith in alipshod legislation, and they could not throw their responsibilities on the other branch of the Legislature. It was of no use to tell honorable members that the Bill had received great attention from the other House, and that therefore they should accept it; for this House had to deal with the interests of another class of the community, and it was the duty of honorable members to look carefully into every Bill that passed. There was enough business already before the House to last for four weeks at all events. There were three important Bills—the Waste Lands Administration Bill, the Financial Arrangements Bill, and the Public Works Bill—which were not yet before the House, and which would occupy them a long while if they received justice. And now a Bill with 160 clauses was placed before them at half-past twelve o'clock at night, and during the last weeks of the session, and they were expected to deal with it. They were expected to do all this in two or three weeks, as well as to consider other measures of greater importance; but it would be much better to pass a few Bills carefully, and it would be more advisable to wait even six months longer than to hurry through measures of importance. The country would not at all thank the House for shovelling a lot of legislation upon the people, and passing Acts that would have to be repealed next session. Passing a Bill would not put a stop to the stench from the gutters of the city of Wellington, for the people themselves must look to these matters, and the existing legislation was quite sufficient to enable them to do so. It was all nonsense to say that the country could not go on another year with the existing law. The Public Health Act had not been half administered. There were trifling defects in it, but they were not unsurmountable. As to the question of the Superintendents and Executive Councils being done away with, a Bill with one clause would put that all right, and authority could be given to some other local body to carry out the provisions of the Act. A clause to that effect might be inserted in another Bill, and it had been suggested to him that the Financial Arrangements Bill would be a suitable one to put it in. He did blame the Government for bringing in such a number of Bills this session, when the House had so much business to dispose of. Some 140 or 150 Bills had been introduced this session, and how they could be carried through he did not know. He hoped that if they agreed to the second reading of the Bill, its committal would be postponed for three weeks, for there were other Bills of much greater importance which they should first dispose of.

Mr. PYKE was quite surprised at any honorable member finding fault with the stenches in Wellington, as there was an immense variety of them. If a person did not like one stench he had only to turn round the corner to get another. The town was full of them.

Mr. KENNEDY said that, seeing how near they were to the end of the session, and the amount of business yet to be got through, he hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

Mr. FISHER hoped the Bill would not be withdrawn. He considered it to be the most important Bill introduced this session. It was of far more importance than the Bill which they had been discussing during the last two or three days—a measure which would be inoperative. They ought to pass the Public Health Bill, if they passed no other this session.

Mr. WHITAKER hoped the House would at any rate read the Bill a second time. It came down from the Legislative Council, where it had been carefully considered. The Bill had been before honorable members for some time. He would propose that the Bill should be committed in the course of two or three days. The Finance Arrangements Bill would stand first on the Order Paper. After that measure was disposed of, if they should find time to consider the Public Health Bill, they would go on with it; if not, it would be dropped. In the meantime he hoped the Bill would be read a second time.

Bill read a second time, and considered in Committee.

New clause.

Mr. WASON moved the following new clause:—"If it shall appear to any local Board that it is inadvisable to have cesspools or water-closets in any part of the district under the jurisdiction of the local Board, it shall be lawful for the local Board to prohibit the use of such cesspools or water-closets within such part of such district, and to order such cesspools or water-closets to be filled up."

Question put, "That the clause be agreed to;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

PIAKO SWAMP.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN moved, For leave to lay upon the table of the Council a plan showing the extent, figure, and position of the Waikato-Piako Swamp grant of 87,000 acres.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL had hoped that the honorable gentleman would have given the Council some information as to what this plan was; because, although the Council was not generally chary in allowing honorable members to lay authentic documents on the table, still he thought it would very reasonably require that this plan should be authenticated. Whether a map was correct or not, might of course very often be a matter of opinion. Any publication or correspondence issued by a Provincial Government, for instance, there could be no question about. But without knowing anything more about the map than they did know, he thought they should be careful before granting leave to lay it on the table, and thereby appearing to give it a certain amount of authenticity. If the honorable member would consent that the map should be referred to the Survey Department to have its correctness certified to, he took it there would then be no objection on the part of the Council to its being laid upon the table. But he would suggest to the Council that it would hardly be right to accept a map without having any knowledge whatever of its correctness. He was sorry his honorable friend had not given them any reasons why he wished the map to be laid on the table, because, if the Council desired to have a plan of this particular block of country, the proper mode of obtaining it would have been to move that there be laid on the table a copy of the plan furnished by the Survey Department. At any rate, he trusted his honorable friend would not object to state why he desired to have this map laid on the table, and also whether he would not have it submitted to the Survey Office to have its correctness ascertained and certified. Perhaps it would be more convenient if, in order to enable that to be done, he moved the adjournment of the debate. His honorable friend would see that he was not raising any unnecessary difficulty, but that if the motion were at once adopted they would be laying down a precedent which it would not be desirable to establish.

The Hon. Mr. HART suggested that the honorable gentleman should give the soundings with the plan.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON hoped the Hon. Mr. Hall was not objecting to the motion of the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin upon any technical grounds. If there was a map of the country, describing and defining the boundaries of the 87,000 acres to which the purchasers of the Piako Swamp were entitled, he did not see why it should not be placed on the table. As to verifying those boundaries, that, he imagined, would be a question hereafter. At present, however, he supposed the purchasers were taking possession of their land under that map. He was speaking as being quite unprejudiced in this matter. He was entirely unacquainted with the country, and knew nothing of the matter in any shape whatever; but he could see the necessity to a certain extent why this map should be laid on the table. The purchase embraced a very large extent of country, and he was under the impression that some of the land was of a very valuable description, and his honorable friend Mr. Chamberlin might be desirous of having this map placed on the table of the Council for the purpose of ascertaining whether it interfered with the boundaries of any land in the immediate neighbourhood. The boundaries of the Piako Swamp seemed to be a kind of myth in the minds of many honorable gentlemen, and the land taken by the purchasers might include a certain portion of country which was never intended to be given in the sale of the 87,000 acres. He could not agree with his honorable friend Mr. Hall that the map should be withheld because it had not been certified to by the Survey Department. Such a certificate might be necessary or it might not; but the purchasers might be either draining, fencing, or ditching the land in accordance with the map that was now in existence, and the production of which the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin desired.

* The Hon. Mr. ACLAND agreed with the Hon. Mr. Hall that the debate should be adjourned in order that they might know what this map was. The Hon. Mr. Robinson said if there was such a map it was desirable that it should be laid on the table; but the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin did not say a single word about the map, so far as the Council at present knew. It might have been made by a passer-by, or by some one who had never been in the province, or it might have been made by a surveyor. But the Council had not received a single word of explanation as to where this plan came from, how it was made, why it was made, and why the honorable gentleman asked to lay it on the table. He certainly thought that the Council, for the sake of its own dignity, should not consent to anything of the sort, without the smallest explanation. The map might have been made by the proprietors, who might wish to show what the extent of the land really was. On the other hand, it might have been made by a person who had a great objection to the sale; and before it was laid on the table the Council had a right to know something about it.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON said that if the honorable gentleman would look at the motion, he would see that there was a plan mentioned. There was no particular map referred to. If there was no such plan of the land as that indicated, of course it could not be laid on the table.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said they were fighting with shadows. He was sorry to say that, but he did so under correction, which he would certainly receive at the first opportunity from his honorable friend Mr. Hall. What the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin wished to do was, to lay a map on the table. If the Council assented to the honorable gentleman's request, then that map would be laid on the table; but it would have no more authority on that account, and would have no effect if it did not profess to be an authentic document. The custom had become rather prevalent this session of honorable members moving for leave to lay this, that, and the other on the table. He had seen two pieces of rotten wood laid on the table, with neither the generic nor specific names attached, and yet they were not referred to Dr. Hector for his certificate, which he supposed in the case of rotten wood would correspond with that of the Surveyor-General with regard to maps. He did not see that there was any objection to lay this map on the table. If laid on the table in pursuance of the honorable gentleman's motion, it would carry no more weight or authority with it than was claimed for it by the honorable gentleman when he brought the resolution before the Council; and on that ground only, while objecting to have all sorts of unauthenticated things laid on the table of the Council, he would support the motion.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE could not see that there could be any objection to the map being placed upon the table, if it were referred to the Waste Lands Committee for verification. Provided the authenticity of the map could be ascertained, it would be interesting to have it on the table as an historical curiosity. He did not know if honorable gentlemen remembered that there was a discussion about this Piako Swamp two or three months ago, and he thought there was a hostile vote on the subject in another place. Any lesson that was to be deduced from that circumstance would be better imprinted on their minds if they were able to look at a map of the country referred to. He did not know what it was intended to found upon this motion—whether there was any disposition to bring the matter again under discussion in the Council. If there was, he would resist it, because the subject was a thing of the past, and it was desirable, if not to forget it, that it should not take up any more of their time. But, as a matter of courtesy to the honorable mover, he thought he should be allowed, as other honorable gentlemen had been, to place his plan upon the table. The map, however, should be referred to the Waste Lands Committee, where it would be ascertained if there were any reasonable grounds for believing that it was an authentic document, as far as the correctness of the survey went. He hoped that nothing was intended to be founded on this, because at the present period of the session it was a great deal too late to go into the question of the Piako Swamp. The persons responsible for this particular matter having disappeared so long ago, he thought they would do better, if not to forget it, at any rate not to discuss it.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said that probably the Hon. Mr. Hall's objection to this map might be that, knowing many of the surveys in the South were wrong, he might think it likely that this map was very inaccurate, and it was not desirable an inaccurate document should be laid on the table. Perhaps the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin was prepared to say that this was an accurate map, and that the survey was a good one.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR thought it most reasonable and proper to adjourn the debate for a day or two, in order to ascertain if the map was in accordance with the official and proper plans of this land. Of course, there must be some reason for desiring to lay such a map on the table. As they all knew, this subject had been a very much disputed one; and if information was to be submitted to the Legislature, the Council should at all events be satisfied that such information was correct. He would support the adjournment of the debate, in order to give the honorable gentleman an opportunity of verifying the map, which he could easily do.

* The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN was sorry that a plan of the Piako should have frightened the Hon. Mr. Hall so much. He did not know what there could be in it so very alarming. It was simply swamp land. Perhaps the honorable gentleman was afraid of being swallowed up in it. He knew of no reason for the production of the map. He was asked by Sir George Grey simply to lay it on the table, no reason being stated for doing so. He thought, the map having been given to him by a gentleman, there could be no question as to its correctness. A gentleman would not be guilty of asking another one to lay a plan on the table that was not in every way a proper one.

W. BUCHANAN.

Mr. SHEEHAN asked the Premier, Whether the Government will take steps to give effect to the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the case of William Buchanan? He wished to state very shortly the facts of the case, in order to enable honorable members to understand the bearing of the question. The petitioner came to Auckland in 1848 or 1850, and his case was similar to those of other persons who had complied in spirit with the requirements of the law, but, through some technical difficulties, were not legally entitled to receive Crown grants. It appeared from the evidence that the petitioner left Auckland in order to go and make his selection of land, but through stress of weather he was detained on the way and did not arrive in time to do it by the date fixed by the Act. The Committee came to the following unanimous opinion:—

"I am directed to report that, in the opinion of the Committee, the petitioner's case is entitled to consideration, and they recommend that legislative power be given to the Provincial Government of Auckland to inquire into this and similar cases, and to award land out of provincial estate, if, after inquiry, it appears desirable to do so."

He might also mention that "The Auckland Waste Lands Act, 1874," when passed through the House of Representatives, contained a clause giving this power, which was unfortunately struck out in another branch of the Legislature. He hoped the Hon. the Premier would introduce provisions in the Bill that was now before the House in order to give power to deal with cases of this kind, as many were likely to arise.

Major ATKINSON regretted that he had not time to go fully into the case, and therefore he would not like to express an opinion as to the steps which it might be necessary to take; but if his honorable friend would consult with him, he would be very happy to see if what the honorable gentleman suggested could be done.

ABOLITION ACT.

Sir G. GREY.—I beg to ask the Government, If they will lay before this House copies of all correspondence, opinion, or advice which they may have received from the Law Officers of the Crown in London, to the effect that the action taken by the General Assembly in regard to the Abolition Act was not, and is not, ultra vires? I am induced to ask this question from what I believe is a grave misunderstanding on the subject, which I should like to bring to the notice of the Government. I have heard it is alleged by the Government that the Queen has assented to the Abolition Act. Now, Sir, Her Majesty has no power to assent to the Abolition Act. The statements made with regard to the law on that matter have been quite misunderstood, and the question I now put bears very much upon the subject. The Queen's power with regard to Acts presented for her assent to the Governor is laid down in the Constitution Act. The Governor may assent to an Act in the Queen's behalf; and, the Governor having so assented, the Act comes immediately into operation. Then there is a provision that Her Majesty, watching over the good of her subjects, may, at any time within two years, dissent from such Act; but Her Majesty is not to dissent from it if not required to do so. The powers of the Secretary of State are, by the Constitution Act, perfectly defined. He has no power of interference in the matter at all, except in one respect: that is, that, Her Majesty being advised by the Privy Council, not by the Secretary of State, that she ought to disallow an Act, the Secretary of State may certify on an order by the Privy Council the date when the Act was received from the colony at the Colonial Office, so that he shows on the order of the Privy Council that it was issued within the two years laid down by the Constitution Act. Lord Carnarvon in his despatch says, "I am now to inform you that Her Majesty will not be advised to exercise her power of disallowance in respect to this Act." Lord Carnarvon had no power in the matter. The whole thing was ultra vires in respect to that Act. He might say this: "So long as I am Secretary of State, I will not advise Her Majesty to take the opinion of the Privy Council upon the subject." He would be justified in saying that; but that would have no legal effect whatever. Any other Secretary of State could advise Her Majesty on the subject at any time within the two years allowed by the Constitution Act. I presume she would not appeal to the Privy Council without that advice; but from the time of the receipt of that Act, which would be in January last, Her Majesty has for two years power to disallow the Act. That is a prerogative of which she cannot divest herself, because it has been conferred upon her by the British Parliament for the good of the people of this colony. I am, therefore, very anxious to know whether Ministers are in possession of copies of the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown in London upon this Act, because nothing else can show that we are justified in admitting the goodness of the Act which the Superintendent of Otago and myself contend to be ultra vires.

Major ATKINSON.—The statements made by the honorable gentleman are matters of opinion, and not a mere question. I do not propose to argue the matter with the honorable member at all. I differ from a great deal that he has laid down; but the notice of the honorable member being simply a question, I shall answer it as a question and without argument. The Government are not in possession of any correspondence, opinion, or advice from the Law Officers of the Crown in England. The process through which a Colonial Act goes, as far as I am advised, is this: Upon reaching the Secretary of State, it is submitted by the Colonial Office to their own law adviser, who then examines it, and, if he finds no fault with it, he returns it to the office. It is then sent to the President of the Privy Council, by whom it is submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, who point out what are its peculiar features, and whether it is within the scope of the Parliament having passed it, so to pass it. If it has been reserved for Her Majesty's assent, she then assents to it if so advised; if it is an Act upon which she has a power of disallowance, she disallows it if so advised; and if it is one which the Privy Council thinks should be left to its operation, Her Majesty, if she pleases, leaves it to its operation. That is the process, I understand, which has been gone through with the Abolition Act. It has been left by Her Majesty, after due legal advice, to come into operation in the ordinary course. The Government therefore assume, Her Majesty having been pleased, after consulting her Law Officers, to leave it to its operation, that it is not ultra vires, but perfectly within the scope of this Parliament to pass.

Sir G. GREY.—I think I ought to be allowed to answer part of the statement made by the Hon. the Premier, because it is contrary to fact.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member would not be in order in doing so.

Sir G. GREY.—Then I shall move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. ANDREW.—I rise to a point of order. Is it possible for an honorable member to move the adjournment of the House in order that he may speak to a question put to Ministers?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for the Thames is in order. A question has been asked, and a certain explanation has been given. That having been done, the question has been disposed of. An honorable member gets up then and is called to order; whereupon he moves the adjournment of the House, and upon that question it is competent for him to speak.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I think the House ought to be adjourned in order that honorable members might have an opportunity of considering the statement made by the Hon. the Premier. We now have a distinct statement from the Premier that the Government are not in possession of any opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown in England respecting the Abolition Act, and the Government simply assume that the Act is not ultra vires for certain reasons they have stated. In reply to that, I must hold that the House, before its adjournment, must consider this: that Lord Carnarvon's opinion was based on certain correspondence which was sent to him, and that that correspondence contained no reference whatever to the fact that the Abolition Bill had actually been passed, and that the question of whether it should be passed or not was not to be referred to the constituencies, and that the Provincial Councils were not to be consulted on the subject. That fact was carefully concealed, and the direct opposite of this was implied. And it was stated that the only object in attempting to prevent the meeting of Provincial Councils was to prevent any complications in the provincial revenues. The attention of the authorities at Home was directed to that single point. Moreover, the words used by His Excellency the Governor in his despatch were these: "That the Government had consented to postpone the actual abolition of the provincial system till after the elections, in order that the constituencies might have an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject." The clear meaning of this was, I take it—and this has been the general impression—that all the constituencies interested in the matter were to be consulted. Lord Carnarvon's reply shows that he clearly understood the matter in that light; and I venture to say that no impartial person, who sees the opinion of the Solicitor-General of New Zealand and the Law Officers of the Crown, will say that the Act was not—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him. I have been necessitated this session to point out that on occasions of this sort the adjournment of the House should only be moved in cases of urgency. On a former occasion I had to remind the House that "Unless that privilege were exercised with forbearance, the result would be fatal to the successful conduct of public business." I trust, therefore, that the House will use its discretion in the matter of moving the adjournment of the House.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I think this is a question of the utmost urgency. It is a question which involves probably the separation of two large provinces from the rest of New Zealand. It is a question which involves the consideration of whether the Government were or were not justified in using the language which is used in their memorandum to the Superintendent of Otago, language which will throw the whole of the people of the colony off their guard. Judging by that language, it must have appeared to the public at large that the Government were in possession of an opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown to the effect that the Abolition Act was not ultra vires. Now, we are told that the Government are not in possession of any opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown in England, and that they simply assume that the Abolition Act is not ultra vires through certain circumstances, I submit that the people have a right to know instantly whether the Government were justified in using the language which they did use in the memorandum. I simply wish now, as far as I am concerned, to add my entire belief that the Law Officers of the Crown in England, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, have never been consulted. I wish to say further, that, if the Government had done their duty, they would undoubtedly have consulted those Law Officers after receiving the advice which was given to them by their own Chief Justice. The urgency of this matter is clear; because it may be necessary for me, and probably for the Superintendent of Otago also, to telegraph Home that immediate action should be taken to prevent the Abolition Act from coming into force. Consequently, I hope that the question will be considered with the care which it merits. Having said this, I content myself for the present by now moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. STOUT.—Sir, I was somewhat appalled when I heard the Premier making his statement to-day. I put it to every honorable member, whether he is an Abolitionist or not, if he would not, upon reading the memorandum addressed by the Premier to the Governor, infer that the Law Officers of the Crown in London had given an expression of opinion that the Abolition Act was not ultra vires. In his memorandum to the Governor, the Premier states that Mr. Macandrew says, "he is advised that the action taken by the General Assembly, and assented to by Her Majesty, to amend the Constitution, is ultra vires." Now, that is an incorrect statement, because Her Majesty has not assented to the Abolition Act, and I cannot believe that the Premier submitted his memorandum to his law advisers. The Premier, in his reply to Mr. Macandrew's memorandum, says, "It is open for him, if he can, to convince the Courts of law that the advice he relies on is sounder than that of the Law Officers of the Crown in London and New Zealand." Well, I can only say it was known to this House and to the country that the Solicitor-General and the Chief Justice had given an opinion on the subject; and, I ask, is it not to be inferred that the Law Officers of the Crown had given an opinion? I say it is not honest to the House nor to the country to write such a misleading paragraph as this. I am surprised that the Premier, for the sake of influencing the House, the country, and the Bench in favour of the Government, should have done this. If an appeal is made to the Bench, it will immediately be said that the Law Officers of the Crown have given an opinion; and yet the Premier now gets up and says he does not know whether the Law Officers of the Crown have given an opinion or not; but he implies that they have, and at the same time he dares to assert that the advice he relies on is sounder than that of the Law Officers of the Crown in England and New Zealand.

Mr. BALLANCE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. STOUT.—I am not surprised to hear the honorable member for Rangitikei cheer such a statement as this. I notice that, in another place, a motion is to be made for the production of this opinion, if it exists. I do not think the honorable gentleman would say that, since he has been in the Executive, every Provincial Ordinance has been submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown before it has been assented to.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, always.

Mr. STOUT.—I hardly think that such has been the case. I was saying, Sir, that, in another place, a motion referring to this subject had been given notice of. I was not referring to the proceedings of another House at all. All I desire to say is, that the impression conveyed by the Premier's memorandum to His Excellency the Governor was, that the Law Officers of the Crown had given an opinion on the subject. It now turns out that no opinion has been obtained: at least the Premier says that no opinion has been obtained as far as he knows.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. STOUT.—The honorable gentleman said he knew of no such opinion having been given.

Major ATKINSON.—I did not say so.

Mr. STOUT.—Well, the honorable gentleman trusted entirely to inference. He trusted that that course would have been adopted, and that this question would have been submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown. I know it is no use to question here the power of this House to pass this Bill. A great many members have gone in for sweeping abolition, and they will pass anything under that cry, whether they have power to do it or not; but the least the Government could have done would have been to submit the question to the Law Officers of the Crown in London, who should also have been informed that doubts had been raised as to the power of this Assembly to pass such an Act. But that was not done. However, one need not be surprised at a memorandum of this character. There have been other Bills passed in an equally objectionable way. The Provincial Appropriations Extension Act was, in my opinion, wrongly passed, and all the money paid under it has been illegally paid. That Act has been again extended for three months; and I can only express my opinion that it will be found that, although the Assembly may have power to abolish the provinces, yet there are sections of the Constitution Act that this Assembly has no power to repeal. That is clearly laid down in section 4 of the Imperial Act of 1862. It was plainly intended by the Imperial Parliament that this Assembly should not have power to repeal all the provisions of the Constitution Act relative to Provincial Councils. This House, however, has presumed that it has power, and I only hope it may be able to prove it in the law-courts of this colony or those of Great Britain. Be that as it may, the meaning of this memorandum is clear. It tells the Governor that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in London has been taken, whereas the Premier himself now tells us that it has not been taken.

Mr. BOWEN.—This discussion is somewhat irregular; but I must express my surprise that an honorable gentleman who is an officer of the Supreme Court should say that it is possible that the Supreme Court could be influenced in its decisions by any memorandum issued by the Government. If the honorable gentleman will consult such authorities as are available here, he will find that there is a very distinct course laid down at Home for dealing with Bills sent Home from the colonies. They go through a very careful investigation, and are submitted to the law officers not only of one department, but to those of several departments, before the Queen gives her assent to them or leaves them to their operation. Therefore the Government are perfectly justified in saying, when a Bill has been left to its operation, that it has been considered by the Law Officers of the Crown, and is in conformity with law. The honorable gentleman assumes that, where no distinct legal opinion has been obtained from the Law Officers, it must follow that there has been negligence on their part, or that they are not responsible, or that the Crown at Home may have allowed Bills to pass through which were absolutely illegal. I do not think the House or the country will believe such a thing as that of the Law Officers of the Crown in England. The matter may be tested in any way the honorable gentleman likes. I believe it will be found that the Colonial Office is exceedingly careful, and does not allow Bills to pass in such a careless manner as he supposes.

Mr. REES.—The doctrine laid down by the honorable gentleman in relation to the passing of Acts would hold good if the two years during which Acts are left to their operation had expired. It is a maxim of law, that things once done are rightly done; but when a thing is done without any declaration, either on the part of the Queen or her Law Officers, the Queen has power, even up to the last day of the two years, to dissent from an Act, if advised to do so by her Ministers. But the honorable gentleman fought shy of this correspondence between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago (Mr. Macandrew), in which the Ministry wish the House and the country to assume, in the first place, that Her Majesty has assented to the Act, and, in the second, that the Law Officers of the Crown in London have stated their opinion that it is not ultra vires. I ask honorable members to look at the correspondence and say if that is not the case. And yet they knew all the time that the Queen had not assented to the Act. Now, Sir, I say there is such a thing as public honor. When a gentleman makes a statement as a Minister of the Crown, the very limit to which that statement can be stretched is taken to be the exact limit of truth. But this is an absolute untruth. The Queen has not assented to this Abolition Act. In the first place, she has no power to do so; in the second place, she was never asked to do so; and in the third place, she has not done so;—and yet Major Atkinson has submitted to His Excellency the Governor a memorandum which states that Her Majesty has assented to the Act. Sir, this compromises the honor of the Crown. All that binds the colony to the Crown is a sentiment of honor; and yet we have a Minister of the Crown, whose duty it is to advise His Excellency the Governor, telling him that the Queen has assented to the Abolition Act, when she has done nothing of the sort! We know that the influence of such a statement is very great. People will say at once, "The Queen has assented to the Act. The Law Officers and the Cabinet, who are responsible to the people of England, have advised her to do so; and if she has been advised to assent and has assented, that is clear proof that the Assembly had power to pass the Act." And so they put it to the country, although they are well aware that the people know very little about these matters, that they are bound to accept the assertions of the people in authority, persons who should only state that which has the ring of truth, and should not make statements which they know are calculated to mislead. Such a thing ought not to be tolerated. No persons are fit to be Ministers of the Crown who, in such matters as these, would create false impressions in the minds of the people. They say, "It is open for him (Mr. Macandrew), if he can, to convince the Courts of law that the advice he relies upon is sounder than that of the Law Officers of the Crown in London and New Zealand." Now, putting aside altogether the fact that the only advice they obtained in New Zealand was the advice of the Solicitor-General, who is not a responsible Minister, but merely a Law Officer of the Crown in the sense that he is a Civil servant, they fortify their position with this absurd statement, as far as its influence upon the public mind is concerned, that the Law Officers of the Crown in London have stated that this Act is not ultra vires. I was not at all surprised when the Premier stated, in answer to the honorable member for the Thames, that the Government were not in possession of any such statement. We have heard of these legal opinions before—legal opinions that never existed. But they say now that they only assume that such an opinion has been given; and I ask the House whether it is right to assume that the Attorney-General and the Law Officers in England have given an opinion upon points of which they are not even aware. They might assume anything else in the world if they assume that; and when the honorable member for the Thames asks if such an opinion has been given, they say, "No, we don't know that such an opinion has been given."

Major ATKINSON.—We do not say so.

Mr. REES.—That is simply another equivocation. The Premier says they do not say so. Will he state positively that such an opinion has been given? The honorable gentlemen say, as they might say in answer to a question in algebra, they do not know that it is not wrong; but will they say that it is right? I ask the honorable gentleman now whether, when he penned that memorandum to the Governor, he did not wish the people to believe that they had the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in London? No man would say such a thing unless he wished to create such an impression. They had the opinion of the Solicitor-General of New Zealand, and they put the two together, simply giving precedence to the name of the Law Officers in London, to give the thing weight. They plainly state now, however, that no such opinion has ever been given. I say they do not know, and they cannot contradict me. They are obliged to be silent. They do not know as a fact, and all the reason they have for believing that such an opinion has been given is, that it has been stated by Lord Carnarvon that Her Majesty will not be now advised to withhold her assent to this Act. But Her Majesty may be advised to dissent from it before the two years are up, and I think it very probable that she will be advised, and strongly advised, to dissent from this Act. If it is found that 200,000 of the people of this colony wish it, and that a correspondence like this is passing between the Superintendent and a Governor, that Her Majesty's Ministers are actually guilty of equivocation and are pledging the Governor's name to equivocation in this way, Lord Carnarvon and the other Ministers will be more likely to advise Her Majesty to refuse her assent. If such means are necessary to bolster up a Ministry in this or in any colony or any community whatever, there must be something wrong behind it. What binds the people to a Government? Only a sentiment of perfect trust and obedience. What do the people care for the Governor or the Ministry of the day, or the Parliament or the Crown, but as they feel they are a portion of the Empire, that that Empire is bound to be governed justly and strictly, and that they are to gain some advantage by being a portion of the body politic? If they find Ministers are to commit actual equivocation, which amongst men of honor would be considered actual untruth, I would like to know what confidence there can be amongst the people under such a Government as that? If the great provinces of Otago and Auckland are to be treated in this way, is it possible that any Government can stand, or that any community can stand, the very existence of the Government in which is based upon such statements as those contained in this memorandum submitted for His Excellency's consideration? This is a most serious matter. It amounts to this, that the people of the colony cannot believe what the Government say; and when the Premier gives advice to the Governor, the people cannot believe that he means what he says, but that he is only making use of words in order to cloak the meaning of what he states—that the real simple meaning of what he states in his correspondence with the Governor and with Superintendents is not to be taken in the ordinary acceptation of language. I would ask the House to consider this matter. Sir, it is a serious matter in relation to the good faith and belief of the people, and their trust in the honor of the Government. If a Government is only to be supported by things of this sort, I would like to ask how a Government can be expected to stand. There will come a time when the people will no longer submit to it, and I do not think that time is very far distant now. I think the Government ought to be very much obliged to the honorable member for the Thames for bringing the question up. I am sure that Otago will see that the answer made by the Government to Mr. Macandrew's despatch amounts to this: that they make two false statements—first of all, that the Abolition Act has been assented to by Her Majesty, which is false; and, secondly, that they have been advised by the Law Officers of the Crown in London that it is not ultra vires, which is also false; and if the Government of the country is to be based upon falsehood, that Government will not last long.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, the honorable member states that two things in the Premier's memorandum to His Excellency are false; but if the honorable member had read a little further, he would have seen that the Premier distinctly and correctly states the position in which the Abolition Act now stands. It states,—

"Mr. Macandrew prays that your Excellency will withhold the Queen's assent from any action of the Colonial Parliament having for its object the giving effect to the Abolition Bill, in as far as Otago is concerned. He appears to forget that the Abolition Act is now law; has been left to its operation by Her Majesty, and will come into force without further legislative action."

Why did the honorable member altogether shut out this? The honorable gentleman took up the next paragraph, which is this:—

"Mr. Macandrew says he is advised that the action taken by the General Assembly, and assented to by Her Majesty, to amend the Constitution, is ultra vires. It is open for him, if he can, to convince the Courts of law that the advice he relies on is sounder than that of the Law Officers of the Crown in London and New Zealand."

Every one knows, and the honorable member knows, that the Governor has assented to the Abolition Act on behalf of Her Majesty, and in Her Majesty's name. The Act has been left by Her Majesty to its operation, and Her Majesty has assented to it through the Governor, who holds her delegated authority for the purpose. It appears to me that my honorable friend is making a great deal out of nothing at all; and, as far as I have been able to understand the matter, it is perfectly clear and plain, and this is the position in which the Act stands: it has been left by Her Majesty to its operation. That is precisely what has been done, and that is what is done generally with the Acts that are passed in New Zealand. It used to be so, and I think it is so now. For many years I was in the habit of sending Home Acts, with an explanatory memorandum. The Acts are sent for submission to the Secretary of State and to the Home authorities. I have always understood the practice to be as laid down in "Clark on Colonial Law":—

"The Acts of the session are referred by the Secretary of State to the Counsel for the Colonial Department, who is required to 'report his opinion upon them in point of law.' By this established form of expression is understood to be meant that the Counsel is to report whether the Acts respectively are such as, consistently with his commission and instructions, the Governor was authorized to pass; whether, in the language of the statute, any part of them is repugnant to the laws of England, or to any law made in this kingdom, so far as such law may mention or refer to the Plantations, and whether they are respectively so framed as to give full and entire effect to the purposes for which they may have been passed by the Colonial Legislature. In pursuance of this reference, a report is made to the Secretary of State for the Colonies by the Counsel to his department. The Acts, accompanied by this report, are then transmitted to the President of the Council, with a letter from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, desiring his Lordship to lay the Acts and the report before the King in Council for His Majesty's consideration. At the first Board of Council which is held after receiving this communication, the Acts are referred to the Lords of the Committee of Council for the Affairs of Trade and Plantations, who are directed to report to the King in Council their opinion as to the proceedings it may be proper to take in relation to them. It is understood that the Committee of Trade proceed to select from the Acts thus referred to them all such as present any point of peculiar novelty or importance, or as give rise to any question of legal difficulty. The Acts thus selected, together with all private Acts, are referred by their Lordships to His Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor General for their opinion. When the report of the Law Officers of the Crown is obtained, the Lords of the Committee of Trade enter into the consideration of all the Acts of the session of the particular colony; and it is understood to be a settled rule that, in their deliberations upon this subject, they are assisted by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in his capacity of a member of the Committee. A report from the Committee of Trade is then addressed to the King in Council, and in this report all the Acts of the session of the Colonial Assembly are classed under three heads. First, if it is thought proper to disallow any Act, the report contains a full statement of the grounds of the objection which may exist to it. Secondly, if any of the Acts relate to measures of general and peculiar importance and interest, it is recommended that a special Order in Council should pass for the confirmation of them. Thirdly, the great majority of the Acts of each year being usually little more than business of routine and continual recurrence, their Lordships are in the habit of advising that such Acts 'should be left to their operation.'"

That statement is founded on a report of Commissioners in reference to the West India Islands at a time when they were governed not exactly as they are at present; but it is the course, I believe, always followed when Acts are sent from a Colonial Legislature to England. I ask, looking at that, whether or not the statement in this memorandum, that the Act has been left to its operation by Her Majesty, is not in the precise words of the despatch, and the words used upon all occasions of this kind. I do not think any statement in the memorandum is incorrect or inaccurate. It does not mean that the Queen has specifically given her assent, for her assent in that way was not required; but she did give her assent through the Governor, who holds her delegated authority for that purpose. Therefore it appears to me that the memorandum is strictly correct, and it is not open to all this criticism which the honorable member for Auckland City East has thought proper to pass upon it. With respect to the statement as to the provincial laws not being submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown here, all I can say is that, during the several years I held office as Law Adviser to the Crown, not an Act passed by a Provincial Legislature was ever allowed to go without being submitted to me for my opinion. I am not aware that any alteration has taken place in this respect. I was not aware that this discussion was coming on, or I would have prepared myself with information on this point; but, if I understand rightly, precisely the same course is pursued now as when I was Law Adviser to the Crown. The same process is gone through by the Colonial Government as regards the Acts of the Provincial Councils as is gone through by the Imperial Government as regards the Acts passed by this Assembly. As regards the legality of the Act itself, the matter stands thus: A question was raised as to whether the Act is ultra vires: and the then Attorney-General, the present Chief Justice, gave an opinion that it was not ultra vires—that it was competent for the Assembly to pass such an Act; but he suggested that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England should be taken, and, so far as I understand the matter, that was not done; but it has been submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown in the usual way that Colonial Acts are submitted to them upon all occasions. The Acts are sent to the Secretary of State, and are first submitted to the Counsel of that department, and they are then submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown. The Solicitor-General of New Zealand gave his opinion to the same effect. I presume, in the usual course, the Abolition Act was submitted to the Counsel for the Colonial Department, and to the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General. That is the authority which exists at present in favour of the validity of the Act. On the other hand, let us see what is the authority against it. The honorable member for the Thames gives his opinion most distinctly, certainly, that it is ultra vires; but the honorable member is not a lawyer, although his opinion may be as good as a lawyer's. I now come to the honorable and learned member for Dunedin. I am not aware whether he has given a legal opinion upon the subject or not; but what I have heard him say in this House has been as a matter of argument, and not as a legal opinion. I am not aware whether he is now prepared to submit his opinion to the House; at all events, I do not understand that he has given any such opinion up to the present time. I am not aware whether he wishes to give, or is prepared to give, such an opinion. It is not his duty to do so, and he is perfectly right if he pleases only to argue it. When we come to the question of the authorities themselves who have given distinct opinions upon the subject, we find that the honorable member for Dunedin City, simply as a matter of argument as I understood it, stated that the Act is ultra vires. The honorable member for Auckland City East has spoken in precisely the same way. He has not staked his professional reputation upon an opinion as to whether this Act is ultra vires or not. He has a perfect right to argue out the matter in the way he has done. The honorable member for the Thames has given his opinion that the Act is ultra vires; but the other two honorable gentlemen have only argued the question, and have not given an opinion upon which they would stake their reputation on this matter. On the one side we have the absolute and direct opinion of the Solicitor-General of New Zealand and the Attorney-General of New Zealand—the present Chief Justice, and inferentially the opinions of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General in England, through the despatch of the Secretary of State, that the Act is valid. We all know that when Acts sent Home are considered to be ultra vires, the Secretary of State invariably points out in what respect they are ultra vires; that he states the opinion of the Law Officers; and that then such Acts are disallowed, or, when the objectionable matter is not important, are directed to be amended. If there was anything ultra vires in this Act, the same course would have been followed; if illegal, the Act would have been disallowed, and the usual course would have been adopted in regard to it. We have, therefore, a fair right to infer that all authority at present is in favour of the Act, and that there is no authority, as far as I can understand, except the opinion of the honorable member for the Thames, in any shape or way against it. The other honorable gentlemen have a perfect right to argue this question as they have done; but, as I understand, they have not given any opinion that would involve their professional reputation that this Act is ultra vires. If they had given such an opinion, I admit that there would have been something stronger in favour of the view taken by them that the Act was ultra vires. Against the opinion of the honorable member for the Thames, we have the opinion of the Law Officers of New Zealand, and inferentially the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown at Home, upon which this House is fairly entitled to consider that the Act is not ultra vires, and that we have a perfect right to proceed upon it as a valid law.

Mr. REES.—The honorable gentleman misunderstood me altogether. I spoke of the Governor as being part of the General Assembly, and not as Her Majesty's Representative. When the term "General Assembly" is used, it means both Houses of the Assembly and the Governor. What is meant by the assent of Her Majesty is the absolute assent of the Queen, not by the Governor, but by herself. In relation to the other point as to whether I gave an opinion or not, I have only to say that I have already given my opinion plainly, in the House and outside of the House, that the Act is ultra vires.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—This question presents itself to my mind as one of considerable importance and urgency indeed; and although there are a large number of important motions on the Order Paper, some of which stand in my own name, I am willing that they should lie over, for I think this is a matter which should be settled. We must bear in mind that in the course of a few weeks the Abolition Act, the legality or illegality of which we are now discussing, will come into force throughout the colony. We should consider this fact: that when this question was raised in 1874, the Government of the day were distinctly warned that they were going to take an illegal step, and yet they allowed a twelve-month to go by without asking for the opinion of the Law Officers at Home upon the point. In 1875 they were again warned that their Act was illegal and still they have allowed another year to pass without taking steps to settle this matter. Their conduct in this matter has not been fair or just. How easy it would have been for them to have asked for and obtained that opinion by telegraph. What did they do within the last few months? They sent Home an unfair representation of the position of affairs in this colony. If they had received a distinct legal decision upon the question, it was their bounden duty to have directed the attention of the Home Government to it. If, on a question which is distasteful to a large majority of the people of this colony, and to a very respectable minority of members of this House, who were of opinion that the Act was contrary to law, they had obtained an express legal opinion that the Act was valid, they would have had some foundation for the statement they made in reply to the Superintendent of Otago. As to giving my opinion on this question, I have too much respect for the law of the Postmaster-General to rashly call it in question; but I observed particularly that throughout the honorable gentleman's speech he did not state what was his opinion of the law upon this subject. He told us that the honorable member for Auckland City East and the honorable member for Dunedin said so-and-so, and that the honorable member for the Thames had given an opinion; but he himself abstained from saying, and would not say to the House, that the Act of last session was a good and valid law. The case quoted by the honorable member from Clark's "Colonial Law" is not applicable to the present case, inasmuch as the practice then was different from the practice followed at the present time. When an Act is reserved for Her Majesty's assent, the Governor has no power to assent to it; and if the Governor assents to Acts on her behalf, she has the option of disallowing them if she thinks proper. The 58th section of the Constitution Act states as follows:—"Whenever any Bill, which shall have been presented for Her Majesty's assent to the Governor, shall by such Governor have been assented to in Her Majesty's name, he shall, by the first convenient opportunity, transmit to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State an authentic copy of such Bill as assented to;" and then the clause goes on to state that "it shall be lawful, at any time within two years after such Bill shall have been received by the Secretary of State, for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to declare her disallowance of such Bill." With regard to what has taken place in reference to this Act at Home, the position which the Hon. the Postmaster-General takes up is this: that the Act has gone Home—that it has gone through the ordinary routine of Acts sent Home for inspection and approval of the Crown; and because we have not heard that this Act is ultra vires, we are entitled to say that it is good and valid. Well, after some years' experience as a Provincial Officer, I can state that Acts of the Provincial Council of Auckland have always been subjected to the revision of the Law Officers of the colony in Wellington. What has happened? Many of these laws that have been passed by the Attorney-General have subsequently been declared to be ultra vires in the Supreme Court of the colony. This very law, upon which we are now building up abolition, although passed by the Law Officers of the Crown, might be found, if tested before the proper and competent tribunal at Home, to be absolutely bad, notwithstanding that Her Majesty had not been advised to disallow it. We all know what it is to take the opinion of counsel upon a statement of facts made out in our own favour, as this case has been made out in favour of the view taken by Ministers, and the value to attach to such an opinion. We all know that an opinion on any point of law given in this House is not of the same value as a statement of opinion in any case given by a competent legal tribunal. When I took up the papers containing the telegrams that passed between the Superintendent of Otago and the Governor, I came to the conclusion at once that the Government had obtained absolutely the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown at Home to the effect that the Abolition Act was not ultra vires, but one which this Assembly was competent to pass. Those telegrams have gone all over the country, and they have been read by every intelligent person. The Government have falsely represented to the people of the colony that the Act is not ultra vires—that such was the advice given by the Law Officers of the Crown. That is not a fair kind of tactics for the Government to adopt. Let us have fair-play. If the question is not settled, the Government have no right to say that it is settled. The explanation given by the Hon. the Postmaster-General would come well from a person acting as a special pleader—if pleading specially to a declaration before you, Sir, sitting here as Judge of the Supreme Court, you are asked to decide a thing not upon its merits or justice, but upon technicalities. What is the position taken up by the Superintendent of Otago? He says, "I have gone from the Assembly, and I intend to test the legality of the Act under which it is sought to abolish the Province of Otago." What should have been the attitude of the Government? They were bound by every possible obligation to have answered him carefully and correctly. But what do they say? They inform Mr. Macandrew that the Queen has assented to this law. That statement is untrue. They tell Mr. Macandrew that his law is not of equal value to that of the Law Officers of the Crown at Home, and the Law Officers here. They have not yet got the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown at Home.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They don't want it.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—There are some men who require neither law nor reason, but simply require to belong to that body which will exercise brute force—that will overcome every argument, oppose justice, and carry out its decision in the face of reason and prudence. No doubt my honorable friend thinks it a great waste of time to consider a question of this kind. They look at the Abolition Act not in regard to the effect which it will have upon the morals and well-being of the people, but as to its effect upon the revenue. I am sorry, indeed, that the Government should have so far departed from what I consider fair party warfare as in the first instance to have sent a one-sided statement of facts to Her Majesty at home, and subsequently, in reply to the Superintendent of Otago, to have made statements that were not warranted by facts. The people who read the telegrams will now be of opinion that the question as to the validity of the Act has been raised at Home and definitely settled. Well, it is possible that this Act may have gone through the ordeal of inspection at Home and been approved by the Law Officers of the Crown, and yet, before a competent tribunal, it might be held to be bad in law.

Mr. WHITAKER.—The honorable gentleman says that I expressed no opinion myself—that I carefully evaded the question as to whether this Act was ultra vires or not. Now, looking at the authorities there were on the subject, I did not wish to obtrude my opinion on the House. As the honorable member has challenged me to say what I think on this subject, I say that, after the most careful and deliberate consideration of the matter during the last twelve months, I have come clearly to the conclusion that the Act is not ultra vires.

Sir G. GREY.—I wish to say a few words in reply. I wish to know in what way the statements put forth by the Government can reach the public.

Mr. MANDERS.—I ask whether the honorable member is in order in addressing the House. The honorable gentleman has, with something like a surprise motion, introduced one of those constitutional subjects which require careful consideration. The honorable gentleman is going to reply to arguments on a motion for the adjournment of the House. I ask you, Sir, whether that is in order or not.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member, in my opinion, is in order. When a motion for adjournment supersedes another as an amendment, there is no right of reply; but when it is a substantive motion, as at present, there is a right of reply. These, however, are motions that ought to be used very sparingly indeed.

Sir G. GREY.—I beg to say a very few words in reply. I think a most unfair impression has been created throughout the entire country upon the subject of the validity of the Abolition Act. In the whole course of my experience, I cannot recollect anything equally unfair, looking at the magnitude of the question at issue. A distinct statement is made that Her Majesty the Queen assented to this Act; and not only that, but that assertion has to be read in connection with the statement that, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown at Home, the action of the Assembly in regard to the Abolition Act was not ultra vires. Both of those statements were absolutely untrue. I regret to use those words; but Her Majesty has not assented to the Act, and the Law Officers of the Crown have given no such opinion. In every village of New Zealand by this time, by the aid of the telegraph, those positive statements by the Government have been made known to the inhabitants. It is now extremely difficult to eradicate the impressions made on their minds, and we have no hope of eradicating them, because we cannot send telegrams throughout the country in the manner the Government can. I consider, therefore, that this was a matter of the most extreme urgency, and I conceive we were quite justified in bringing the subject before the House. I am sure that every person who possesses a fair mind will think that the position in which we have been placed is most unfair and most unfortunate. I really hardly know in what language I should properly characterize the action which has been taken to create a wrong impression throughout the whole of New Zealand, and to obtain adherents to a cause which I think would otherwise have been a falling one. I believe, Sir, that in raising this question I have thoroughly done my duty. I believe that the House has never before completely understood the position of the Queen in reference to these Acts. If the Governor had not assented to the Act—if, as I believe it was his bounden duty to do, he had reserved the Act for Her Majesty's assent—I believe the validity of the law would have been tested. The question would have been raised whether or not the Queen could be properly advised to assent to such a law, and whether or not it was ultra vires for the Assembly to pass that Act. But no such question was raised. The Governor assented in the Queen's name. Neither the Governor nor the Solicitor-General made a candid or true statement of the object and intentions of the Act, the position of the population of the colony, or of what had taken place.

Major ATKINSON.—I understand the honorable gentleman said the Governor did not make a candid statement. I take it that that is language which ought not to be used in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member is not in order in referring to the Governor in that direct manner. I took occasion, in a former debate, to check an honorable member who referred in the same direct manner to the proceedings in another branch of the Legislature. The same principle ought to guide us in reference to the action of the Governor of the colony, who is guided by his Responsible Advisers.

Sir G. GREY.—Then I will say that His Excellency was not advised to make that full and candid statement which it was imperative upon him to have made when the question of the Constitution of the country was at stake. That is my deliberate opinion. I say, therefore, that the House should recollect that what took place was this: that the Governor having been advised to give his assent to this law without referring it to the Queen, the law was left to its operation; and Her Majesty's Advisers, knowing that at any time within two years representations could be made of the unwillingness of the subjects of this country to submit to it, thought there was no necessity for such supervision of the law as is exercised where the law is submitted for the Queen's assent. And I say there was nothing in the despatches sent Home containing this law, nothing in the opinion of the Solicitor-General in reference to it which was at the same time sent Home, which raised any one of the real points at issue—any one of the points which had been debated in this Assembly, and which had been agitating the minds of the entire country. I contend that all those points ought to have been raised, and fairly submitted to the authorities at Home. We have been told—and I was very glad to hear the statement made—that even in the case of laws made by Provincial Councils, which were submitted to Crown Law Officers appointed by this Assembly, and approved of by them as being lawful, upon questions being brought before the Supreme Court it was found in some cases that those laws were ultra vires. And I believe myself that even if the Law Officers of the Crown had been consulted upon the Abolition Act, it would hereafter be admitted, upon appeal to the Supreme Court, and ultimately to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that this House had no power whatever to pass the Abolition Act. The Hon. the Postmaster-General made frequent sarcastic references to my having given the opinion that the Abolition Act was ultra vires; that I was no lawyer; and that no lawyers had given that opinion. I believe myself that he knew well that one eminent Judge was of that opinion, and he did not tell the House that fact.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I did not know of it.

Sir G. GREY.—I am surprised to hear that statement. I believe the honorable gentleman is the only member coming from the Auckland Province, or at all events from the vicinity of the city of Auckland, who does not know that. I believe that is the case; and many other lawyers in the country hold that opinion, as well as other lawyers out of the country. The honorable gentleman knew that the Chief Justice himself admitted there was such a doubt that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England should be taken. All those facts were omitted by the honorable gentleman, who made one of the most wandering and garrulous speeches in reference to the subject that I ever heard.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Is the honorable member speaking of his own speech? Because, if he is, I quite agree with him.

Sir G. GREY.—I have simply to affirm what I have said as the fact. I still hope that the Government will take some means to have telegraphed to other parts of the country besides Wellington the fact of the admission they this day made, that they are in possession of no opinion, no correspondence, no advice from the Law Officers of the Crown in England to the effect that the action taken by the General Assembly in regard to the Abolition Act was not ultra vires, and will, at the same time, communicate to the whole of the inhabitants of New Zealand in the same rapid way that Her Majesty the Queen has not assented to the Abolition Act, and that they have committed a gross wrong in permitting the Governor to forward a statement of that kind under his own name and with all the authority of his office.

Motion for the adjournment of the House negatived.

PRESS TELEGRAMS.

Mr. JOYCE said the motion standing in his name was not of very wide-spread importance, or rather, was confined in its interest to a comparatively small section of the community. He would, therefore, be as brief as possible in explaining his reasons for placing it on the Order Paper. They were these: There were two sections of the Press using the telegraph, but there was a difference in the charges levied on these two sections of 50 per cent. Any papers receiving their telegrams during the day had to pay twice as much as those which received theirs during the night. Incidental to that was this other fact: that the papers which received their telegrams during the night received practically an unlimited number of words, whereas those receiving them during the day were restricted to a comparatively small number. The effect of this was, in the first instance, to give a very handsome bonus to one section of that trade—if he might so designate it—and, in the next, to give it trade advantages, to a very high degree, over its competitors, as he might call those papers published in the evening. The objection to the uniformity of tariff was, he understood, that the pressure upon the Telegraphic Department during the day was so great that it would be unable to overtake the work if the evening papers were allowed to have their telegrams transmitted in equal numbers to those transmitted at night. As, however, telegrams were transmitted during the night to an almost unlimited extent, it might be argued that, if the officers employed during the night were employed during the day, so as to give the same advantages to all, there would be no real difficulty. There must be double the number of operators employed to convey those messages sent during the night; and if these were placed on the day staff there would be very little difficulty in overtaking the work. If there were such a difficulty, it might be obviated by keeping the offices open for an hour or two later in the afternoon, and it would be also possible to limit the hour at night at which telegrams might be sent. At present, he understood telegrams were not unfrequently being transmitted throughout the whole night. That must bear very hardly upon the department; and he felt certain, if the staff were employed during the day, there would be no difficulty in overtaking the work. An illustration of the differential tariff now levied might be found in the Customs Department. Supposing there were two importers in the same line of business, and the Government were to say to one of them, "If you will pay your duties during the night, we will take off 50 per cent.," would not that be to give him a great advantage, so that he would be able to undersell his competitor? For, after all, these words telegraphed to newspapers were practically merchandise, and the paper which had 50 per cent. taken off the charge got so much advantage over its competitor. It might be possible to arrange this matter satisfactorily to both parties, by somewhat limiting the number of words allowed during the day, as well as those allowed during the night. He had seen what he thought almost an abuse of this freedom of transmitting telegrams at night. He had seen thousands of words needlessly transmitted during the night, the transmission of which must have kept the whole department at work, and necessitated the keeping up all night of many young persons, who, in the hope of getting better paid, were not unwilling to do work the consequences of which must be very prejudicial to them.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable the charges for Press telegrams should be uniform."

—(Mr. Joyoe.)

Mr. WHITAKER would like to place honorable members precisely in possession of the state of this matter at present. With regard to the proposal of the honorable member, he would point out that, if carried, it would exactly do away with what he wanted to arrive at, as it merely asked that the charges for Press telegrams should be uniform. The real fact of the matter was, that the only exception in favour of any portion of the Press was in favour of the evening papers, and all other papers were on an equal footing with each other. Press telegrams sent between the hours of eight a.m. and five p.m. were charged half ordinary rates; and from five p.m. to the time when the offices closed, the charges were, for the first 25 words 6d., and for every 25 words in addition 3d., or at the rate of 1s. 3d. for 100 words. The evening papers had precisely the same privileges as the morning papers, because they could send during the day telegrams in the same way as morning papers. They could both send telegrams at half the price charged to the public, and had the additional privilege of sending them at a lower rate during the night. The point of the matter was this: that it did not suit the evening papers to send their telegrams between the hours of five and eight p.m., because their publication took place at five o'clock. They therefore could not avail themselves of the cheaper rates in the evening which the other papers enjoyed. In order to meet that difficulty, a special exemption had been made in favour of the evening papers, and they were allowed during the business hours of the day to send 200 words at the same rate as the evening telegrams were transmitted. Under all the circumstances, he thought 200 words were sufficient; but in the case of mails from Australia or England, the evening papers were allowed to receive an additional 200 words, making 400 in all at the cheaper rate. This was a privilege the morning papers did not enjoy. As regarded the Press generally, he might say that the Press in New Zealand was more favoured in this respect than the Press in any other colony, or in England. For the information of the House he would read the charges made in other countries. In England the charge was, by day, 75 words for 1s., and by night 100 words for 1s. In Victoria, between the hours of half-past eight a.m. and six p.m., 10 words for 6d., and 1d. every additional word—very nearly the same as in New Zealand, except that we sent 12 words instead of 10 for the same price. Between six p.m. and eight p.m., 100 words and under, 1s. 6d.—in New Zealand 1s. 3d.—and every additional 50 words and under, 6d. The difference in Victoria was that the office was open for one hour in the day for evening papers—between one and two o'clock p.m.—whereas in New Zealand there was no limitation as to the time, and they could send 200 words at any hour during the day. That was a privilege not accorded in Victoria. In South Australia charges were, for the first 10 words 6d., every additional word 1d., and there was an exemption whatever. The Press of South Australia had therefore to pay precisely what the paid here during the day, but had no privi- a lower charge between five p.m. and eight p.m. In Queensland the charge was, for the first 10 words 1s., and for every additional word that the papers had to pay the full rates, and no privileges as in New Zealand. In New Wales also the rate was 1s. for the first 10 words and 1d. for every additional word, or more double the rates charged in New Zealand. Consequently the Press of New Zealand had more privileges than the Press of any other colony quite as great as that in England. He would object to increase the number of words that be sent during the day, were it not that he was informed by the department that it would much interfere with the business of the general public. The evening papers had the same privileges as the morning papers in sending telegrams at night, and had the additional privilege of sending 200 words at reduced rates during the ordinary occasions, 400 words when the English or Australian mails arrived, and 500 during the session of the General Assembly. On the whole, he thought the House would come to the conclusion that, as the matter stood at present, the papers received all they were justly and lawfully entitled to. He therefore hoped the motion would not be passed.

Mr. REES was surprised and grieved to hear the honorable member for Waikato state, as a reason why additional privileges should not be granted to the Press in New Zealand, that the Press was better treated than the Press elsewhere.

Mr. WHITAKER had objected on account of the interference with the business of the general public.

Mr. REES thought it would not interfere with the public business in the slightest degree. The public would get far more information regard to public occurrences by giving the Press an advantage to the Press than by any other means. It was the Press which conveyed all news throughout the country; and he was sure the House could not do better than throw open an avenue to the Press, so as to enable it to convey news concerning markets and politics and literature and everything else throughout the country. He trusted that the House would not be misled in a matter of this sort by what was called the interest of the public. It was private business, not public business, that would be interfered with if there was any interference. If the business of private individuals was interfered with, the number of telegraph officers be increased. It was only a matter of expense. If the Press was exercising any influence on public opinion by thoroughly informing the people on all subjects, there ought to be a larger staff of officers employed, so that private interests should not be interfered with. But private interest should not interfere with public interest, and the interest of the Press was public interest. He trusted, as they hoped to make New Zealand a leader among communities, that honorable members would, in this as in other matters, give every facility for the circulation of public opinion. They could never give them that more efficiently than by having free intercommunication of ideas, and intelligence of all social and political movements that were going on. He hoped the Government would not oppose the measure, and that the House would see that it was necessary to allow the Press to receive as much news as possible at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. MURRAY said that, although he did not agree with the motion, yet he did not think that if it were carried it would be so advantageous to the Press as some honorable members seemed to think. While on the subject, he might say that he found on inquiry that the Press telegrams for last year only amounted to £6,988, and that the loss upon the Telegraph Department was £19,477 a year. He thought that a great deal of money was wasted on Government telegrams. During the past twelve months, the cost of the Government telegrams alone had been £16,154 6s., as against £48,000 a year derived from the public at large. Thus, one-third of the whole number of the telegrams were sent by the Government. He found that the Native Department alone sent telegrams to the value of £3,609 14s. a year. He would suggest to the Government that each department should be charged with the amount of its expenditure in telegrams, and that that amount should be voted by Parliament.

Mr. MANDERS said he was deeply sensible as to the views which were held by the proprietors of the Dunedin evening papers on this subject at all events—namely, that they should be allowed to receive messages on the same terms as the morning papers, and he was sure those views were shared in by the proprietors of all evening papers throughout the colony. As he understood the matter, the objection of the Hon. the Postmaster-General to the motion was that, if it were carried, there would be so great a pressure on the wires that the public would be inconvenienced. He was quite certain that the evening papers might be allowed the same privilege as the morning ones—to the extent of 500 words per day, at all events. Even if this privilege were granted, he did not believe that every evening paper in the colony would take advantage of it when Parliament was not sitting. He had no doubt that the opposition which was offered to the motion was regulated by the experience of a very recent date. The motion was very vaguely worded. It merely said, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable the charges for Press telegrams should be uniform." The real question at issue was not made apparent in the motion. That question was whether the evening papers should have the privilege of receiving 500 words at the rates which they at present paid. It was, after all, but a question of extending to the evening papers the privilege granted to the morning papers. Speaking as one who felt interested in newspaper work, and who had made inquiries on the subject, he could say that the evening papers in Dunedin had been very fairly treated.

He hoped that the Hon. the Postmaster-General would see his way to removing his objections to the motion, and that the evening papers throughout the colony would be allowed to receive 500 words per day at the present rates.

Mr. BARFF said he had had very considerable experience in connection with both morning and evening newspapers, and he must say that the proprietors of evening papers throughout the colony felt themselves aggrieved at not having received the same advantages that the morning papers had. With regard to what the Hon. the Postmaster-General had said about the evening papers receiving information at low rates, he might be allowed to say that such information was frequently not worth what it cost. He could say from experience that the telegrams, which were hurriedly sent to the newspapers as a rule—he meant the ordinary Press telegrams—often came through in such a form that a man required to be specially trained before he could understand what they meant. A person might read them backwards or forwards; but unless he had had special training, he would not be able to make head or tail of them. He had, unfortunately, wasted an immense amount of time in deciphering those telegrams; consequently he was able to express an opinion regarding them. He was not surprised that the honorable member for Bruce objected to the motion. If he was not mistaken, a morning newspaper published in the district represented by the honorable gentleman had been threatened with an action for copying telegrams from other papers without having paid for them, and without even having acknowledged the source from which they were derived.

Mr. MURRAY wished to observe that he had no connection with any newspaper.

Mr. BARFF had not said that the honorable gentleman was connected with the newspaper in question, or any other. It was even possible that he never read that paper. He had merely said that a paper published in the district which the honorable member represented had been threatened with an action for copying telegrams for which it had not paid. Speaking as a man who had had a large amount of experience, he said that the morning papers did copy telegrams from the evening papers. They copied them without acknowledgment, and without paying for them—they hashed them up, in fact, and reprinted them, while the evening papers had to pay a high price for them. He might possibly be wrong in what he was going to say, but he would remind honorable members, and especially those gentlemen who were connected with the Press, that at the time the alteration was made in the rate of payment in favour of the morning papers, there was a very general impression abroad that the morning papers were especially favoured in the transmission of news for a certain reason. It was believed that the Government of the day had carefully considered the politics of the morning and evening papers—one against another; and that, as the politics of the evening papers of the day were opposed to those of the existing Government, the alteration was made more as a punishment to the evening papers than as a question of policy. That impression prevailed to a very considerable extent; and he hoped that the Government would now see their way to remedying it, by putting the morning and evening papers on the same footing. He did not believe that the convenience of the public would be interfered with during the daytime if the motion was agreed to; and therefore he hoped that no opposition would be shown to it.

Mr. STOUT had one or two remarks to make with reference to this matter. He was of opinion that there should be no distinctions whatever made between the various sections of the Press. But, nevertheless, distinctions were drawn. The hours for sending Press telegrams were so arranged that the messages, as far as the evening papers were concerned, were almost perfectly useless. The morning papers had greater advantages than the evening journals. He believed that if now, when great strides had been made in the way of telegraphic communication throughout the colony—when fresh wires had been erected—the Telegraph Department would only consider the matter, there would be concessions made to the evening papers; and he thought the motion of the honorable member for Wallace should be affirmed by the House. He hoped the House would carry the motion.

Mr. REYNOLDS said it was amusing to hear honorable members calling out about retrenchment. That was a very good cry, no doubt; but he imagined that when honorable members were deeply interested in a matter, they were not so very particular about retrenchment. It was very well known that if the wires were occupied with Press messages during the daytime, it would be impossible to send other messages for the public. The Press throughout the colony had received the greatest consideration from the Telegraph Department, and he hoped the Government would set their face against granting any more concessions to it. With regard to the evening papers, he might say that after a certain hour in the day any of the papers could send telegrams at a very low rate—he believed twenty-five words for sixpence—which was very much less than the public were allowed to use the wires for. He quite agreed that it was desirable to give the Press every opportunity of obtaining and circulating the fullest information throughout the colony; but to grant further concessions would only increase the loss of the department. At present, the Telegraph Department did not pay its expenses, and therefore they should be chary in dealing more liberally with the Press in the matter of telegrams. He trusted the Government would not support the motion of the honorable member for Wallace.

Mr. JOYCE said he would reply in the shortest possible way. He thought that the Hon. the Commissioner of Telegraphs had wandered away into regions to which his motion really had no reference whatever, by referring to the Press in this and every other part of the world. The only thing that his (Mr. Joyce's) attention was directed to was this: that an exceeding unfairness existed between the two sections of the Press in this colony—that the charges made to the evening papers were much greater than those made to the morning papers. The honorable member for Port Chalmers seemed to have got thoroughly imbued with the rules of the Telegraph Department, and was apparently unable to shake them off. He appeared to have listened to what had been told him by those who were interested in the department, and had, in fact, been entirely guided by them. He had no doubt that the department, as was the custom with all departments, would wish to keep things as they were. It had been said that it would not do to send those messages during the day; but after all it was nothing but a question of another wire or so being erected, and a couple more operators being employed during the day instead of during the night. Ten times the work was done at night; and instead of its being found to be a matter of retrenchment, it cost a great deal more than the actual departmental receipts. He felt quite satisfied it would be no strain on the department to do all that was asked for by the motion.

Question put, "That the motion be agreed to;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

CLUTHA RIVER.

Mr. PYKE, in moving the motion standing in his name, assured the House he had not done so without fully considering what was implied in it. The Clutha River, which had its sources in the lakes at the extremity of the Province of Otago, was already navigated for a considerable distance, as far as the mouth of the Tuapeka River in fact; and the object of the motion was to execute a flying survey of the river above that point, so as to ascertain whether it could not be navigated farther up. That it was practicable, he had no doubt whatever. The navigation was impeded here and there by loose rocks, and there were one or two places where the navigation was impeded by rocks abutting upon the river. He was satisfied that for a small sum of money—for a less sum than could make a mile of road—the whole river would be made navigable from the sea up to the Lakes. If it could be done for a moderate sum, he thought the House would agree that it would be a desirable work to accomplish. It would save off application for railways for many years to come, and would at once establish cheap communication between the extremity of the Province of Otago and the sea-coast. He held in his hand Captain Hutton's Geological Report of the Province of Otago, in one of the Appendices of which Mr. McKerrow, Chief Surveyor, supplied the altitudes of the Clyde River. At a place called Ettrick it is only 211 feet above the sea level, and that was a point where it was proposed to construct two railways—one from Tuapeka, and one by way of Waipahi and Tapanui. This point is only sixty-five miles distant from the sea-coast, and that gives a fall of not more than three and a quarter feet per mile, and nothing prevented the river being used now for purposes of navigation but the presence of a number of loose boulders. For the next thirty-five miles, the elevation is seven feet per mile; and for the next thirteen miles it is four feet per mile. That brought them to the township of Cromwell, which was, in point of fact, 113 miles in the interior. There was every possibility of the river being made navigable, at an expense of £2,000, by the use of modern appliances, such as dynamite and nitro-glycerine. Many years ago, before these agencies were known, a survey was made by Dr. Hector; but the theory of explosion was not then fully understood, and the navigation was not proceeded with beyond the mouth of the Tuapeka River. The extreme point named was Lake Wanaka, at an altitude of 906 feet above sea level, and 148 miles from the sea-coast. Therefore he saw nothing to prevent the whole river being made navigable; and if that were done the whole of the wool and other produce of the district could be sent down by this means, and this alone would give a stimulus to the district which could not be afforded by railways for half a century to come. From Tuapeka to Beaumont, was a distance of eleven miles; and were the railway continued to that point—which might easily be done, as, with the exception of one hill, it was level country—the river boats would be brought into direct communication with the present line, as, indeed, they would also at Balclutha. There was a great scarcity of engineering books in the libraries both here and in Dunedin; but he had ascertained one fact which he would mention to the House. From Yale to New Westminster, on the Fraser River, British Columbia, was a distance of ninety-five miles, but the current was so strong that it took a steamer two days to work up, being at the rate of two knots an hour, but they could come down without steam in two hours—thus showing that the current ran at the rate of sixteen knots an hour, and that to make two knots against it the boats had to do eighteen knots. There is no part of the Clutha River where there is anything like such a current. He had always regarded that great river as an unused work, destined to perform a very important part in the settlement of the country. It was Nature's highway into the interior, and it was a great pity that the people should be making roads over mountains and railways by all kinds of circuitous routes, when Nature had already placed the means before them for gaining access to the interior. He trusted the Government would not oppose the motion. He might mention that in 1862 some miners purchased two boats, and with man-power took them up to the Clyde. If men could row boats against the current, surely there was no earthly reason why, if the impediments to navigation were removed, steamboats should not go up there also.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor requesting that he will recommend to this House an appropriation of £200 to defray the expenses of a flying survey of the Clutha River, with the view of ascertaining the practicability of the navigation thereof to the Wanaka Lake or any intermediate point."—(Mr. Pyke.)

Mr. RICHARDSON said the honorable member for Dunstan some little time ago brought this matter under his notice, and steps were then taken to get the best information upon the subject. He found that the survey the honorable gentleman spoke of would take more time than was then at the disposal of the District Engineer, and that officer was therefore unable to comply with the instructions that were sent to him from Wellington. If the honorable member would withdraw his motion, he would undertake, on behalf of the Government, that the District Engineer should make such a survey as was requested; and if the report should be as favourable as the honorable member had led the Government to expect, and had led the House, by his remarks that afternoon, to expect, there would be very little difficulty in bringing down a recommendation for such a sum of money as the honorable gentleman had named, and he believed the House would cheerfully grant it. He hoped, with that understanding, the honorable member would not press the motion, but would be satisfied with the statement made on behalf of the Government.

Mr. MANDERS would ask the Minister for Public Works what engineer would be employed; whether an engineer having sufficient knowledge and experience in such matters would be selected, or an ordinary officer, who would not be impressed with the value of river navigation, which was a matter that very few people understood.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the officer who would be employed would probably be the District Engineer resident in Dunedin (Mr. Blair). If not, some other officer would be appointed by the Engineer-in-Chief.

Mr. THOMSON had no doubt that the honorable member would withdraw his motion after the assurance of the Minister for Public Works that he would endeavour to get a survey made of the river by one of the engineers. This matter had been before the House upon several occasions, and he had very much pleasure in supporting it. To his knowledge, the river had been navigated for the last thirteen years up to the mouth of the Tuapeka River. There was only one obstruction in the whole course, apart from sandbanks and snags, which were found in all rivers. There was one ledge of rocks, which ran across the river, and were known as the Ecclefechan Rocks. He believed that beyond the Tuapeka mouth there were rapids and other obstructions; but those who had been in the interior of the country knew that the Clutha, even far above Clyde, was a very large river—that it looked at that township almost as large as near its mouth. A very interesting report was prepared by the late Mr. Balfour, and presented to the Provincial Council of Otago, with regard to the Clutha and other rivers and harbours in that province. That report was well worth reading, and he would be happy to point it out to any honorable member who took an interest in such matters. It appeared from it that the Clutha discharged more water into the sea than the Nile itself, and was much larger than many of the well-known rivers of the Old World. A few hundred pounds would be very well spent upon this work, and he had no doubt it would lead to very good results.

Mr. PYKE understood the assurance of the Hon. the Minister for Public Works to be that he would take care that the engineer sent to make the survey would be qualified to do so. An ordinary road engineer might probably not have the ability to conduct the necessary survey, and he hoped the honorable member would see that the officer was properly qualified. With reference to the report quoted by the honorable member for Clutha, he might say, speaking from memory, that Mr. Balfour reported that the discharge of the Clutha was nineteen times greater than that of the River Thames, and forty times larger than that of the Clyde at Glasgow. He might state, from his own knowledge, that above the Tuapeka River there were no snags or sandbanks. The timber came into the lower part of the river from the forests at and below the Pomahaka Junction. Higher up the river the depth was very great, and there were no bars or ridges of rock, but merely immense boulders which had fallen into the river from the mountain tops. Here and there rapids might be met with, in consequence of the river being narrowed by the rocks that had so fallen. He thanked the Hon. the Minister for Public Works for the assurance he had given that a competent engineer would be appointed to make the survey, and he would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

H. W. FARNALL.

Mr. HAMLIN, in moving the motion standing in his name, said his reasons for asking that the petition should be referred back to the Committee were that only one individual had been examined, and an opinion of the Solicitor-General had been read to the Committee which went to show that Mr. Farnall had a good claim against the Provincial Government of Auckland. It, however, turned out that the opinion was quite incorrect. In consequence, however, of having received it, the Committee at once came to the conclusion that it would be better to allow Mr. Farnall to try the matter in some law-court, and his case was not sifted to the extent petitions invariably were when they were referred to that Committee.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the petition of Mr. Farnall, as Provincial Immigration Officer, be referred back to the Public Petitions Committee for further consideration."
—(Mr. Hamlin.)

Mr. REYNOLDS had hoped that some other member of the Committee would have spoken upon this subject. The honorable member said only one member had been examined in Mr. Farnall's case; but another petition from the same gentleman had been before the Committee for a considerable time, and members had thus acquired sufficient information to enable them to dispense with other evidence. The honorable member had referred to the Solicitor-General's opinion, but that did not guide the Committee, in its decision: it had been already stated by the Chairman that it did not guide him. Too much evidence was required to be taken before the Public Petitions Committee; and he must say, from his experience of it during this session, that he felt very much dissatisfied. A member of the Committee himself, he would, as a member of the House, place very little reliance upon any recommendation that came from it. Sometimes evidence was taken on a petition, and then laid aside for a week. When the petition was taken up again, other members were present who had never heard the previous evidence, a resolution was placed before them, and a decision was come to. Unless evidence was taken and dealt with when the same members were present, it would be evident to any one that not much reliance could be placed upon the decisions come to. As to referring the matter back to the Committee, he did not believe they could do anything further than merely bring up a similar report. Therefore he thought it would be useless for the House to agree to the motion.

Mr. SWANSON hoped the House would agree to the motion at once, and thus save time that was required for more important business. Members were waiting to consider most important motions, while some of them were wasting time with a perfect nothing.

Mr. MURRAY was sure, if the House agreed to the motion, the Committee could not bring up any other report. They had taken all the evidence necessary, and it was simply wasting the time of the House to put such a motion upon the paper.

Mr. HAMLIN was sorry that honorable members should so stultify themselves as to say that the whole case had been sifted by the Committee, for the fact was only one witness had been examined. He now stated, in the presence of several members of the Committee, that the decision was arrived at very much in consequence of the opinion of the Solicitor-General that the petitioner had not exercised all his rights to obtain redress. It was stated that he had not brought an action against the Province of Auckland, and that he should have exhausted his remedy in that direction before coming to the House. The Committee did not give the subject fair consideration, for they were guided very much by the direction of the Chairman, and by the opinion of the Solicitor-General. In reference to the remark which fell from the honorable member for Port Chalmers, that the petition was before the Committee for several days, he would say it was simply nonsense. The petition was before them for one short hour, during which time they examined the Provincial Secretary of Auckland. It was true that Mr. Farnall had another petition in respect of a claim against the General Government, which was before the Committee for several days. How was it that the claim made was cut down to £139, the amount of the award? It was because it was asserted that the petitioner had a good claim against the Provincial Government, and the Committee would be prepared to consider the case fairly, and award him what they thought he ought to receive. How did some honorable gentlemen carry out their promises? How did they carry out their opinions? Some honorable gentlemen changed their opinions much sooner than the wind changed. The Committee should consider the matter fully, calmly, and dispassionately, and then report upon it. To say that a similar report would be brought up, was simply to say that they would not give the case further consideration; that they would simply turn a deaf ear to reason and right, and return the same report again.

Motion agreed to.

MOUNT PISGAH WATER-RACE COMPANY.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR, in moving the motion standing in his name, did not think the Government would have any objection to give an assurance that the report of the Committee would be practically carried out. This Water-race Company was one of those few companies that came under certain regulations issued by the Government, which were drawn up with the intention of affording a subsidy for water-race construction. This company did not proceed very far, as they were hampered by the decision which was arrived at that certain rights for mining in the Maere-whenua district could not be maintained. They found themselves embarrassed, and had to give way in the carrying out of their scheme; and the works were now in an incomplete condition. A sum of £200 was advanced by the Government, of which, owing to the delays, 25 per cent. had been expended before the money had been obtained. The Committee did not think they would be justified in sending for the Warden, as greater loss would result from more inquiry. The Committee thought it would be more satisfactory if the Government would obtain particulars of the case, and take it into their consideration. The Committee reported specifically that in their opinion the Government might relieve those men from the £200 hanging over their heads, which practically could not be recovered, and which was only hampering a very steady and deserving set of men. The company was composed of a very old and respectable colonist and six or seven sons—men of upright character and sterling integrity. He hoped the Government would see their way to adopt the report of the Committee without establishing a precedent that would be undesirable. He would not press the motion if the Government would give an assurance that they would carry out the report.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the interim report from the Gold Fields Committee on the petition of shareholders in the Mount Pisgah Water-race Company be taken into consideration."—(Mr. De Lautour.)

Mr. WHITAKER said the object of the motion seemed to be that the £200 due from these people to the Government should be foregone, and really meant an appropriation of that sum. If the honorable gentleman would withdraw the motion, he (Mr. Whitaker) would carefully look into the matter; and if he came to the same conclusion as the Committee on the subject, he would take the means of doing what was considered desirable to be done. If he did not come to that conclusion, he would inform the honorable member, who would again have an opportunity of bringing the matter before the House.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR had much pleasure in asking leave to withdraw the motion.

MANUKAU STEAM LAUNCH.

Mr. O'RORKE, in moving the motion standing in his name, said it would not be necessary to make many remarks in commending this proposal to the favourable consideration of the Government and this House. Since he put the motion on the Paper it had been said that the steam launches had not turned out to be the success anticipated by his honorable friend the member for Port Chalmers when he devised the system. Even if he was aware, as he was not, that they had not been of the use expected, he should not be deterred from making the proposal he now did. In such harbours as Auckland and Wellington all large vessels could come alongside the wharf, and there probably was not that necessity for the use of steam launches which existed in the Harbour of Manukau. The waters of the Manukau extended a distance of twenty miles from the Heads to Onehunga; and when they considered the ramifications to Papakura, Drury, Mauku, and Waiuku, he was not overstating the fact that the waters of the Manukau washed the shore to an extent of 100 miles. He thought it was very desirable that there should be at hand such a steam launch as would be able to go with rapidity to the heads in case any disaster should occur there. On the occasion of the melancholy wreck of H.M.S. "Orpheus," if there had been a steam launch in use, and with the telegraphic communication now existing between the Heads and Onehunga, the greater number of the 250 men who were drowned would have been saved. The Manukau Harbour was a magnificent sheet of water, as was known to most honorable members. When it was recollected that the shoals in the channels were continually shifting, and that a great deal of attention was required to be bestowed upon the buoys, which had frequently to be cleaned and repaired, they would see that for such work as this a steam launch would be very desirable. The Provincial Government had last year chartered a cutter for this purpose, at a cost of £100 to £200. In carrying out the service at the Manukau, a steam launch was very desirable. He was quite aware that his honorable friend the member for Waitemata had a right to speak on this subject, as he represented the northern shores of the Manukau. It would not be legitimate, but still it would be very convenient, to have a steam launch to convey electors to the Huia and Muddy Creek to vote at elections, instead of having to leave at midnight in order to be in time to record their votes at the polling-places. His honorable friend had given notice of the following amendment:—"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the steam launches in the possession of the several Customs Departments of the colony, together with the steamship 'Hinemoa,' be sold forthwith by public auction." When he looked at that amendment, he thought he might claim the vote of that honorable gentleman. His (Mr. O'Rorke's) proposal was that there should be a steam launch for the service in the Manukau. His honorable friend seemed to suspect that he desired to have the steamship "Hinemoa" for the Manukau Harbour. He could solemnly assure his honorable friend that he had no desire to get hold of such a vessel as the "Hinemoa," as a very much smaller vessel would suit him. Under the circumstances, he hoped the honorable member would give him his vote in support of this motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on next sitting day, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor, praying that a sufficient sum may be placed on the supplementary estimates to provide and maintain a steam launch for service in the Harbour of Manukau."—(Mr. O'Rorke.)

Mr. G. McLEAN said that honorable members were fond of talking about economy: but he found, when it came to their own door, they were not very well satisfied with it. He thought they might well do without a steam launch on the Manukau for some time to come yet. If a steam launch was really wanted there, it was very probable that the one in Wellington might be dispensed with. There was a good steamer trading in the Manukau Harbour, the services of which could always be had when required, and the cost would be small indeed compared with the cost of keeping up a steam launch. The first cost of the steam launches was not so much to be considered as the cost of keeping them up. No doubt the steam launches had not been the success anticipated when ordered, and the Government did not like to be hurried into incurring any more expense in the meantime. With reference to the melancholy catastrophe that occurred at the Manukau Heads, alluded to by the honorable gentleman, he did not think a steam launch would have been of any use on that occasion, because that vessel was wrecked at a time when the sea was so rough that no steam launch could get near her. With regard to doing the work in the harbour, the lifting of buoys, &c., he did not think a steam launch would be serviceable. A small steamer had been ordered from Home. She was a small boat, which would be specially useful for attending lighthouses, lifting buoys, and also for doing surveys. He thought it was quite possible that she would be able to accomplish all that was wanted in that way. He hoped, after this, the honorable member would see his way to withdraw the motion. This was a luxury he thought they might well do without for a little while.

Mr. HAMLIN somewhat differed from the Commissioner of Customs. The honorable gentleman said there was a small steamer at present running in the Manukau Harbour. That was perfectly correct; but it was not to be imagined for a moment that that steamer was going to be taken off her usual trade to do occasional work. He thought the people who were in the habit of using that steamer would strongly object to such a proceeding. As to the other objection the honorable gentleman took—namely, that the steam launch would have been of no use on the melancholy occasion referred to by the honorable member for Onehunga—he (Mr. Hamlin) would say he believed that, if they had had a small launch on that occasion, it would have been possible to save a great many of the persons on board, inasmuch as some of the survivors got into a small boat and reached Onehunga, where they announced what had taken place.

Major ATKINSON asked the House not to agree to the motion. It was clearly a departmental question. The steam launches were obtained simply for Customs and Immigration purposes; and if there was any necessity for one in Manukau Harbour, the Government would have made provision for it. But he submitted that the honorable gentleman had hardly made out a case when he referred to the unfortunate wreck which had taken place there, for that had nothing whatever to do with the question of a steam launch. Because a wreck had occurred at any particular place, surely the House was not going to order that a steam launch should be kept there. He thought the question might be fairly left to the Commissioner of Customs. The steam launches in Otago and Canterbury had undoubtedly saved the Government a great deal of money in communicating with the quarantine stations. When immigrant vessels were unfortunately quarantined, the Government had formerly very considerable sums to pay for communicating with the stations. The launch did not answer so well in Wellington, owing to her not being able to resist the very rough sea which very often came on to Soames Island straight from the Heads. On several occasions, they had to hire boats, and consequently the saving had not been great.

Mr. MACFARLANE said that when these steam launches were first ordered by the Government, he had had the presumption to write to Ministers showing that they were unsuitable. Inquiry since had shown him that they were unsuitable, and the cause of unnecessary expense. With regard to the wreck of the "Orpheus," he could assure the honorable member for Onehunga that, if they had had half a dozen steam launches in Manukau Harbour on that occasion, they would have been of no use. The steam launches used by the Government were almost useless, except on a fine day, when they might do for picnic parties. He would like to read the following letter from one of his constituents, who expressed his (Mr. Macfarlane's) sentiments in this matter:—

"We have lived here most of us nearly thirty years. We bought our lands from the Government at high prices, when Auckland was fixed by the Imperial Parliament as the seat of Government of the colony. During all these years nothing has been done for the district in the shape of roads, excepting what has been done lately by a poor Road Board. We have bush tracks only for roads, and are forty miles from Auckland by the same, although only ten miles as the crow flies. Our taxes, in the shape of Customs duties, have been expended in the centres of population on an army of officials, and on extravagant mail subsidies and other expensive luxuries, while we are literally ruined for want of roads and bridges.

"Pray do what you can to get some redress, and to secure the expenditure of the revenues of the colony on useful works, and not on visionary schemes.

"This is a large and rather populous district, yet not one shilling of the borrowed money has been, or seems likely ever to be, spent here; and it grieves us to see our own and neighbouring settlers' children without roads to go to school, while an expensive steam yacht is provided for the amusement and pleasure of highly-paid officials in Wellington."

Mr. REYNOLDS was very much astonished when the honorable member for Onehunga brought forward this motion. That honorable member ought to know that those steam launches were intended to do, not only Customs work, but Immigration work, and that they had proved themselves very useful. If a return were called for, it would be seen that they had effected a very large saving, especially in Otago and Lyttelton. Formerly the cost of boats in connection with the Customs was fully as much as the cost of maintaining the launches; and in addition to that, the latter were used by the Immigration Department. Now at Onehunga there was no Custom House.

Mr. O'RORKE. — That is owing to your neglect.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that when there was a Custom House at Onehunga little or no revenue was collected there. Now, if the honorable member had proved that there was a very large amount of Customs or Immigration business in Manukau Harbour, possibly he would be justified in asking the House to assent to his motion. With regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Waitemata, that those launches had proved themselves useless, he was altogether disposed to deny that. Auckland appeared to him to be a very peculiar place, so he really could not say whether a launch there would be useful or not; but he knew that, as far as the southern part of the colony was concerned, they had been of very great service.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past seven o'clock p.m.

DUNEDIN DRILL-SHED RESERVE BILL.

Mr. REID, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that the reserve had already been granted by an Ordinance of the Provincial Council to the Volunteers of the Province of Otago. That Ordinance, owing to a technical defect—a portion of the lands described in the schedule having been not Crown-granted at the time the Ordinance was passed—was disallowed. The Volunteers of the province, however, had always looked upon it as an estate that belonged to them, and he might say that recently they had applied to the Superintendent and Executive Council of the Province, who had approved of an Act being introduced into the Assembly to vest it in the Volunteers. He believed that since the date of the Ordinance of 1871 the land had greatly increased in value; but as it was intended to withdraw the subsidies which had hitherto been paid to the Volunteers, he thought it desirable, in a district like Otago, where a very great number of members had joined the force, and where large sums of public money had been expended in bringing it up to its present state of efficiency, that they should encourage the Volunteers to instruct themselves in the arts which were necessary to make them an efficient body. He had never had any great faith in the Volunteer system as a means of external defence; but where there was a nucleus established, it would aid the youth of the country in learning something of the initiatory stages at all events, to enable them to understand manœuvring, and to exercise themselves in the use of the rifle, and it appeared to him that for these reasons it was desirable to encourage that system. This would be very small encouragement, but nevertheless it might be sufficient to keep together the force that had been formed in Otago. It should be understood that the force was to be something substantial, and to be composed of a body of men who would turn out on stated occasions and keep themselves up to the standard laid down by the Defence Department; and he should have no objection to see a clause inserted in the Bill in Committee to the effect that if the force should at any time fall below a certain number, or did not come up to a certain standard of efficiency, then the reserve should not vest in them any longer. He believed such a clause would be prepared for insertion in the Bill in Committee; but in the meantime he would remind the House that this was simply carrying out the Ordinance passed by the Provincial Council in 1871. He hoped, therefore, the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill. It was sanctioned by the Provincial Executive, and he had received a telegram from the Superintendent a few days ago, asking him to endeavour to get the Bill carried through the House.

Mr. STOUT requested Mr. Speaker to say whether this Bill should not be introduced in the same manner as an Endowment Bill, such as the Harbour Bills and the Lake Ellesmere Endowment Bill. It dealt with lands which had not been Crown-granted, and proposed to give it to certain private persons called the Dunedin Drill-shed Commissioners. He apprehended that the ruling of Mr. Speaker with regard to certain other Bills would apply to this Bill, and that it would have to be introduced in Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER did not think the same rule would apply in this case. The principle which rendered it necessary that the Harbour Bills should be introduced in Committee of the whole was that they were Trade Bills. There was another consideration mentioned by the honorable member—namely, that inasmuch as the Bill dealt with Crown lands, it ought to be recommended by the Crown. On that point he thought the honorable member was right.

Mr. REID said that matter could be dealt with in Committee, when they considered the schedule. He might say that part of the land was held by the Superintendent in trust for purposes of volunteering; another portion of it was not Crown land, but had been conveyed to the Superintendent from the Church Trustees in exchange for other land given to the Church Trustees; and only a very small portion was Crown land. If the ruling applied that this Bill should be introduced in a Committee of the whole, some Bills which the honorable member for the City of Dunedin had introduced would be found to be informal, and some introduced by other members also. At any rate, the objection could not apply to the whole Bill, but simply to one of the schedules.

Mr. SPEAKER said that if Ministers would give their consent on behalf of the Crown, the difficulty would be obviated.

Mr. G. McLEAN would state that the Government were going to support this Bill. The Provincial Council had handed this land over to the Volunteers, and they now wished to get possession of it. He proposed to make a few amendments in Committee; and, when they had been embodied in the Bill, the Government would sanction it. All the land had been handed over to the Volunteers by resolution of the Provincial Council, excepting a very small portion which would be of very little use without the rest, for it was between the other two pieces. He thought a good substantial building should be erected upon the ground; and the Volunteers should be kept up to a certain standard of efficiency, otherwise they should forfeit it. With these amendments, he thought the House might very well agree to the Bill.

Mr. STOUT intended to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He felt sure the Government could not know the value of the land they were giving away by this Bill. It was about half an acre of the most valuable land in the City of Dunedin, and at the very lowest computation it was worth £10,000; but he believed it would sell for £15,000. It was near the Central Railway Station; and since the Provincial Council passed the resolutions referred to, Dowling Street had been formed, and the land fronting High Street had been let at very high rates—he believed at from £7 to £9 per foot. It was now proposed to give away this land for a site for a drill-shed and gun-shed—land which was fronting the Railway Station, and in the very heart of the city. A more monstrous proposal was never submitted to the House, and he would ask honorable members whether they would sanction the giving away of public lands in such a manner. He desired as much as any honorable member to see that the Volunteers should have a drill-shed and gun-shed, but at present they had a drill-shed in the Octagon Reserve; and if it was necessary to bring in a Bill to give them a title to that, he would support it. He objected altogether to giving them this land, for it was far too valuable, and it would never be used for a drill-shed. It would at once be let on lease for a very large sum, and the Volunteers would draw the rents. He was somewhat surprised that the Government should sanction the giving away of public land in this manner; and it was plain to him that Ministers either did not know the value of the land, or they had not duly considered the matter. He presumed anything the Government proposed would be carried in this House, and perhaps it would be useless for him to move the amendment. However, he would certainly record his protest against giving away such a valuable block as this to the Volunteers, and he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. PYKE felt at a loss to describe in words sufficiently parliamentary the action taken by the honorable member for Dunedin City. He held in his hand an Ordinance of the Provincial Council of Otago, of which the honorable member was a burning and shining light, dated 1871. The honorable gentleman was now in a peculiar position. He was not quite sure whether the honorable member was in the Provincial Government or not: he rather thought he was half in and half out. These grants were made by the local Legislature, the action of which the House was now asked to set aside. He had before him copies of special grants of the self-same lands, and the schedules in the Bill under consideration were exact copies, word for word, verbatim et literatim, of the schedules agreed to by the Provincial Council of Otago. For what purpose did the Provincial Council grant that land? The words were as follow: "Whereas it is expedient to set apart the said parcels of land for the purposes of a headquarters drill-shed, armoury, and gun-shed being erected thereon, and for the use of the Volunteers, and also to make provision for the management of such parcels of land in manner hereinafter appearing." What was the House now asked to do? Simply to indorse the action of the local Legislature of Otago. It was no answer to say that since that period the land had become more valuable. Would it be any excuse for dishonesty to say if you sold to a man to-day a horse only worth £10, and if it were worth £100 to-morrow, you should refuse to deliver possession? A more dishonest argument he never heard in his life.

Mr. STOUT.—They never got possession.

Mr. PYKE would ask, why did they not get possession? It was because the land was part of a huge rock. Prisoners had been employed in blasting it away, the material being wanted to reclaim the harbour and to make the property of Otago more valuable; and now, because the land had been levelled, was it to be said that the Volunteers were to be deprived of it, although the Government of Otago freely accorded it five years ago? If the House carried out such a system of proceeding, it would amount to this, that, no matter what grants were made by any provincial authorities, the House would take upon itself to repudiate them. There was a small example of it the other night, and he did not like it. If these things were done, it would be said that the House would not carry out the contracts entered into by the Provincial Governments. He trusted that the House would refuse to agree with the arguments and special pleading of the honorable member for Dunedin, and would consent at once to the Bill being read a second time.

Mr. LUMSDEN would much like to know how much public money was spent in blasting away the rock to improve the land, which was in a very different state now from what it was then, for, according to the honorable member for Dunstan, when the land was given to the Volunteers, it was a precipitous rock. This reserve had been held in trust by the Superintendent, and the Volunteers had been offered other ground for a drill-shed and gun-shed. The very heart of the city was not a proper place for a drill-shed, and some site more out of the town might be obtained. If the land were sold, the proceeds would purchase another site for the Volunteers. Besides, he did not think the Volunteer business was going to be very lasting; and passing this Bill would be likely to make the force in Dunedin efficient, for it would then be a well-paid force. With the amount of money obtainable from this reserve, the Volunteers would become a luxurious and idle body. He did not like to see public money and grants of land given to Volunteers in this way, having no faith in the corps as a means of military defence.

Mr. BURNS knew a little of the early history of the affair. Something of this kind took place as far back as 1867 or 1868. The Provincial Executive determined to give these reserves to the Volunteers, and one reason why the matter was not completed at the time was that the Government required the use of the land for reclamation purposes. But it was promised that they should have the land as soon as it was levelled, and the prisoners had been employed upon it ever since. An Ordinance was passed through the Provincial Council to grant this land, but owing to some informality it had been disallowed. It was owing to some technicality, but not to anything in the principle of the Bill; and the House was now asked to do simple justice. There was no doubt that circumstances had somewhat altered since 1867 or 1868, and the land had certainly become more valuable; but that did not get over the difficulty. The House was not to repudiate on that account. The Bill ought to be read a second time, and the amendments proposed by the Commissioner of Customs could be inserted. All that was required was to provide that a building should be erected for the use of the Volunteers, and that a certain strength and efficiency of the force should be kept up. If his memory did not fail him, those were conditions that were to have been embodied in the grant. He hoped the House would pause before rejecting the Bill, for it would be a pity to repudiate in this matter. This reserve is in a very different position from those other reserves with which the House dealt the other night.

Mr. REES did not think it was wise as a rule that members from other provinces should interfere in local questions connected with any particular province; but circumstances might arise when the honor of the House was concerned, and when the administration of justice in dealing with public property called upon honorable members of the House to take part in expressing their opinion and in voting. He did not suppose that any honorable members from other places than Otago would have spoken on this question, but that they would have contented themselves by recording their votes, had it not been for the amendment of the honorable member for Dunedin that the Bill should be read that day six months, which would have the effect of shelving the measure and preventing the property being vested for the benefit of the Volunteers. He could not understand the objection of the honorable member for Dunedin, after the statement which had been made by the honorable member for Dunstan that for years past this property had been dedicated for this particular purpose. It appeared from the Provincial Ordinance of Otago that this land was granted for this particular purpose. The honorable member for Dunstan stated that this particular reserve was set apart for the use of the Volunteers; and he (Mr. Rees) would like to know what circumstances had arisen which rendered it unjust and improper that the land should be so vested. Unless the Volunteers had since that time fallen into such a state that they could no longer be intrusted with property of this kind for purposes of public defence—unless that were the case, the House would be setting a bad example in breaking faith with the Volunteers or any other such body. The honorable member should recollect that the Volunteers gave their time for the purpose of public defence; that they were liable to be called upon to go into the field upon any emergency that might arise. In the Province of Auckland they had done so in former days, and were prepared to do so again. Seeing that the other colonies were now turning their attention to the best means of defending themselves against any possible aggression, it would be an act of folly to weaken the hands of the Volunteers of the country, or to diminish that military spirit which they wished to see developed amongst the people. If, as stated by some honorable members, this land was given in good faith to be devoted for the purposes of the volunteers, he hoped the House would carry that intention into effect. The question was not one as to the increase in the value of land. He did not suppose the Government would have spent the time and the labour of the prisoners in reclaiming that land simply for the use of the Volunteers, if it were not to make more valuable other land in the city of Dunedin. He trusted the House would support the second reading of the Bill, and carry out the intention of the Provincial Legislature;—that they would not break faith with any large portion of the people, or even with any insignificant portion of the people, but would feel compelled to carry out in honor the intention of the Provincial Legislature in granting this land.

Sir R. DOUGLAS did not believe in the defence of the country being intrusted to Volunteers—at all events, to such a purely Volunteer force as they had in Dunedin. He thought, as this land had been set apart for military purposes, the Government would do more good by retaining it for military purposes. He understood that the ground was in such a position that the guns could be easily taken out and removed to any other place by rail, &c. To keep the ground for military use would be right enough; but to give it to the Volunteers for other than military purposes would be a course to be deprecated. For that reason he thought the Government would be wise to keep the ground in their own hands. So long as the ground was not required, the Volunteers might be allowed to use it. When the Volunteers ceased to exist, the ground should be retained by Government as a place for keeping guns and arms, and for other military uses. The time had come when this country should be able to defend itself by a Militia force, and not by Volunteers,—when every man between two certain ages, capable of bearing arms, should be liable to serve in that Militia. He hoped the Government would take the matter into their consideration and disband the Volunteers, and have a thorough and efficient Militia force for the whole colony of New Zealand.

Mr. REID said the view expressed by the honorable gentleman who had just sat down would be given effect to if he supported this Bill. The land would be used by the Volunteers so long as they existed, and it would be vested in the officers. When the Government chose to disband the Volunteers, the officers would also be disbanded. The land would not vest in the Governor, but would vest in the University of Otago in trust for a museum, schools of art and of technical education. He thought that would be as appropriate as vesting the land in the Governor. With regard to the argument that this land had been improved at the expense of the country, he might state, since the land was granted in 1871, the province had actually been paying the owners of property adjoining it, and removing their buildings, in order to get the use of the material for reclamation purposes, and in some cases paying rent for the use of the land during the time of removing the material. The reason why the Volunteers did not get the portion Crown-granted to the Superintendent for Volunteer purposes was that the province required the material in order to reclaim the harbour. He might say, further, that the circumstances existing in 1871 had been reconsidered by the present Executive, and Ministers had documents in their possession recommending that this land should be made over to the Volunteers. He thought the local authorities on the spot were as competent to form an opinion as the honorable member for Dunedin. The honorable gentleman had always been opposed to this proposal. He hoped the honorable member would not be able to carry his amendment, but that the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Mr. BOWEN said that, while it was quite right that this land should be handed over to the Volunteers, still there was a great deal in what was said by the honorable member for Marsden, that the land should be strictly reserved for military purposes. The reason now for handing it over was that it should be used for military purposes; and if the Volunteers failed in their duty at any time, or were disbanded, he thought the reserve should be handed over to the Governor to insure the objects of the trust being carried out. He could see no reason why the land should be handed over to the University because the Volunteers failed in their duty. He thought, therefore, that in Committee the provision to that effect should be changed into a provision for handing it over to the Governor for military purposes.

Bill read a second time.

Mr. REID moved, That the Speaker do leave the chair, for the purpose of considering the Bill in Committee.

Mr. STOUT opposed the motion. He believed the Bill had been read a second time because a Parliament which knew nothing about the subject had dealt with it. The honorable member for Dunstan had made one of his usual speeches, to which he (Mr. Stout) did not think it necessary to reply. He could only say that, as to any bargain being made with the Volunteers, the thing was a patent absurdity. The land did not belong to the province at all, and consequently the Ordinance was disallowed. Was it to be said that, because a Provincial Ordinance was disallowed, an agreement had been made? If so, they would have to bring in hundreds or even thousands of Acts to carry out such agreements. What were the facts of the case? The Volunteers were first promised a little bit of this land. When they had got that, they said, "It is no good to us; we must have another little bit." They got that, and then they said, "There is another little bit you got from the Church—give us that;" and they got that third little bit. The only reason why the honorable member for Taieri was acting in this way was because, when he said he could do a thing, he tried to fulfil his promise. As for the Minister of Justice talking about the land being used for military purposes, it was only a fair sample of the ignorance of the Ministry in regard to everything connected with Otago. Opposite this land there was the largest warehouse in New Zealand, which had cost £30,000; and the frontages farther down the street, fronting the Church property, had been all let at exorbitant rents for warehouse purposes. Fronting this corner was the Railway Station. Then Dowling Street had to be newly formed into the main street. It was the very centre of the business places in town. Now they were going to take away this valuable piece of land for the purpose of erecting on it a gun-shed. What did the Provincial Council do with reference to this matter? Because they did not give the Volunteers this very piece of land, they voted money to help the Volunteers to erect a drill-shed on the Octagon Reserve, which had never since been used for any other purpose. Now they were asked to give the Volunteers one of the most valuable sites in Dunedin for a drill-shed, which would be used only once a week. He could not conceive any Ministry supporting a Bill of that kind. He would certainly use all constitutional means to prevent the Bill going into Committee that evening. The Volunteers had a drill-shed erected partly with Government money on Government land; and now some honorable members spoke as if the Volunteers were badly treated. They had been allowed to use any of the public recreation reserves whenever they desired them, and grants and reserves for drill-sheds had been given to the Volunteers right through the country. An honorable member said something about the land being improved. Now part of this land was not a hill at all, and did not require cutting down. It required filling up; in fact the tide came up to it at one time. The Provincial Government had formed the street at a cost of thousands of pounds, and had thus made the land valuable. If the land had been offered to the Volunteers in 1871, and if they were told to do what the Government had done since, they would not have taken a present of the land, except for purposes of sale. Now that the land was levelled and the street made, the House was asked to give the Volunteers a piece of land worth £10,000 or £15,000 for a drill-shed! He could only say that this was one of the first-fruits of the Abolition policy, which handed over the management of local affairs to men who knew nothing whatever about the local circumstances of the case. He undertook to say that if this question came before the Provincial Council they would not give the land to the Volunteers; and without wishing to refer to a former debate, he might also say that if the wharves and quays question came before the Provincial Council, the Harbour Board, which had not the least claim to them, would not have got a rood of the land.

Mr. PYKE said that the honorable member who had just sat down stated that he would not reply to him (Mr. Pyke). Well, he could reply to the honorable member, and that was just the difference between them. The honorable member harped upon the value of the land, and told the House that the tide used to go over it. Well, it must have been a very high tide indeed. He knew the land sixteen years ago, and an honorable gentleman beside him knew it twenty-five years ago, and they never knew the tide to go over the land. In fact, if it did so it would have to rise twenty feet above high-water level. The honorable gentleman was talking about something he did not understand. The honorable member was very angry that any land should be set apart in the country to encourage military spirit.

Mr. STOUT never said anything of the sort; but he objected to this piece of land being taken for military purposes.

Mr. PYKE said the honorable gentleman objected to the land being taken away because of its value. When the land was granted, it was not supposed to have anything like its present value. He had to repent this phrase about the value of the land, because the honorable member was "still harping on my daughter." But, because the land had become valuable, was that a reason for committing a gross breach of faith with a gallant body of men? He was surprised the honorable member for Dunedin should have made use of such an argument. As far as military purposes were concerned, he had only one observation to make in reply to the honorable gentleman. The honorable gentleman scorned the idea of this land being used for military purposes, because he could not disconnect that phrase from the idea that a fort should be erected upon it, and as there was a large store opposite he no doubt feared that obuses and shells might be thrown into that store. There was, however, one reason why it might be well to erect a fort in the centre of the city of Dunedin, and that was to protect the peaceable inhabitants from the rebels whom the honorable member proposed to lead against the Government in consequence of late political changes.

Mr. REES thought that, as the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill, it should not now be pressed into Committee, and so prevent other and very important public business from being taken.

Mr. REYNOLDS would object to the House going into Committee on the Bill that evening. He had not spoken on the second reading; and would now merely remark that his impression was there was no legal obligation to hand over this land to the Volunteers. When he was in Dunedin, about two years previously, great pressure was brought to bear on him to have a new Supreme Court erected. He pointed out the difficulty of obtaining a site. He was then told there would be no difficulty in obtaining this site for the purpose, and he asked what authority there was for making that statement, because he understood that the land had been reserved for the Volunteers. The reply was—and he believed it was given either by the Superintendent or by a member of the Provincial Executive—that it was available for a Supreme Court. It was, however, found to be too small for that purpose, and he believed it would also be found to be unsuitable for the purpose proposed in the present Bill. There was already a good drill-shed in the city, which the holders of a late meeting there said would contain 2,000 people, although he did not believe it would. At the same time, if the citizens of Dunedin could make out that such was the case, then it must be acknowledged that ample provision was made for the Volunteers. It must also be remembered that at the time this reserve was proposed to be given to the Volunteers they had no drill-shed. He did not think there was any obligation to grant the land to the Volunteers, and it could be applied to much better purpose. He was perfectly convinced that, if the House went into Committee on the Bill that evening, the whole time until the hour when no new business could be taken would be occupied in discussing it; and honorable members who had other business on the Paper should bear that in mind when they come to vote on the question.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR moved, That the Bill be committed that day week. He was not at all surprised that at the present crisis of affairs the Minister of Justice should be anxious to secure a military site in the city of Dunedin; but the honorable gentleman's anxiety was not coupled with judgment, for it would be much better to erect his military station before several thousands of pounds had been expended in cutting the hill down. He also sympathized with the honorable member for Dunstan in his fear of what might take place; but he thought the missiles the honorable gentleman would have experience of would not be those he talked of, but of a rather softer character. He would be crowned with flowers as a player on the stage. When the honorable member arrived in Dunedin, a few policemen would be sufficient to secure him from any danger from showers of these missiles.

Mr. REID would accept the amendment, although he thought it was rather unfair that he should be threatened with what would be done in Committee, if the House went into Committee that evening.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be committed that day week.

STATE FORESTS BILL.

The House went into Committee on this Bill.

Clause 1.—Short Title.

Mr. BOWEN moved, That the word "repeal" be struck out, with the view of inserting the word "amendment" in lieu thereof.

NEW ZEALAND UNIVERSITY BILL.

Mr. ANDREW, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it did not profess to make any change on a great scale in the New Zealand University. It merely proposed to widen the basis on which the Senate might be elected, and to give the educated members of the community with ad eundem degrees a direct interest in that body. The New Zealand Act of 1870 constituted a teaching body, which was done away with by the Act of 1874, and the University was reduced simply to the status of an examining body, on the model of the London University. By the Act of 1874, the Senate consisted of twenty-four members, who were eventually to be elected partly by the Senate themselves and partly by the graduates of the University, forming a Convocation. This process was not to take place until there were a certain number of members of the University of New Zealand who had themselves graduated in that University. Meanwhile, all vacancies were to be filled up by nominations from the Governor. The University had effected a great deal of good in the country; but, at the same time, he did not wish to disguise that a great deal of fault was found with its proceedings, and those objections proceeded in a great measure from the educated men in the community, who would naturally like to have some influence in the proceedings of the University, but who, by the law as it stood, were debarred from all voice in the matter. This Bill proposed at once to give the power of electing one-half of the members of the Senate to the Convocation of the University, which would consist at present almost entirely of members who had taken ad eundem degrees. But Convocation would be leavened, year by year, by members who were themselves graduates of the University. The Convocation of the University had very small functions indeed under the University Act; but one of its functions, and in fact the only important one, was the election of the Senate, but that function was at present in abeyance. It was proposed by this Bill to enable members of Convocation to elect one-half of the members of the Senate as vacancies occurred. There were at present in the Senate seven vacancies; and if this Bill became law, these seven vacancies, instead of being filled by the nomination of the Governor, would be filled by election, four being elected by the Senate, three being elected by Convocation; and as other vacancies occurred, they would be filled up alternately by the Senate and Convocation. One objection to allowing Convocation to elect had been the very great expense that the meeting of that body entailed. This Bill provided for an election taking place with hardly any expense at all. He supposed that £10 would cover the whole expense of an election, by conducting it according to the principle on which the election of members for the Universities in the Imperial Parliament was conducted in the old country. That principle was embodied in the Bill. He would not take up the time of the House longer, but content himself by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. STOUT moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. Of course the University was now in existence, and he did not intend to take up time by stating all his objections to it. He looked upon it as a farce. It was an examining body to examine that which did not yet exist in the colony, and which would not for many years to come. He thought, if New Zealand desired to encourage higher education, they should make provision for a large teaching staff, and for bringing in good scholars to teach their young men. When they established an examining body to grant degrees, he thought a wrong was done; and at that time there was a strong feeling of jealousy against the Otago University. But he did not intend to go into that matter, and would only say that any one who had seen the working of the New Zealand University in the past, and had compared the examination the students were required to pass—take for example the B.A. degree—would know that actually three or four times more Greek was required from the New Zealand students than would be required for the same degree in the London University. If he thought fit, he could show that, to say the least, the Senate had been very unfortunate in the manner in which some of their regulations had been drawn up. For example, when a list of books was submitted to the Senate of the New Zealand University for approval, they actually excluded the books of the most eminent writer of the present century on sociology and psychology—Herbert Spencer—on the ground that he had advocated the leasing of lands and the State being the owner of all the lands. On that ground alone the Fellows of the Senate absolutely excluded his books from their curriculum. That was an undeniable fact. And this was the body that had the management of higher education in New Zealand! If this were known in other places where higher education was cared for, the New Zealand University would be the laughing-stock of all the Universities in the world. What did the Bill now propose? This Bill was a very insidious one. When it was wished to repeal an Act he liked a Bill to be brought down boldly announcing that intention. But this did not openly profess to repeal the New Zealand University Act. It said:—

“Notwithstanding anything contained in ‘The New Zealand University Act, 1874,’ all graduates of the University for the time being shall, for a period of ten years after the passing of this Act, be members of the Convocation of the said University.”

That was well shown to be a repeal of the 24th section of “The University Act, 1874.” That section made this provision:—

"The Senate shall have power to confer any of the said degrees as ad eundem degrees. But no ad eundem degree shall, without the consent of Convocation in each case, entitle the holder thereof to be or become a member of Convocation."

The Convocation did not in fact exist. There were not thirty graduates, New Zealand graduates, and now that Act was introduced to do this: they had thirty University students properly so called, and now it was wished to create a Convocation consisting of ad eundem graduates to manage the University. Now, the sole reason for the New Zealand University Act being passed in the form in which it was passed, was, he presumed, that it was desirable to get the young men of the colony, who had been taught in the colony, who had got their degrees in the colony, to take an interest in higher education. They were to form the first Convocation; and before any ad eundem graduate could become a member of that Convocation, he had to be elected by those thirty New Zealand University students; but this second section of the Bill repealed that beneficial provision, and repealed it in what he might term an insidious way, because the mover of the Bill ought to have come down boldly, and said that "This provision as to the thirty students is hereby repealed." He considered it was one of the most beneficent things in the University Act; because it freed the New Zealand University management a good deal from the old ideas as to the curriculum of the University students. One had only to look at the reports of Commissions that had examined the higher education, both in England and Scotland, to find that there were complaints made against the University system—complaints that no one yet had met in such a way as to show that the studies even at Oxford and Cambridge, or other Universities, were conducted in a proper way; complaints that too much attention had been paid to some studies to the neglect of others. Yet if they were to allow this Bill to pass in its present form, the result would be that they would have ad eundem graduates in New Zealand, who perhaps had not been paying much attention to University reform in the old country, stereotyping their ideas in the New Zealand University in future, and thereby doing a great deal of harm to University education in the colony. That was another reason why the whole power should not be left to these ad eundem graduates, as was proposed by this Bill. There was another point—namely, he was not aware that the Fellows of the New Zealand University had approved of this Bill in Senate. He believed it was introduced in another place by a Fellow of the University; but he was not aware that either the Governors of the affiliated institutions, or the Fellows of the Senate of the New Zealand University had approved of the Bill in its present form; and he thought, before the House proceeded to repeal the various provisions of "The New Zealand University Act, 1874," an Act which, like the Forest Act, had only been two years in existence, there ought to be very good grounds shown. At the same time, he admitted that the New Zealand University Act might need amendment; but he submitted that the amendments proposed by this Bill were of very little use whatever. If the New Zealand University Act was to be amended, that would have to be done in a very different manner than that proposed by this measure. He therefore thought it would be wise for members of this House to throw out the Bill, and let the Senate consider what amendment they desired next year; and then a Bill could be introduced and brought before the House in a different form. For those reasons he would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. BOWEN said that, as he understood the honorable member for Dunedin, the complaint against the existing University Act was that it did not give sufficient power to Convocation, and that the chief power was given to Senate; and the honorable gentleman said further, that one of the greatest merits of the Act was, that hereafter when there were thirty graduates who had taken their degrees in New Zealand, they would have a voice in the management of the University. The object of this Bill was to hasten the time when men who might be supposed to have practical experience in teaching should have a voice in the management of the University. It by no means repealed the provision which would enable all graduates of the University to take a part in University management. But whereas complaint was made that there was not sufficient life in the institution, and not enough of that experience possessed by men accustomed to teaching, this Bill provided that men who had taken degrees elsewhere, and who had got ad eundem degrees in the University, should, before there was time to have a Convocation assembled of New Zealand graduates, be able to meet and take their fair share in the administration of the affairs of the institution. If there was anything more likely to hasten the usefulness of the University, it was such a measure as was now proposed. For instance, there were a great number of men engaged in teaching in New Zealand who, by this Bill, would be enabled to have a voice in Convocation, who were now excluded; and he certainly thought that would remedy many of the deficiencies which had been complained of in the University. He did not think it would be necessary, in discussing this Bill, and at that hour, to go into the question of the advantages of the University as it existed. But he would point out to the honorable gentleman who last spoke that an examining body was almost the only body it was possible to constitute in the present state of the colony. They had teaching bodies in various parts of the country; and what they wanted was a body that would examine those different teaching bodies, and establish a standard which undergraduates who were studying at the different affiliated institutions would have to attain to in order to obtain degrees. There were provisions for holding the meetings of the University from time to time in different towns where the several affiliated institutions existed; and, in fact, the New Zealand University Act was a measure to provide in the colony, as nearly as circumstances would permit, the advantages of such an institution as the London University. That University was founded to foster affiliated institution all over England, and to evoke teaching power wherever it might exist. In New Zealand such an examining body was more necessary than in England. We may desire to have more affiliated Colleges and more teaching power; but he could not conceive that any one who desired that there should be more life infused into the proceedings of the University could object to a provision which would really create a Convocation sooner than it could be created under the provisions of the Act as it stood at present; and he would support the Bill for the reason that it would tend to hasten the time when those who had some experience in teaching would have a voice in the administration of the University.

Mr. REYNOLDS had only to say that had it not been for the 24th section of "The New Zealand University Act, 1874," the measure would not have been passed at all. It was only a compromise at the time, and that section was one of the provisions that was insisted upon.

Mr. O'ROBKE merely wished to enter his protest against the sham that took place in the House from year to year in parading Bills before them with regard to the New Zealand University—as if there was such a thing in existence! He considered that the institution was a degradation of the honorable name of University. He was certain it had done no good in the way of establishing advanced education. What was their boast? That they taught nothing; that they had no professors; that they are a houseless and a homeless body. It was true that some of the money set apart by the House filtered through their hands and was thus distributed amongst certain schools; but he denied that the institution had in any way promoted superior education. When the proposition to establish a University was first brought before the House, it was by way of petition from a gentleman who was distinguished for promoting education in Otago, and who, he regretted to say, had since died. He thought it should be the duty of the gentlemen who had been charged during the last five or six years with conducting this so-called University to petition the House to relieve them of their duties—that they should represent to the House that the grant which they held was contemptible—that their efforts had been fruitless, and that the time had arrived when the House should address itself to the propriety of creating a real University. Ten times the £3,000 would not be mispent if a real University were established where young men could be brought up, where they would be trained under the discipline of University life, and acquire something like the knowledge which was bestowed in the venerable Universities at Home. It was on this ground that he would give his vote in favour of the amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. But he would much prefer that the House would take the bull by the horns and abolish the grant altogether, as it did in the matter of the New Zealand Forests Act; for he believed that this University was even a greater sham than that Forests Act. He was at one time in favour of dividing the grant of £3,000 between the existing University of Otago and one that he proposed should be established at Auckland. He had not yet abandoned that idea, but he would for the present be satisfied with a real University, established at some convenient place, instead of having wandering examiners going about amongst the highways and by-ways, striving to get some person on whom to confer a degree. He was also, he confessed, astonished to see gentlemen of high attainments—gentlemen who had graduated in the old Universities—content to accept ad eundem degrees in such a University as this. He did not admire their taste; he should prefer remaining as a graduate of the University where he was brought up. At first, he was strongly in favour of the University at Otago; but he felt a little ashamed of it when, a season or two ago, it surrendered its rights of conferring degrees for a mess of pottage—when, for the sake of getting hold of a little land, it degraded itself from its position and was content to be called an affiliated college of this New Zealand University. Many years ago, when he once spoke briefly on this subject, he said he held the opinion that if a real University were once established, many persons would, out of their abundance, make donations to assist in carrying out the object. That opinion was the subject of ridicule, not in the House but elsewhere. But what did he see a few months afterwards? A gentleman at Adelaide, whose name he forgot, made a donation of £30,000 to assist the University which was then established there. He had been looking over a list of donations that had been made from time to time to a University with which he was acquainted, being an alumnus of what was styled at home alma mater, and he saw that they ran from £3,000 to £5,000 and up as high as £36,000. He believed that if the colony had a real University, many scholarships would be established by private gentlemen, professorships would be founded, and in time something worthy of the name of University would be established, instead of what was now a by-word amongst those who appreciated a high class of education. It was true they had high-sounding titles. They had Chancellors, Vice-Chancellors, Fellows, and Senators; but in what did they resemble the dignitaries of the Universities at Home, except in the mere name? With regard to the proposal about the Convocation, it was to him a matter of no moment. He would prefer that when they went into Committee a clause should be introduced for repealing the whole grant, and with a view of contributing something from the public revenue worthy of a University for New Zealand.

Mr. REES intended to support the second reading of the Bill. It could not be expected that in a new country such as this there should be at once reared up amongst its people stately edifices such as those which adorned older countries, or that there should be those beautiful colleges which were to be found in such places as Oxford and Cambridge. These could not be erected in a day, in a month, nor, perhaps, in many years, nor could it be expected that to such an institution in New Zealand there should attach the memories and glories which surrounded the old institutions of the mother country. Honorable members should recollect, when they compared a new University in a new country with the old Universities of the world, that everything had a beginning. What were the American Universities? Yale and Harvard were now places with a world-wide celebrity, and yet, but a few years ago, they were but seminaries partly supported by charitable aid, and partly assisted by State grants. So it was also with the Irish, the Scotch, and the English Universities. There was a time when even those institutions were in their infancy. He would be glad to support any measure that would go in the direction indicated by the honorable member for Onehunga, when he said there should be a real University, and not a sham which had but a name and did not exist in fact. As that honorable member said, ten times the present grant of £3,000, or twenty times that amount, would be well expended if it reared amongst us such an institution as could hold out the lamp of education and intelligence to the people of this country. But there must be a beginning and he would be very sorry to do as the honorable gentlemen proposed, and so see the twinkling light which now existed put out, and nothing given to the country in exchange for it. This measure stood on a very different footing from the State Forests Bill; for this measure, at any rate, kept alive some spirit and desire for the advancement of education in the colony. ("No.") Surely the honorable members who cried "No" must remember that a University did exist, that it had power to confer degrees, and that those degrees were acknowledged everywhere. There had been gathered together not only gentlemen who had earned the distinction of being graduates of the older Universities, but who had also aspired to the honorable distinction of ad eundem degrees in the New Zealand University—members of the English, the Irish and the Scotch Universities, who were anxious to take part in the administration of our University. It was a great thing to have gathered these men together, so that they might consult and give advice in regard to the administration of the University which would be of use in the future. He would be sorry to see the New Zealand University, poor as it was, without habitation and name, and a sort of wanderer through the country, put out of existence. It had entered upon a course which would possibly lead to magnificence in the future. In regard to a Convocation, the actual existence of which this Bill would propose, he would like to see greater powers given to that body—not only that it should be enabled to extend its limits, but that it should have some actual power and some real work to do. He quite failed to understand why the 24th section of the Act of 1874 should not be repealed, either expressly or impliedly, so as to admit gentlemen to the dignity of members of Convocation who had not taken degrees in New Zealand itself. Would not that be a commencement? Why shut out from that body the power of gathering to itself men of experience in other countries? Why refuse it the power of gathering to itself the learning of older countries? Why shut out from that body all the advantages it would receive from the learning and experience of such men, especially when the University was only in its infancy? It seemed to him to be more reasonable that our arms should be stretched wide and our gates thrown open, so that those who brought the rewards of learning and erudition from older countries might take part in the administration of our University—men who had come out to make New Zealand their home, and men who had gone Home and then returned again with well-won honors, after passing through the curriculum of study in the old-established Universities. The door should be thrown wide open, so that our University should have the advantage of the prestige and erudition of such men as these. Therefore, it would be unwise to postpone the passing of this Bill. Let the University continue its present existence for a time; let Convocation really exist, and let those gentlemen who, if Convocation was thrown open, would aspire to ad eundem degrees, gather together, and then, by the aid of Convocation passing resolutions which the Senate could make public and forward to the Assembly, Parliament would be able to map out something that would be of use to our children and our children's children. What was wanted was a high style of education. What the House should aspire to was to increase the powers of this body, and to foster everything that was likely in time to place higher education within the reach of the young men of New Zealand. This would not be attained by crushing the existing University, or by contrasting it unfavourably with the older institutions; but rather by cherishing it, causing the summer sun of prosperity to shine upon it, and by doing all that they could as members of that House and public men to insure its success. The day would come when, if it were properly dealt with, they would see the University not only an examining body but a teaching body, with large endowments and grants by that House, which could not be made in a better direction. They would see it with a professorial body of its own, and with the reproach that now attached to it removed. But that, of course, would take some little time. The object should be to hasten that time, to lay the foundations of the edifice as widely as possible, and to gather to its assistance learned men, especially when it had to struggle against such feelings as those which actuated men who contented themselves with contrasting it unfavourably with older institutions, and against feelings of contempt because it was not a teaching body and had no habitation. It was the duty of the House to strengthen it by every possible means. He hoped that the Bill would not be postponed for another six months. It was a step, but it was a good step, and one taken in the right direction. He believed, if a Convocation were formed, as it could easily be if this measure were passed, that Convocation and the Senate would be of material assistance to the Parliament in passing such measures as would make the University a credit to the colony.

Mr. STAFFORD did not think the real object of the Bill was very well understood by some honorable gentlemen. The honorable member who had just spoken had very fairly placed before the House the intention which the Bill wished to subserve. It might be supposed from the speech of the honorable and learned member for Dunedin that the Bill was intended to strengthen or tighten something of an exclusive character in the hands of a few men in regard to the administration of the University. The object was exactly the opposite. Under the existing law, the Governor appointed to the Senate persons who might or might not be the most competent to advise as to the affairs of the University. The proposal of the Bill was, that this administration should be given to persons whose experience in teaching might be supposed to be of very great advantage in determining what the administration should be. The persons introduced would comprise those who were engaged in teaching in the higher seminaries of New Zealand. Amongst these were persons who had taken high degrees in the older Universities, as, for example, the Professors of the University of Otago, and other persons who were also engaged in teaching at some of the higher schools and colleges in the country, and whose experience as practical administrators would be of very great advantage not only with regard to the general administration, but also as to the books which should be the subjects of study of those who sought to obtain prizes in the University. The Bill, there was no doubt, went in the right direction, although he desired, with the honorable gentleman who had just sat down, that it should go very much farther. He would like to see the powers of Convocation very largely increased. It was very doubtful whether within the next ten years there would be thirty graduates of the New Zealand University to form Convocation, and he did not see why during that time the University should not have the experience of men well versed in high-class education at Home, and who were now engaged in New Zealand. Surely it would be a very great advantage to have the experience of such men. It could not be said that a Convocation formed of men appointed by the Governor, however excellent they might be, was likely to be superior in point of practical experience to a Convocation composed of such men as would be admitted to it under this Bill. One would suppose it was a measure of a restrictive tendency, instead of opening the door to greater power. He agreed with the honorable member for Auckland City East that it did not go as far as he would wish to see: still it was a step in the right direction. It gave gentlemen an opportunity of being introduced into the administration of the affairs of the University who were now excluded; and in order that that object might be carried out, he would have great pleasure in supporting the Bill.

Mr. THOMSON agreed with almost every word that had been said with regard to the advantages of higher education; but he was still inclined to support the motion of the honorable member for Dunedin, that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months. He thought it would be time enough then to read it a second time. The Bill had been introduced into the Legislative Council by a gentleman who was a member of the Senate; but it did not appear that he had been authorized by the Senate to introduce the Bill. He thought that, if the Senate were of opinion that the constitution of the University ought to be changed, the Senate should have requested one of its members, or a member of the Government, to introduce such a measure as this. Then again, there was this point, which had not been brought out: The Act of 1874, which might be said to be the Constitution Act of the University, was agreed to by the Senate of the University of New Zealand and delegates from the Colleges. It was the result, in fact, of an understanding which had been arrived at; so that it appeared to him, if they passed this Bill, they might be said to be breaking faith with the members of the Senate of the New Zealand University and the delegates of the University of Otago. Now, in the 8th clause of the New Zealand University Act, to which reference had been made, it appeared that the Convocation was not to come into force till there should be thirty graduates. And why was that passed? It had a section to itself in the Act. There must have been some reason for that, and he thought the reason must be something like this: That it was very desirable that there should be a number of young men taking an interest in higher education who were not trammelled by the ideas of the older Universities. Then again, it appeared from the 24th section of the Act that ad eundem graduates could not be members of Convocation. There must have been a reason for that too. The Senate seemed to say by this section that it is not desirable that ad eundem graduates should be members of the Convocation, or rather that it is not desirable that the Convocation should consist of gentlemen who have taken their degrees at Home unless the Convocation of New Zealand graduates is willing. Now, as he had said, there must have been a reason for that, and he presumed the reason was this: that it was not desirable, as this was simply an examining institution—an institution without a local habitation—that the power should fall very much into the hands of gentlemen residing in one place. It so happened that in the Province of Canterbury there were many gentlemen who had taken degrees in the English Universities—more perhaps than in any other portion of New Zealand; and as those gentlemen would have very great power in electing the members of Senate, the whole of the members of Senate might ultimately belong to Canterbury. He would have more confidence in the Senate if the Governor appointed from the various parts of the colony gentlemen who took an interest in higher education. He thought that, until they ascertained that the Senate of the New Zealand University were desirous of a change in the system, it was not advisable to make any alteration.

Mr. ANDREW, in reply, said one of the chief objections made to the Bill was that it was not introduced on a formal resolution of the Senate. He would point out that it was recommended by the Chancellor of the University, provided that no draft was made on the University fund. It had been brought down in each House by a member of the Senate, so that everything was done with its approbation. The honorable member for Dunedin had commenced his speech by making an attack on the University of New Zealand generally. The question was not whether the University of New Zealand ought to be abolished or not, but whether it ought to be improved. The honorable gentleman had objected that a knowledge of Greek was considered necessary by the University to qualify a person for a degree; but he would point out to the honorable member that it was not necessary at all. It was optional with a student whether he should be examined in Greek or not. The standard required for a degree in the University of New Zealand was exactly the same as that in the University of Oxford, and he did not think that standard was too high. He was surprised to hear the honorable member for Onehunga say that it was degrading for a member of an old University to hold an ad eundem degree in the New Zealand University. He himself had taken a degree in an old University, and he held an ad eundem degree in the New Zealand institution, but he did not feel himself degraded. The New Zealand University was a trembling infant, which those gentlemen would crush.

For.	Against.
Sir R. Douglas, Mr. Sharp,	Mr. Burns, Mr. Bryce.

The amendment was consequently negatived, and the Bill read a second time.

Mr. ANDREW moved, That the Bill be committed on Thursday next.

Mr. STOUT would move, as an amendment, That the Bill be ordered to be committed that day two months. If that were not carried, he would move, That "The New Zealand University Act, 1874," be repealed. By passing this Bill they were committing a distinct breach of faith, and he had certainly expected a different line of action on the part of the honorable member for Auckland City East. The Otago University was affiliated with the New Zealand University on the distinct understanding that the agreement stated in the Act of 1874 should be complied with. But instead of that, what was to be done? The University would be managed, not by the students under the Act of 1874, but by ad eundem graduates. He contended that that should not be so. They were now, for the first time, actually proposing to put the heads of grammar-schools—for they were really nothing else—into the Senate, and allowing them to distribute the moneys to be appropriated under this Act. A more monstrous proposition was never made in any Legislature. Let any honorable member imagine the effect of heads of grammar-schools being made senators of the New Zealand University, with power to distribute grants of money, and not only that, but to appoint examiners to examine their own classes. He could only say that the result would be to teach the Otago University a lesson—the lesson that agreements embodied in Acts of Parliament were not to be considered binding or lasting. He would propose, as an amendment, That the Bill be committed that day two months. The Bill could not be absolutely thrown out, because, as things were going on at present, the Parliament would be in session at that time.

Mr. REYNOLDS seconded the amendment. He was amongst those who took a prominent part in bringing about the affiliation of the Otago University with the New Zealand University, and he certainly now regretted the action he took on that occasion. If he had known that the Act of 1874 was only to endure two years, he should have declined emphatically to have anything to do with the arrangement. He regarded the present Bill as a breach of faith, and believed it would show more than any other measure passed this session, what reliance was to be placed upon the Acts of that House. He felt perfectly sure the people of Otago would feel very strongly upon this question. They would feel that the Assembly had misled them, that it had cheated them of their birthright, and they would resent it with spirit. He trusted that when the Bill was in Committee, if it ever went there, a clause similar to that introduced into the Forests Bill would be inserted. He would do his best to prevent the Bill passing through the House.

Mr. REES said he could not compliment the honorable member for Dunedin either upon the logic of his arguments or the sequence in which those arguments were placed before the House. As a rule, when an honorable member desired by argument and reasoning to convince the House, or to influence the opinions of those whom he was addressing, he brought forward his argument before the question was decided. He did not wait till the question was settled, and then, for the first time, state the arguments upon which the question should first have been decided. The honorable member made reference to a former Act, and now denounced the present Bill as a breach of faith. Certain conditions were made—a certain understanding was arrived at; and because those conditions were made, and that understanding arrived at, the honorable gentleman said the House ought not to pass this Bill. Why did not the honorable gentleman say that in the course of his argument? He knew it himself. How were other honorable members to know it unless he told them? If he expected honorable members to vote upon an understanding of that sort, he should have shown that such an understanding existed, that certain measures were carried upon that understanding, and that the understanding itself was a reasonable one. But even now he was not convinced by what the honorable gentleman had just told them, nor did he see that the Assembly had done wrong in the slightest degree. What was a University for? It was for the dissemination of knowledge, the honorable gentleman said; and all the powers of Convocation were to be exercised—by whom? By undergraduates—men of no experience, men reared up to some extent with narrow opinions, men who had not had the advantage of converse with the great and the learned, men who had not undergone University discipline, and had very likely resided in this country all their lives. Could the powers of Convocation, he asked, properly be left to them? He refused to adhere to such an agreement. He cared nothing for the Otago University or anybody else in matters of this kind. He said that a Convocation composed of gentlemen who lacked all the essential qualifications he had named—all honor to them for having fitted themselves to pass a University examination—but a governing body composed of those gentlemen would not be likely to manifest that broad comprehension, that culture of mind, that resource of thought, and that grasp of intellect, which men composing the governing body of the New Zealand University should have. He was astonished at the narrowness of the honorable gentleman's views, and he was also astonished to hear that the Otago University had bartered away its rights for some property—some endowment—it had obtained.

Mr. STOUT.—We were denied a charter.

Mr. REES.—Who denied the charter?

Mr. STOUT.—This Government.

Mr. REES.—Well, be it so. This Government, which could give a charter, had given a charter to a broader school—the New Zealand University. Was it to be supposed that one province, one town, or one district was to arrogate to itself the position of the leading educational establishment of the colony, to place itself in such a position that no one else should be permitted to stand on an equality with it? It was not at all to be desired that one portion of the colony should elevate itself, to the exclusion of others, into a school of learning. That was to cast every other school, not only by the superiority of its works, but by its laws also, into the shade.

Mr. STOUT said the Otago University did not object to a charter for the New Zealand University; and he regretted to observe that the honorable gentleman did not understand the question.

Mr. REES said the honorable gentleman might attempt to be funny, but his witty shafts had no effect upon him. He considered himself impervious to such witty thrusts. They were told that this Act was restrictive, and that they should be narrowed down, "cribbed, cabined, and confined," because this Otago University imagined it should enjoy a supremacy. What claim had the Otago University upon this country? It certainly had a claim to their respect; it was entitled to have its just rights; but was it to be said that members of the House were to place the New Zealand University at a disadvantage for all future time? That would be preposterous. Perhaps the honorable gentleman would next tell them that no legislation should take place unless Dunedin, unless Otago, was in the first place to be considered. Everything must be subservient to that. Because some understanding had been arrived at in some past time, hereafter it would be regarded as a breach of faith if some improvement of the law were made by the House. He objected to such a conclusion. He did not think it was right or just, nor would it reflect creditably on their judgment or redound to the credit of the Legislature, if the affairs of the University were to be conducted in that spirit. All that had been done was to gather into the Convocation many learned men, to include in its ranks gentlemen who had benefited from association with the great, and had profited by the past history of old countries. In doing so they had only done what was right. If any such arrangement as the honorable gentleman had alluded to was ever made, then it was an arrangement against public policy; it was an arrangement which would hamper the progress of education; it was an arrangement which would clip the wings of any society that might aspire to any height whatever in learning. He was sure the Parliament of New Zealand would show its sense by setting aside any such arrangement, and by putting its leading educational establishment on a proper basis. As to the honorable member for Port Chalmers, he did not know that the honorable gentleman was a man of much weight in University matters. He was not aware whether the honorable member was a graduate of any University; but he must say he was astonished at the narrowness of the views of gentlemen who said that because the Otago University was affiliated to the New Zealand University it would be a disadvantage to call to its councils the graduates of all other Universities who happened to be in New Zealand. Instead of shutting up the Convocation to comparatively raw lads who might obtain degrees here, it would be rather an advantage to avail themselves of the services of men of age, erudition, and experience. That was an extremely narrow view to take. He hoped the House would not consent to postpone the Bill, but would let it take its ordinary course, and stand for committal next Thursday and be passed. He was sure that in years to come members of the University of Otago would themselves be the first to say that the House took a wise and just course in doing what it had done to-night.

Mr. ROLLESTON would say that the course taken by the honorable member for Dunedin had astonished him very much. Personally, he knew very little of the Bill until he read it the other day, and he had nothing whatever to do with originating it. It had been a matter of some thought with him whether the Bill was altogether advisable or not, for this reason: It seemed doubtful whether it would insure a Convocation of men who could work, considering the expense that would be incurred in establishing the Convocation, and the difficulty of bringing it to bear upon elections. It seemed to him, after thinking the matter over, that the function which was going to be given to the Convocation by the Bill was simply that of election, and that would be popularizing the constitution of the University. It would make the Convocation of the University elective by those who possessed a qualification, in respect of education, throughout the country, instead of leaving the nomination of those gentlemen in the hands of a political body; and he thought very great advantages were likely to accrue from that. A University did not consist of halls and chapels and lecture-rooms, but it consisted in the aggregation of learning. He was surprised to hear the honorable member for Clutha speak as though evil would accrue if there were more representative men of learning in the Province of Canterbury than in Otago, who would be likely to get greater influence. What was wanted to be done was to bring the largest amount of learning to bear upon the University, and to make it a representative body of learning and nothing else. He had heard jealousy expressed of Professors and men engaged in education having a voice in the working of this educational institution. He could not conceive any educated man grudging to men of education a position which their learning qualified them to undertake in a learned institution. For his own part he desired particularly to see those men whom—all honor to her—Otago had imported, possess an influence in the University which they could not now under its present constitution exercise. He wished to see men, wherever they were, rich or poor, throughout the country, whatever the position they might be in, provided they had the qualification of learning, influence the University in establishing the highest standard of learning that could possibly be attained. He believed the Bill was a step, although an imperfect one, in the direction of making the people of

New Zealand feel they had got the question of higher education in their own hands, and that it was not to be exercised second-hand by any political body. It was the first step to making the New Zealand University the crowning point of our educational system—a system which should begin in the primary schools, and go step by step to what ought to be the highest council of education—the University of New Zealand.

ABOLITION ACT.

The Hon. Captain FRASER, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that within the last few days Ministers, in a letter to the Governor, made reference to an opinion of the lawyers of the Crown in England. He very much desired to see that opinion laid on the table, because it would allay the excitement and dissatisfaction that at present, he believed, prevailed amongst a large majority of the people in Otago, who were under the impression that they were about to be illegally deprived of their Land Fund, and to have distasteful institutions illegally imposed on them, in lieu of those constitutional ones under which up to the present they had flourished and been happy. On 1st September, 1874, the Attorney-General, in reply to a communication from Ministers, sent in a memorandum which was considered to be of so important a nature that, when Parliament met, His Excellency the Governor directed that a copy of it should be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament. He would read the last paragraph of that memorandum, because it bore upon his motion:—

"Questions have been raised as to the construction of the Act above referred to; and, though I see no room for doubt or question, I think that it would be well that the Secretary of State should be asked to take the opinion of the Law Officers in England, and, if any doubt whatever is entertained by them, that a Bill should at once be passed for removing the doubt."

Now, when the Attorney-General said, "I think this or that should be done," that was equivalent to advice, and he (Captain Fraser) must suppose that the Government acted upon that advice, and got the opinion. Now he would go farther and say that he took it for granted, if the representative of Her Majesty in this colony should consider the case so grave, that he would deem it to be his duty to see that the Secretary of State was communicated with on the subject. If the Government had not done this, they had, he thought, done either a foolish or a very wicked thing, and must be responsible for the present dissatisfaction which prevailed in two of the most important provinces of the colony. He had read and re-read and studied the Imperial Act of 1868; and reading the clauses by the light of the preamble, he could see no authority, either according to the spirit or the letter, for eradicating Provincialism. He did not believe it was ever the intention of that Act to give a power to eradicate Provincialism. The only power it gave was to do away with and to reconstruct the provinces. Then the question naturally arose, were they introducing a reform or were they bringing about a revolution? He was not going to discuss the question whether the people of Otago were justified in resisting what they considered to be a revolution, because, although the forefathers of all those settlers went cheerfully and manfully to the death for what they considered to be a broken Covenant, he did not believe that one of their descendants would risk his head to-morrow for a broken Constitution.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid on the table copies of any opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown in England which may have been applied for and received by the Government in accordance with the advice of the late Attorney-General, dated 1st December, 1874, presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of His Excellency."—(Hon. Captain Fraser.)

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that perhaps his honorable friend would be content to withdraw his motion when he told him that no such opinions had been obtained, and that no application had been made for such opinions as those which he had mentioned. It was very much to be regretted that misimpressions as to the power of the General Assembly should prevail, as he was aware they did to a very considerable extent in such important provinces as Otago and Auckland; but the responsibility for those misimpressions must rest on those gentlemen who, knowing better, for their own purposes sought to perpetuate this misimpression. There had not been, and there could not be, any doubt as to the powers of the Assembly to abolish the provinces in New Zealand. If there were any doubt about it whatever, it ought to be removed by the fact that the Abolition Act passed last session was left to its operation by Her Majesty's Advisers on the other side of the world. Of course, if there were any such document as his honorable friend wished to have, it would be laid on the table without hesitation; but no documents such as he referred to being in the possession of the Government, his resolution would be simply useless.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES desired to say a few words with regard to what fell from the Hon. Captain Fraser in reference to the state of feeling in Otago upon this subject. No one could deny, seeing the opinions expressed by the great majority of the Otago members, that they had been returned by those who believed in Provincialism, and who supported it; but though the majority returned members holding those views, yet he knew very well—and he did not think his honorable friend knew so well as he did, seeing that the honorable gentleman had only but recently arrived from Home—that the minority was a very strong one in Otago, and held exactly opposite views; and from all he had learned when he was in Otago and since he came here, he thought the minority would very shortly become the majority, except perhaps in a few of the centres. He had come to the conclusion that, although very considerable manifestations had been made in some localities, those manifestations had been caused by certain parties who desired to have their own conduct indorsed, as far as possible, by what appeared to be an expression of public opinion. He knew that in the country districts the feeling for abolition prevailed over the feeling against it. He had no doubt that in Otago the settlers would, for the most part—except in some centres—hail the measures in progress in the Assembly as substitutes for provincial institutions.

* The Hon. Mr. J. JOHNSTON said it appeared from what the Colonial Secretary told them, that the Government had been guilty of a very grave omission, and he thought had acted unfairly to those opposed to the abolition of the provinces. Although he recognized fully the power of Parliament, yet upon so grave a question as such an alteration in their Constitution, and with doubts expressed by the Attorney-General as to whether the act of abolition was an exercise of legitimate authority, the opinion of the Crown lawyers should have been obtained. What was the effect of the absence of such opinion, and of the consideration that if the question had been so submitted the reply might have been in the negative? The Queen had not assented to the Abolition Act, but merely left it to its operation. As he understood, the Queen might, during the period of two years, refuse her assent, notwithstanding the Act had been in operation.

It was a rare occurrence for an Act to be left to its operation; and to his mind it occurred only when its provisions were irreconcilable with the sense of right of her legal advisers. The one Act that presented itself to his mind in which such a course had been followed by Her Majesty, was the Bill—he might say the unjust Bill—passed to materially lessen the value of the New Zealand Company's scrip. He had heard from a gentleman well known in this part of New Zealand, Mr. Tollemache, that he, recognizing the injustice of that Act, obtained an opportunity for discussing its enactment with the Colonial Office, and that its injustice and pro tanto repudiation of a liability of the colony were admitted. That Act did not receive the assent of Her Majesty, but was allowed to pass into operation, the Crown lawyers no doubt thinking that we had ideas of honesty in this part of the world which did not obtain elsewhere.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL wished to draw attention to one point. The Queen had been only pleased to leave this Act to its operation, and it was said by the Hon. Mr. Johnston that she had power to disallow it at any time within two years. But he would point out that the very nature of the Act was such that, before the expiration of that period, it would come into operation. Therefore, if Her Majesty proposed to exercise her power of disallowance, it would be necessary to exercise it at once. Consequently, he attached no importance whatever to the fact of the Act being left to its operation, instead of having received the Royal assent.

The Hon. Captain FRASER would ask leave to withdraw the motion, as the Colonial Secretary said there were no assets.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

DUNEDIN WHARVES AND QUAYS BILL.

The Hon. the ACTING-SPEAKER said he had received the following telegram with reference to this Bill:—

"Dunedin, 5th October, 1876.

"To the Hon. the Speaker of the Legislative Council of New Zealand.

"The Mayor and City Council venture humbly to protest to your honorable House against the action of the House of Representatives in passing the Dunedin Wharves and Quays Reserves Bill, by which it is sought to deprive this city of its annual rentals from the Dunedin Wharves and Quays Reserves, and to transfer said reserve and rentals to the Otago Harbour Board.

"The following is a copy of a petition to your honorable House which has been this day adopted by the Dunedin City Council, and which leaves Dunedin per first post—namely, on Saturday morning next. Pray submit this telegram to the Upper House as soon as possible:—

"That your petitioners beg to remind your honorable House that during the present session your petitioners memorialized both Houses of Parliament, praying that the City Corporation of Dunedin might not be deprived by legislation of its control over the Wharves and Quays Reserves, Dunedin, and the annual rentals in respect thereof, the rentals from the reserve having been municipal revenue or income now for a period of some nine years. That the Public Petitions Committee of the House of Representatives, after considering the said memorial, reported that it had no recommendation to make thereon; and that the Public Petitions Committee of your honorable House has reported, in the matter of the same memorial, that, after full inquiry, it saw no reason to interfere with the existing occupation of this reserve by the City Corporation of Dunedin.

"That, notwithstanding these facts, the House of Representatives has, at the instance of the Otago Harbour Board, passed during the present session a Bill to place this reserve in the hands of the said Otago Harbour Board, and to make for the future the annual rentals from the reserve Otago Harbour Board ordinary revenue. That your petitioners view this action of the House of Representatives with extreme regret and disappointment, and venture to approach your honorable House with an earnest protest in the case.

"Wherefore your petitioners humbly hope that your honorable House may see fit to reject the Bill passed by the House of Representatives entitled, 'The Dunedin Wharves and Quays Reserves Bill, 1878.' And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray."

"CHAS. REEVES,

"Mayor of Dunedin."

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said that never before in his experience, or he believed in that of any other member, or in any other Legislature, was a member met, when about to move the second reading of a Bill, with the publication of a manifesto such as that just read. He thought the precedent one of a very inconvenient kind. The Legislative Council was also referred to under a title which he was not aware it had ever assumed—namely, the Upper House. He was afraid he could scarcely do justice to this matter—although a simple one—owing to the manner in which his nerves had been disturbed by the introduction of a thing so elaborate as the telegram just received. The Bill which had been intrusted to him was one which proposed to do an act of simple justice in the allocation of certain reserves in the city of Dunedin. The history of those reserves, although extending over a long time, might be given in a few words. When the city of Dunedin was originally laid out, the water frontage was cut up into sections like every other part of the town, except where streets led through them. This excited the displeasure of the New Zealand Company, and in that they were confirmed by Captain Cargill, the Agent of the New Edinburgh Association; and in accordance with instructions the whole of the sections on the water frontage were obliterated, and the land set apart for reserves for wharves and quays. To this disposition of the reserve the original proposers adhered with a tenacity of which they had many instances from that quarter; and he hoped they would have many more such instances, because the tenacity of the Otago people, when it took a proper direction, was a very good thing indeed. To give an instance of that tenacity, he would recall to honorable members' minds the period when the New Zealand Company ceased its operations, and those reserves in Dunedin vested in the Governor of the colony. The Governor, seeing a beautiful Octagon laid out in the centre of the city, supposed that it would be a good place for the erection of a church. He therefore promised to give the land in the Octagon to the Church of England—the Episcopalians, as they were called in that part of the world—as a site for a church. There was a tremendous stir immediately upon the subject. The Episcopalians put up a fence round the reserve, and talked of proceeding to build there. Members of the Provincial Council were urged by one of their body, and, he thought, not without success, to threaten, in case of the building being commenced, to go there in a body and pull it down. On the other hand, an old friend of his (Mr. Mantell's), who went by the name of "Sandy," although he believed his real name was something very different, threatened to station himself on the spot and shoot the members as they came there. That would serve to show the great tenacity of the people for the proper allocation of these reserves. The reserve in question, according to them, having been made in imitation of an open space called Moray Place in Edinburgh, there had been a distinct understanding that no permanent building whatever should be erected upon it. The wharves and quays reserves had remained up to the present time, with the exception of some portions that were appropriated, including one portion which was taken for a manse; another block which had been invested in various ways, the authorities for the time having had to bow to influential citizens—he thought Mr. John Jones had a share in acquiring freehold in that block, and Mr. John Jones was a very influential citizen;—another part which the Government had taken for a Native reserve, but which was compelled to be surrendered on the plea that these reserves were for wharves and quays, and could not be devoted to any other purpose; and that part which had since been granted to the Corporation of Dunedin. What remained was a certain strip of land ordinarily known as Pelichet Bay, amounting altogether to about eighteen acres. All this land had been granted to the Superintendent by the Governor in trust for various purposes. Honorable members had seen so much literature upon the subject that he need not tell them that it was under an Ordinance of 1867 that these were specially diverted, and the proceeds ordered to be appropriated to wharves and quays. By a subsequent Act the appropriation for the objects of the Corporation had been sanctioned. At the time the Superintendent placed these wharves and quays reserves under the management of the Municipal Corporation, there was no Harbour Board in existence. Had there been one, he was sure it would have been unnecessary for him to occupy the time of the Council by introducing this Bill; because it was so natural that these reserves should form part of the endowment of the Harbour Board that the Superintendent could not have hesitated for a moment to convey them to the Board. However, until the creation of the Board the Superintendent placed the reserves in the hands of the Corporation. The Harbour Board had been created, and desired to have its original endowments made over to it; and the object of the Bill was to endow that body with these reserves. The Corporation, on its side, was of course naturally desirous to retain them: having got possession of them, they naturally declined to part with them. He would remind the Council that the Corporation was an elective body, and had the unpleasant duty of imposing rates upon its fellow-citizens. The greater the endowments the Corporation could get, the less, it seemed to the citizens, would be the rates they would have to pay. He said "seemed," because he had never found that the rates diminished after the acquisition of property by a Corporation. A Corporation, when it got additional endowments, did not regard it as a means of reducing the rates so much as a means of increasing its borrowing power. The Corporation, therefore, as already announced to the Council in the printed document with which he believed every honorable member had been favoured, were evidently ready to do fierce battle for the reserves, and had commenced that fierce battle with the opening shot by which his nerves were startled, when he was called upon to move the second reading of the Bill. He hoped that by its decision with regard to this Bill the Council would put an end to this fierce battle, by restoring to the Harbour Board that to which it was justly entitled. The Corporation had already acquired very valuable reserves on terms never contemplated on the constitution of the New Edinburgh Settlement. It was never intended that the large town reserves which the Corporation had enjoyed so long should pass gratuitously into its hands. It had large endowments; and the Harbour Board, on the other hand, had nominally large endowments, but unfortunately they were under water. It might be argued that, as reclamation was going to take place in front of this strip of land, therefore the land ceased to be applicable to wharves and quays. He did not think there was anything whatever in that argument. It was necessary to have a starting-point on the mainland before they could make a wharf or quay, whether they made it of timber, brick, or stone, or, as was intended in the present instance, of earth. However, the facts remained, that the Board, though nominally having large endowments, had really no landed endowment whatever; that those reserves were originally intended for the purpose of wharves and quays; that they had simply been placed in trust with the Corporation; and that now, the proper body for their administration having been called into existence, it seemed fit that these reserves should be transferred to that body. The Bill itself was a very simple one. Clause 2 merely directed that the land should be invested in the Otago Harbour Board. Clause 3 gave the power of leasing; and clause 4 simply described an inexpensive method of carrying on transfers, &c. He was aware it might be said that the public creditor might have a certain claim upon these reserves in respect of loans which had been raised upon them—that they were handed in to the Bank of New Zealand in the schedule of the property of the Dunedin City Council when they employed that Bank to raise loans for them. That, it appeared, was the case. However, merely including these in their schedule had no more effect than the fact that when the Harbour Board on its side was raising a loan they were also included in the schedule of that body.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—Were they?

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said he held in his hand an advertisement cut from the London Times of the 8th March, 1876. The reserves were not specified in the advertisement, but he was informed that they were included in the schedule.

The Hon. Captain FRASER thought it was a pity that fact was not shown before.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said the honorable gentleman could find information on that point in certain evidence given before the Committee. With the permission of the Council, he would read some of that evidence. He would, however, remark, in reference to this point, that any one might have high legal authority for saying that the lender to either body could have no security whatever over the reserves. In the Committee, the following question was put:—

"Are you aware that the reserves are now held by certain creditors for a loan?—I have been told so, but I do not think that is correct, for this reason: that the city has no power to borrow a shilling on its reserves. . . . Further than that, they could not bind any one by saying that the reserves were to be security. It is incorrect to say that."

Then, again,—

"Then the Committee are to understand that the Municipality could not advance these rents as security for the purpose of borrowing?—No; except in an indirect way.

"As a collateral guarantee that they were able to pay interest?—Yes.

"Mr. Murray.] Do you think a trustee would be justified in putting in some property he holds in trust for other purposes as security for the raising of money to be applied to his own purposes?—They could not have put this reserve in as security at all."

And further on,—

"Mr. Murray.] If this trustee should take that course [having a Receiver appointed, and so on], do you consider that would be a good claim why the trust property should be conveyed to him?—I do not think the thing ever arose, except in the way I tell you. The money was lent on the mortgage of the rates. They may have submitted a schedule of the rents, and said, 'We will be quite able to pay your interest and sinking fund;' but further than that I do not think the lender ever considered it. The Corporation are not in the position of absolute trustees."

Probably the honorable gentleman might assume that this was the evidence of a partisan. It was the evidence of Mr. Stout. He was anxious to see the form which the fierce battle over the reserves would take in the Council, and therefore he would confine himself to those remarks, and ask the Council to allow the Bill to be read a second time.

*The Hon. Captain FRASER knew that his honorable friend Mr. Mantell had no pleasant reminiscences of his early sojourn in Otago. But that was entirely his own fault. He, a Saxon, and belonging to a foreign Church, to venture down to a Free Kirk settlement! The fact that he was present before the Council was a very high compliment to Otago. He (Captain Fraser) had been engaged on the Petitions Committee about this wretched affair for the last month, and he was perfectly sick of it. He knew this with regard to the original reserves for wharves and quays: that he was told Mr. Domett insisted that all reserves should be christened, and they were called by any name that was chosen for them. But it had been the habit of the people of Otago to divert reserves from time to time to other purposes than those for which they were originally intended. It was only within the last month that the Harbour Board had given its consent that a portion of this reserve should be applied in a different direction; and last year a recreation reserve in Oamaru was diverted by the General Government and given to the Harbour Board of Oamaru, so that it was no plea at all to say that this reserve was part of the wharves and quays of Dunedin, because in that town nearly half the reserves had been diverted to other purposes. The Committee examined a banker in Wellington who told them the reserve in question was included in the schedule of collateral assets given by the Corporation of Dunedin to the Bank, and that if the reserve were taken away from the Corporation a breach of faith to the bondholders would be committed, and it would be very difficult to obtain a loan in future. It was, he believed, chiefly that evidence that influenced the Committee in coming to its decision. The Superintendent of the province was also examined; and although he was Chairman of the Harbour Board, he said he thought it would be very advisable that things should remain as they were, and that these reserves should be left with the Corporation. His honorable friend Mr. Mantell forgot to mention one thing which he (Captain Fraser) would state—namely, that he was advocating this measure against his own interests, because he held a very valuable property in Dunedin, and if the reserve were taken out of the hands of the Corporation it would make a difference to him of about threepence in the pound in rates. He (Captain Fraser) was entirely influenced by the fact that this reserve had been shown as a collateral asset by those who borrowed £100,000 the other day, and that it would be a breach of faith to the bondholders if it were now diverted. The Harbour Board only knew of this reserve very lately, and he would be very much surprised if it could be shown that they had included it as collateral security in the schedule of properties upon which they had borrowed money. The only plea they had was that upon the reserve was written "Wharves and Quays." Supposing that at San Francisco there was a reserve made for wharves and quays, what would become of that reserve when the water had receded three miles from it? It is the same in Dunedin. This reserve now was far inland, and the mere fact of its having been christened "Wharves and Quays" did not give it permanently the character of a harbour reserve. The gentleman who was most opposed in the other House to this Bill as originally introduced, snatched it up and had it entirely changed from beginning to end. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had intended to move that the Bill should be thrown out in consequence of the irregular manner in which it was introduced, being of opinion that it would be a very dangerous precedent to pass a Bill introduced as this had been.

*The Hon. Mr. PATERSON hoped the Council would not agree to the second reading of the Bill. As the Hon. Captain Fraser had said, it was not at all the same measure that was first introduced into the Legislature. An opponent had adroitly taken advantage of the temporary absence of its original promoter, and had changed entirely its whole nature and provisions, so that now it was quite the reverse of what it was at first. There could be no doubt that the name attached to this reserve had misled many in regard to the nature of the questions now raised in regard to it. At the time that reserve was made, it was the waterside boundary of the town; but at the present time it was nearly in the centre of the town, and was no more fit for the purpose for which it was originally intended than any other part of the town. It had therefore been regarded as a reserve to be appropriated to the general purposes of the Municipality of Dunedin ever since it passed into the hands of that body. In order to compensate for the diversion of this land from the purpose for which it was originally intended, the Harbour Board, when it was constituted, got large endowments on the waterside, which could be made available for the purposes to which this reserve was originally intended to be applied, but for which it was no longer suitable. The Harbour Board had now got an immense endowment of land in that particular locality, and had already been enabled to borrow a large amount upon the security of that endowment, which had resulted in their having at the present time more money than they knew what to do with. Therefore it was not on account of any want of funds to carry on their operations that they claimed this reserve, but simply because it was at a former time set apart for wharves and quays. He thought that the report of the Committee to which this matter had been submitted ought to weigh very much with members of the Council. The Committee had gone very carefully into the question, examined witnesses, and taken all the evidence that could be obtained on the subject, and had deliberately arrived at the conclusion that there was no adequate reason for disturbing the present arrangement regarding the reserve. He thought the members of the Committee might be allowed to be in a better position to form a deliberate opinion on the subject than members of the Council who only considered it in debate; and therefore he thought the Council would do well to listen to the advice of the Committee, who had refused their sanction to the passing of this Bill. As had been stated by the Hon. Captain Fraser, it would materially interfere with the revenue of the city of Dunedin to make this change, and, as had already been pointed out, the reserve was particularly stated as an asset included in the securities for money borrowed by the Corporation for municipal purposes. Seeing that the Corporation had for many years been allowed to use that money for general municipal purposes, he thought it would be very wrong now to disturb the present arrangement, except for more cogent reasons than had been assigned. If the Harbour Board were in want of funds or endowments, and had no means to carry out the work for which it had been appointed, he would say, Let it have the reserve; but seeing that the Board had been amply provided with other means, the Council should pause before sanctioning the transfer of the reserve to that body.

* The Hon. Colonel BRETT said that, as a member of the Petitions Committee, and having carefully, with other members of the Committee, investigated this matter, he could not support the Bill, because by doing so he would be stultifying himself, after having agreed to the report of the Committee, and which, with the permission of the House, he would read:—

“That your Committee, having carefully weighed the evidence thereon, have the honor to report, That they see no reason to disturb the present occupants of the reserve in question.”

He considered that this Bill was rather premature. The Harbour Board should, in the first place, lay their claim before the Supreme Court, and, if they were successful there, they should apply to the Legislature for an Act. The Committee had come to the conclusion that the Harbour Board was in no way entitled to this reserve. It had been proved that many reserves in Dunedin had been diverted from their original purpose; and the claim of the Harbour Board was made simply upon the fact that this reserve bore at one time a particular name. Not only could he not support the Bill, but he did not think that any of the other members of the Petitions Committee could be parties to its passing, or they would stultify themselves, having already come to an opposite conclusion. He was so opposed to this measure, and considered it such an unjust one, that he would move that it be read a second time that day three months.

* The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON had no wish to appear to stultify himself, and, at the same time, desired to vote in favour of the Bill. He would explain the reasons which induced him to adopt that course. He was a member of the Committee before which the petition was considered, and he must say that the members of that Committee took a great deal of pains in coming to a conclusion on the subject. There was a good deal of evidence brought before the Committee—evidence of a very conflicting character; and it was difficult to arrive at a decision in regard to the matter. He would like to state shortly the reasons which led him to the conclusions he had adopted on this question. It certainly appeared that this reserve was made in the first instance for wharves and quays. There were some Provincial Ordinances, and also, he thought, a General Assembly Act, affecting it; but it appeared that, in whatever position the reserve now stood, the proceeds from it were still devoted to the purposes for which the grant was originally given—namely, for wharves and quays. (“No.”) If the proceeds were made use of for other purposes, the appropriation was illegal.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON said that the Provincial Council of Otago had authorized the Corporation to devote the proceeds of the reserve to general municipal purposes, and that was stated decidedly in an Act.

* The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON.—Well, he might have misread those Acts; but he was quite certain that the reserves were handed over to the Municipal Corporation, and he believed that in the Ordinance which so handed them over there was a clause directing that the proceeds from those lands should be appropriated to the original purpose—namely, the construction of wharves and quays. In those circumstances, he contended that the proceeds of those lands must be appropriated for that purpose. As things now stood, the lands were in the possession of the Municipal Corporation, and the proceeds of them had to be appropriated for purposes which were within the jurisdiction of the Harbour Board. That state of things no doubt would, if he had formed a correct opinion, lead to a collision between the Harbour Board and the Municipal Corporation. He could not see any reason why the lands should not be handed over to the Harbour Board; and if that were done, the collision which he foresaw would be avoided. It was said that these revenues had been made use of as collateral security for raising money. He could not imagine that the persons who undertook to raise money were ignorant of the true position in which the lands stood, and they must have satisfied themselves that they were not giving illegal security to those who lent the money. The money was lent on the security of the rates; and if they looked for any further security than those rates, it was their own affair, and they must take the consequences. It had also been objected that this question came before Parliament at too early a date, and that the Harbour Board should have taken proceedings in a Court of law, in order to recover the lands. But he did not consider that the Harbour Board was in a position to take such proceedings. The Board had never got possession of the land—it was in possession of the Municipal Corporation. Therefore the question could not be tested in that way. It had been said also that the present Bill was totally different from the original Bill, which was introduced in another place. He had not seen the Bill as it was when originally introduced; but he thought, from what he had heard, that the object was to confirm the Corporation in their ownership of the lands. That fact, in his opinion, showed that there was some uncertainty about the ownership, and that it was doubtful whether the lands should belong to the Municipal Corporation or not. He was of opinion that the Council should decide the question in favour of the Harbour Board.

* The Hon. Captain FRASER, speaking to the amendment, would say that the Crown grant of the reserves was in the hands of the Superintendent of Otago, and that Crown grant would show very clearly that the land was merely given in trust to the Corporation. There would be no difficulty whatever in bringing the matter into a Court of law, because, if the claim of the Corporation was a good one, they could apply for a right of re-entry.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR said that, in common with nearly every member of the Legislature, his attention had been drawn to the dispute which existed with regard to these particular reserves. He had given the matter some consideration, and had come to the conclusion that it resolved itself into a simple question, on which any impartial person could come to a conclusion without any difficulty whatever. It did not appear to be denied that the original object was to set apart these lands as a reserve for wharves and quays. The only question was whether the lands had been transferred to the Corporation in such a manner as to divert them from their original purpose. If they looked at the Ordinance by which these lands were transferred—namely, "The Dunedin Reserves Management Ordinance, 1867"—they would find it was provided, in regard to this particular block,—

"That they shall be, and the same are hereby, transferred to and vested in the Corporation of the City of Dunedin . . . in trust for the like public purposes for which such lands are now held, which purposes are severally named and set forth in the said First Schedule hereto immediately before the lands to which they respectively apply."

That showed that when the lands were handed over to the Corporation they were so handed over in trust, and for the purpose for which they were originally intended. It was perfectly true that power was given to the Corporation to apply the proceeds of those lands to the general purposes of the Corporation; but it should be borne in mind that when the proceeds of those lands were handed over to the Corporation there was no Harbour Board in existence; and he presumed, therefore, that any work which required to be done in connection with the construction of wharves and quays would necessarily have fallen to some extent on the Corporation. Therefore the only question of difficulty in the matter was, whether the Corporation, having been intrusted with the proceeds of those lands, had so far acted in a proper manner with them. He thought the evidence which had been taken on that subject was very conclusive. He supposed that he would not be strictly in order in quoting from evidence taken by a Committee of the other House; but the facts appeared very plainly stated in the minutes of that Committee, which had been circulated amongst honorable members. It had been shown very clearly by the Town Clerk of Dunedin, who, he supposed, was interested on the part of the Corporation, that the proceeds of those lands were included in the published statement of the assets of the Corporation furnished to the Bank of New Zealand when applying for a loan in the Home market. It was quite clear that the Corporation had no power whatever to borrow money on the security of those lands, but solely upon their rates, and therefore the Council were relieved from responsibility as far as that was concerned. But now they were told that, if the land were taken from the Corporation, the advances that they had received would be materially affected thereby. Now, he would like to refer to the extent to which the security of the Corporation would be affected by the withdrawal of those lands at the present time. He found that the annual rents of the Corporation of Dunedin were estimated to be about £8,000 per annum, and of that amount the rents from the particular reserves referred to in the Act only amounted to something like £450 or £500 per annum. Thus it was only to the extent of £450 or £500 per annum that the security of the Corporation of Dunedin could be affected. Seeing that the Corporation had no legal title to borrow money on this security or to pledge the reserves, he thought the Council should not be bound in any way by the statement that the security of the Corporation would be affected. He thought it was perfectly proper and legitimate that those reserves which were originally set apart for wharves and quays should, now that a Harbour Board was formed, be handed over to that Board which was the proper body to have the control of them. He felt strongly of opinion that reserves intended for Harbour Trusts should not be diverted from the original purpose for which they were intended. As far as he had been able to learn, the only argument that was used in favour of handing the reserves over to the Municipal Corporation was this: Because the Harbour Board are going to spend a large amount of money in reclamation and wharf works, these reserves would be so far removed from the harbour that they should belong to the Municipal Corporation. But he held that, if it was the intention of the Harbour Board to expend large sums of money in the way referred to, they were all the more entitled to the proceeds of those lands specially set apart for such purposes. In conclusion, he would express the opinion that the Corporation should consider themselves fortunate in not being called upon to refund some of the moneys they had received from the lands in question. He would support the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE had but a few remarks to make on this subject. With regard to what had been said about the Committee, he, as a member of the Committee, would explain that the Committee were pretty equally divided on the question. The members were, he believed, four against three; but the question was decided on the voices. Voluminous evidence had been taken, and the Committee had spent a considerable time over it. The Hon. the Speaker (Sir J. L. O. Richardson) had given evidence before the Committee; and he (Captain Baillie) had spoken respecting the conditions on which the Corporation held the reserves, as follows:—

"These conditions are: (a) That the lands should be held by the said Corporation in trust for the like purposes for which such lands are now held—that is, for public wharves and quays. (b) That, with the sanction of the Superintendent, the Corporation may lease the said land for not exceeding twenty-one years, and (c) apply the rentals in accordance with section 94 of 'The Otago Municipal Corporations Ordinance, 1875:' that is, for Corporation purposes during trusteeship."

The Hon. the Speaker was referring to the time when the Ordinance passed the Provincial Council of Otago; and in the course of the debate which then took place in the Provincial Council on the subject, the Provincial Solicitor said that he would agree to amend the clause, as follows:—

"The lands and hereditaments mentioned and described in the first schedule hereto shall be, and the same are hereby, transferred and vested in the Corporation of the City of Dunedin and its successors as a corporate body, to be held by the said Corporation and its successors in trust for the purposes of public utility, which purposes are severally named and set forth in the said first schedule hereto immediately before the lands to which they respectively apply."

The "purposes of public utility" referred to meant the construction of wharves and quays. The Committee had heard the evidence of the Superintendent of Otago, Mr. Macandrew, and that gentleman thought it would quiet both parties interested if the reserves were given away to some third person. He did not like to commit himself to say what was the exact position of either body.

The Hon. Captain FRASER asked the honorable gentleman to read Mr. Macandrew's evidence, when he would find that he was not correct in what he said. At least, that was his impression.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE said he believed that Mr. Macandrew did suggest that the reserves should be handed over to some third party. Leaving that, however, he might say that the Bill was introduced into the other House in order to settle doubts which existed in the minds of the members of the Municipal Corporation as to whether they had power to deal with the reserves, and the intention of the promoter of the Bill was to give them that power. But the Bill was changed in the other House in such a way as to deprive the Corporation of that power altogether. He thought, after hearing the arguments which had been brought forward, and the statements made by the honorable gentleman who introduced the Bill into the Council, that the original intention of the trust was that wharves and quays should be constructed out of the proceeds of these reserves. When the reserve was originally made, there was no corporate body in existence; but now that a body had been constituted whose duty it was to supervise the erection of wharves and quays, and generally to attend to the improvement of the harbour, they naturally said, "This reserve was originally set aside for this particular purpose, and why should it not be applied to that purpose?" Reserves set apart for charitable and other objects were usually applied to the purposes for which they were set apart, and he saw no reason why there should be a departure from that principle in this case.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT.—Will the honorable gentleman read Mr. Stout's evidence?

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE said Mr. Stout's evidence was so bulky that it would probably encroach too much upon the patience of the Council to read it. It had, however, already been quoted from, and Mr. Stout had, according to his own view, given a very good idea of the state of the question. He (Mr. Stout) thought the Corporation should have the reserve, but other gentlemen thought differently, and it was no use wearying the Council by producing these opposing statements. A great amount of evidence had been taken, and, as far as he could see, the Harbour Board had the best right to the reserve.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said it would probably expedite matters if he said a few words in answer to the arguments advanced against the Bill. He thought the question as to the liability of these lands as security for loans might be regarded as disposed of entirely. They had the evidence of the gentleman who introduced the Bill in another form in another place, which showed that no security could be given either over the land or over the rents accruing from it; and whether it was right of anybody to float a loan upon the security of the reserve, knowing that it was opposed to the law of the colony that these reserves should be hypothecated, was a question which could best be answered by a financier, which he did not profess to be. The interests of the ratepayers had been referred to by the Hon. Captain Fraser, who said that his (Mr. Mantell's) interests would be prejudicially affected by the passing of this measure. The honorable gentleman could not deplore it more than he did, but, even with that prospect in view, he could not consent to the diversion of reserves from their original purposes, no matter what hope there might be of any amount of endowments reducing the rates. There was one other point he wished the Council to be clear upon, and that was that the christening of this reserve took place not during the term of office of Mr. Domett, but at a date far anterior to it. To remove any doubt as to the purposes for which this reserve was set apart, he need only state that the preamble of the Ordinance passed by the Provincial Council of Otago in 1854 distinctly set forth that at the foundation of the settlement of Otago the whole line of the water frontage of the chief town was reserved from sale, and this portion specially set apart for the purposes of wharves and quays. And then the enacting clauses went on to say that the administration of the land included in the water frontages should be invested in a board of trustees; and that all moneys accruing from the lands, after deducting expenses of management, should be applied to the construction and maintenance of public jetties and quays. There could be no doubt about that; and although he laughed at the idea of such an Ordnance being passed, it clearly being ultra vires, he did not laugh at it as not conveying accurately the impression of the original settlers of Otago in regard to these wharves and quays. It was perfectly right in that respect; and the only object of this Bill was to confirm the application of this property to the purposes for which it was originally set apart. He need not trouble the Council with any further remarks. Had it not been for the contest of opposite claimants, had it been left for decision upon common-sense grounds, six words would have been sufficient to induce the Council to consent to the second reading of the Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL said he was afraid that any remarks he might offer would not throw new light upon the subject. The matter appeared to him to be comprised within a very small compass, but nevertheless he desired to state reasons for the vote he was about to give. It had been stated that the subject should not be dealt with by legislation at all, that it should be settled by a Court of law; and they had been told by his honorable friend Colonel Brett that a lawyer had recommended the adoption of that course. He was not at all surprised at that advice, but the gentleman who recommended that the question should be settled in a Court of law, and who he believed was solicitor to the Corporation of Dunedin, had himself brought in a Bill which proposed that the question should be settled, not by a Court of law, but by Parliament. Therefore he could only conclude that the recommendation that the question should not be settled by Parliament was only arrived at when it became probable that the decision of Parliament would not be altogether favourable to the views of the gentlemen who brought in the Bill. When there was a question of this kind between two public bodies—rather than let them waste the public property in litigation, Parliament should not refuse to step in and remove the doubt. For that reason he should vote for proceeding with the Bill. The history of the case seemed simple. The reserves were originally set apart for the purpose of providing wharves and quays, and the document just read by the Hon. Mr. Mantell threw a great deal of light upon the intention and purposes of the reserves. It showed that they were made with deliberation. The title of the grant was not a mere fancy heading: the document was drawn up deliberately for the purpose of making due provision for wharves and quays, and in order that the proceeds arising from this property should be devoted to the improvement of the harbour. The property was, in the first instance, placed in trust in the hands of the Superintendent, there being at that time no Corporation in the city of Dunedin. Afterwards, when the Corporation was brought into existence, there was no Harbour Board, and it was very properly transferred to the only local body which existed. It was transferred on certain terms and conditions. The extract from the Proceedings of the Provincial Council of Otago, read by the Hon. Mr. Mantell, and the Ordinance which followed, transferred “the lands and hereditaments to the Corporation of the City of Dunedin and its successors, to be held by the Corporation and its successors in trust for a like purpose for which such lands are now held.” Although the Provincial Council was authorized to divert and alter the purposes for which this reserve was first granted—it might even have set it aside as a site for a theatre if it thought proper—yet it was clear that it had done nothing of the kind. On the contrary, it merely made the Corporation trustee, instead of the Superintendent, to manage the land for the purpose for which it was originally granted; further on the Ordinance provided that all moneys arising from the reserves should be applied and disposed of in the manner provided for in the Otago Ordinance of 1865. He had been unable to get that Ordinance, but he could not conceive that it was intended the proceeds of these reserves should be applied in a manner which would absolutely conflict with the previous clause, which did not give the land to the Corporation, but merely made them trustees. That being the case, he took it that the Corporation merely held the land in trust; and now that a Harbour Board had been created, upon whom it devolved to deal with all harbour questions, that body was perfectly justified in saying, “The time has now arrived when we should be made trustees. We shall make fitter trustees than the Corporation. We are intrusted with the improvement of the harbour, and any profits that may arise from these reserves, should be intrusted to us.” On broad grounds of justice, therefore, he thought they were called upon to pass the Bill as it now stood; and for these reasons, he should have pleasure in supporting it. It had been alleged that this property had already been made the subject of a mortgage. If that were the case, all he could say was that, unless the proceeds had been applied to improving the harbour, the Corporation, he thought, had been guilty of a breach of trust. They might as well mortgage property placed in their hands for educational purposes, and apply the proceeds to the formation of streets. It was given as a trust to be applied to harbour purposes, and they had no right whatever to apply the proceeds to any other purpose. He should support the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read a second time.

EDUCATION BOARDS BILL.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it had been found impossible for the Government, in this session, to mature and bring before the Legislature a complete and comprehensive measure relating to education that would be applicable to the whole colony. The approaching provincial change rendered it necessary to make some temporary provision for carrying on the business of education throughout the colony; and it was with that view that this Bill had been prepared. It had passed through the House of Representatives, where it was introduced by his honorable colleague the Minister of Justice. It proposed to maintain in all respects except one, which he should advert to presently, the systems of education now existing in the several provinces of New Zealand, and which have been established under Provincial Acts or Ordinances. The machinery necessary to be provided was proposed to be provided in this Bill. In most of the provinces there were Education Boards already in existence. In Hawke's Bay, Marlborough, and Canterbury, no Education Boards at present existed. In Hawke's Bay, the system was a very simple one. The management of education was under the control of the Provincial Government, and was carried on by Committees in the several districts, who placed themselves in communication with the Superintendent of that province. In Marlborough the Road Boards of the several counties and the Municipal Councils were the local School Boards. In Canterbury, until a recent date, there was an Education Board; but at present the administration was of a different character. A Secretary of Education was appointed by the Provincial Government, and local administration was provided for in the various districts. It was proposed, for the purpose of uniformity, that there should be Boards in all the provincial districts; and the Boards of those districts, when required, were nominated and appointed in this Bill. They would hold their office up to the first day of December of next year, before which time it was hoped that a general and comprehensive measure would be introduced into and passed by the Assembly. The principal change which this Bill proposed to make was that of abolishing household and general capitation rates wherever they existed, and retaining the school fees and capitation rates for children wherever they existed. The Government proposed, during the next half-year, from the 1st December to the 30th June, to provide the necessary funds from the land revenue to supplement the school fees or capitation fees. Powers were given to the Boards to deal with reserves made for education in the several districts. They would have a power of dealing with those reserves by leasing them for a period not exceeding twenty-one years, with the consent of the Governor. There was no new principle introduced into the Bill; it simply made provision for carrying on the work of education under the new system of government that would shortly come into operation. With these remarks, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT said he was under the impression that Provincialism was dead and buried to all intents and purposes; but he was sorry to see that Provincialism was now about to come to life again—to spring up like a phoenix from its ashes into positive vigour. He had been always under the impression that Provincialism was the thing of a past day, and that they would never hear of it again. He believed that this defunct animal was becoming decomposed, and would hereafter stink in the nostrils of every one throughout the country. It would be in the recollection of many members of the Council that, at this time last year, a Bill was brought into the Council to carry out very nearly the provisions of clause 5 of this Bill. That Bill was passed through the House of Representatives in a very hasty manner—indeed, he might say, an indecent manner. It was brought in late in the evening, passed through all its stages, and at two o'clock on the next day it was introduced in the Council. But after a long debate it was, he was happy to say, thrown out by a majority of one vote. He had the honor of being a member of the Provincial Council of Canterbury six or seven years ago, when the Hon. Mr. Hall was also a member, and what he was about to say he had no doubt his honorable friend would substantiate. Mr. Tancred had charge of the schools throughout the Province of Canterbury, having associated with him two other gentlemen. After performing this duty for two years gratuitously, and giving up the whole of his time, he, owing to the increase of schools, was obliged to resign his duties, which had become too onerous. A Board was then substituted. The constitution of the Board was very much opposed in the Provincial Council, and there was a very warm debate on the subject; but the Board was ultimately formed. However, the Board was formed, and it went on for two or three years, when it was found by the Provincial Council that it did not act well, and that its expenditure was lavish, and there was no responsible head. It was then decided that there should be a Minister of Education. That office had been in existence for two or three years; and a Bill was introduced into the Assembly last session for the purpose of turning out that Minister, owing to one or two gentlemen in the other branch of the Legislature having a dislike to him, and solely, he believed, from a feeling of animosity towards that gentleman. In this Bill, there was another attempt to do away with the Minister of Education. He would ask whether it was honorable, just, or fair to bring forward a Bill to abolish that appointment. It might be said that it was absolutely necessary to establish Boards throughout the country; but he would point out that there were departments throughout the colony—the Custom House and the Post Office—having heads who transacted the business of those departments with the General Government. There was no necessity for a Board in those cases; and why should not the Minister of Education in Canterbury transact the business of his department in the same way, and communicate with the General Government? He maintained that the proposed Board was self-constituted, and was a nominated Board, which he thought the Council ought to be very much opposed to. It might be said that this Minister was not a favourite, and was not the right man in the right place; but he was appointed by the Provincial Council, and it would be most indecent and a very discourteous act to remove him from his present position; and that gentleman was doing his work zealously, and devoting all his abilities and time to the carrying out of the duties of his office. It was true he was, with a cast-iron rule, striving to enforce the Education Ordinance, and that was the cause of very great dissatisfaction in Christchurch. For instance, when there were three or four members of a mercantile firm, he ordered them all to pay their rates, whether they lived in England or in the colony. That had given great offence in Christchurch, where the population consisted of shopkeepers and merchants; but in the outlying districts the Minister of Education was liked very much, and it was found that education in those districts was conducted more satisfactorily, and with less expense, than had formerly been the case under the Board. The members of the Board in former days were most lavish in their expenditure. In Gloucester Street, they erected a school to accommodate 800 scholars, for the enormous sum of £12,000, and the salaries of the staff of teachers amounted to £2,400 a year. Then, in the east of Christchurch, they built a school at an expenditure of £20,000. He believed it was called a Normal School, and it was intended for the instruction of teachers for the schools throughout Canterbury. There were ninety schools in the province, and let them say 10 per cent. of the total number of teachers would be required to fill up vacancies during the year, that would give perhaps nine or ten teachers a year who would be required. Was not such an expenditure disgraceful? The Normal School was a gigantic building. It more resembled a palace or an hospital in the great metropolis of London than a school. He considered it was, of course, necessary to have an Education Bill, but he would have put it into one clause, to this effect:—

"All Acts and Ordinances of any Provincial Legislature, relating to educational matters, shall, so far as the same are not expressly or impliedly altered or repealed by this Act, remain in force within the provincial district to which they relate, and shall be read with and incorporated with this Act."

Why should they disturb the Boards of Education throughout the different provinces? They were all working very well. Why disturb the existing Canterbury system, and put in its place this self-constituted Board? Were they all fit men to place upon an Education Board? He allowed that there were three or four very good men; but with the exception of two who were Presbyterians, they were all Episcopalians. That was what was called secular education—free education. In the former Board, nine out of ten of the members, with the Inspectors of the Schools, were Episcopalians. One of the members was a Roman Catholic gentleman, who sat on the bench in India. He objected to the school books, on the ground that they tended too much towards the Protestant religion; and the other members then made his seat so hot for him that he was obliged to resign. Amongst the gentlemen composing the proposed Board there was not one of special capacity. There were several very well qualified gentlemen in Canterbury. There was the Dean of Christchurch, who was one of the most eminent men and best scholars who left England for the colony. Then there were Mr. Veal, and a number of other gentlemen. He also thought that one of the Professors of the College or the High School should be appointed to the Board, instead of shopkeepers and men of that kind. In former days there were men on the Education Board who could not speak English, who dropped their "N's," and took indecent liberties with the genders. It was monstrous that this system should still exist. He only hoped that when the Bill was in Committee the portion referring to Canterbury would be struck out. He hoped the members of the Council who supported abolition would support his opposition to this Bill, because it was only bringing in Provincialism again for the time being.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL said his honorable friend rather surprised him when he asked honorable members who supported abolition to support him in this matter, seeing that his present action was undisguised Provincialism. What were the facts of this case? The honorable member seemed to be afraid this Bill would supersede the head of the Education Department in the Province of Canterbury. That gentleman was the political head of the department, and was called Minister of Education. He was one of the Provincial Executive who came in or went out of office according as the Provincial Council gave or withheld its support. They all knew that under the Abolition Act, at the close of the present session, Provincial Executives would come to an end, the Superintendents would come to an end also, the Provincial Secretary's place would know him no more, the place of the Secretary for Public Works would know him no more, and in like manner the place of the Minister of Education would know him no more. It was not this Bill, but the Abolition of Provinces Act, that would put an end to this office. He thought his honorable friend Colonel Brett had overlooked that fact. The abolition of the Provincial Government necessarily abolished the office of Minister of Education; and he took it that Parliament, when the Canterbury Minister for Education was done away with, must provide some other body to administer the work. He hoped, therefore, that the Hon. Colonel Brett would dismiss from his mind the idea that this Bill was a blow aimed at the gentleman referred to. He did not wish to introduce Canterbury differences to the Council; but he must set his honorable friend right with reference to the statement that the attempt made last year to pass through Parliament a Bill establishing a Board of Education in Canterbury originated in a feeling of personal hostility towards this particular gentleman. He assured his honorable friend that he was mistaken. It originated in this way: In the opinion of a great many persons interested in Canterbury, this system of having a department managed by a Minister of Education, instead of a Board of Education, did not work well; and as the Provincial Council was not allowed to meet, and could not bring about an alteration of the system and restore the Board, it was desirable it should be done by Parliament. There certainly was an opinion that the new system had failed; but there was no feeling of personal dislike to the individual. His honorable friend had accused the late Board of extravagance in buildings and in management. It was quite true that very large sums of money had been spent upon educational buildings in Canterbury—not so much, he thought, as his honorable friend had stated; but if anybody was responsible for that, it was the Provincial Council, which had appropriated its large revenues very liberally indeed for purposes of education. He thought great credit was due to the Provincial Council of Canterbury for having made very liberal provision for education; and if it had erred on the side of liberality, that was on the safe side, and it was an error which would not redound to its discredit when the history of the province was written. With regard to the proposed constitution of the Board, if his honorable friend would raise that question when the Bill was in Committee, he would be ready to meet him.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said it was clear enough that the object of the Bill was simply to provide machinery to carry out the educational departments in the various provinces until further provision was made, which he hoped would be made in the course of next session of Parliament, for some uniform system for the colony. But as the honorable gentleman who had just sat down remarked, as soon as the Abolition Act came into operation all the provincial administration must fall to the ground, and the educational departments in the various provinces would be in a state of anarchy, unless some provision of this kind for supervising the administration were made. It was in that light only that he regarded the Bill. If it were to be regarded as a permanent measure, or likely to continue for some time, it would be a most unsatisfactory one; but it simply kept the department going all over the colony until further provision was made. Looking at it in that light, he wished to put it to his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary, whether it would not be an improvement in the Bill to state specifically that, unless repealed before, it should cease to operate at the end of 1877. The 5th clause stated that there should be in every district a Board constituted "as herein provided," and such Board should hold office until the 31st October, 1877. He was not quite certain that would necessarily determine the administration of this measure, for he found that very clause seemed to conflict with a provision in the 6th clause. It was said that such a Board should be a body corporate, and further on that it should have perpetual succession, and provision was made in another place for the filling up of vacancies. Perhaps, on the whole, it would be less ambiguous to have an initial clause, stating distinctly that the Act should cease to have effect on a certain day.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR said that, seeing this Bill, as had been pointed out by the last speaker, was only to carry on the existing Education Boards, and make temporary provision until next year, he did not think it was one as to which they need enter upon any lengthy discussion. In some provinces, no doubt this was required. In regard to the Province of Westland, the Bill would practically make little difference there, as the Board was entirely removed from anything like political government, and would continue to carry on in the same way as before. The special point alluded to by the Colonial Secretary was one which he would rather have seen attempted in another direction. He would have preferred very much to allow the capitation rate to remain, and abolish the school fees and taxes upon children. That, he thought, would have been fair; but seeing that the matter was only for another year, when, he supposed, they might with confidence look for the introduction of a general measure applicable to the whole colony, he did not think it was worth while occupying the time of the Council by discussing the subject. Probably in Committee he would ask the Colonial Secretary to insert an additional proviso in connection with the question of reserves, some questions of a purely technical character having arisen in reference to the administration of an educational reserve which was now being very largely occupied by gold miners for mining.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN was glad to observe that there was a general acceptance of the Bill. His honorable friend Mr. Hall had, he hoped, satisfied the Hon. Colonel Brett that it was impossible to maintain the existing condition of affairs in Canterbury, for the reason that the Abolition Act came into force on the day next after the last day of the present session, when the Minister of Education in the Province of Canterbury would be divested of his authority. Supposing it were possible for him to remain, he (Dr. Pollen) was not sure whether his honorable friend himself would be disposed to intrust to his sole guidance, without any control whatever, the administration of the valuable educational reserves in the Province of Canterbury, and the entire charge of education in that province. That officer was at present a responsible Minister, and responsible to the Provincial Council. When the Council was abolished there would be nobody but him, and he would, to all intents and purposes, be practically irresponsible. That was a condition of affairs which his honorable and gallant friend, he was sure, would not view with satisfaction. With respect to the observations made by the Hon. Mr. Menzies, he thought the matter might very well be left as it stood. There was a positive purpose on the part of the Government that in the recess, and before next session, a general measure of education should be prepared, for introduction next session. They would be binding the Assembly in the future if they declared that at a particular time the nominated Boards should cease. There were certain functions of trust imposed upon these Boards, and, no doubt, in the future the administration of education would be carried on by Boards of some kind or another, which would be held to be in a line of descent, so to say, and the trusts imposed upon them would pass from one to the other.

Bill read a second time.

PORT MOLYNEUX RESERVES LEASING BILL.

This Bill was considered in Committee.

Clause 2.—The Board may lease.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR moved that this clause be omitted.

Question put, "That this clause stand part of the Bill;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Kaukapaka Telegraph—Grain Storage, Canterbury—Counties Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

KAUKAPAKA TELEGRAPH.

Mr. SHEEHAN asked the Postmaster-General, Whether the Government will give effect to the prayer of the petition of the settlers of Kaukapaka, in reference to opening a telegraph station in that settlement? He stated that the petition referred to was considered by the Public Petitions Committee, and by them referred for further consideration to the Government. The petitioners were willing to grant a site free of charge for the purpose of erecting a station at Kaukapaka; and as the settlement was becoming a very important settlement, it was desirable that they should have a telegraph station.

Mr. WHITAKER said he had made inquiry as to the cost of constructing the line and erecting a station, and he found that the cost of the station would be £450, and the annual cost of maintenance £150, and probably the amount which would be derived from it would not be more than £50 a year. Under these circumstances, he was not prepared to say that a telegraph station would be erected at Kaukapaka.

GRAIN STORAGE, CANTERBURY.

Mr. BOLLSTON asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Government propose to make provision for further storage accommodation for grain in the Province of Canterbury; and, if not, whether it will give facilities for the erection of stores by private enterprise at the several railway stations, and will give public notice of the terms on which such facilities will be given? He put the question in order to enable the Government to state plainly what course they proposed to take with regard to furnishing accommodation for storing grain in the Province of Canterbury. For three months in the year there was very great pressure, and the Provincial Government had, up to the present time, provided a large amount of accommodation; but the question had arisen as to whether it was the duty of the Railway Department to provide storage. If it was not, then no doubt private enterprise would supply the want. His object was to obtain from the Government a declaration which no doubt would be made known throughout the country by means of Hazard and the telegraph, and people would then make their arrangements accordingly.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the question was without doubt a very important one, and one to which the Government had given a great deal of attention. It was unquestionable that very much greater storage accommodation was required during the grain season in Canterbury; but the Government considered that the railways were made for the purpose of carrying only, and that the department should have nothing whatever to do with storage. The Government therefore did not feel called upon to provide storage accommodation for the farmers and merchants of the province. The Engineer-in-Chief reported that, with the exception of providing accommodation at the smaller stations which would be erected as the lines were extended, it would not be advisable to provide any increased storage accommodation. The only further accommodation which would be provided would be a large shed on the Gladstone Pier. With regard to the Canterbury railways, the opinion of the Engineer-in-Chief, in which the Government entirely coincided, had been communicated to the Canterbury railway authorities: that opinion being to the effect that every facility should be given for the erection of stores by private enterprise on the sidings at the railway stations. It was proposed that ground should be let at a nominal rent for this purpose, the right being reserved to the Government to remove the sheds from one part of the station to another without giving compensation, should the extension of the station arrangements require it. It was thought that the plan he mentioned would be the best and cheapest for providing the necessary accommodation for storing grain.

COUNTIES BILL.

The House went into Committee on this Bill. Clause 49.—Qualification of Chairman.

Mr. WHITAKER moved the addition of the following proviso: "Provided that at the first election any person qualified to be a member of the House of Representatives shall be qualified to be elected Chairman."

On the motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, the words "at the first election" were struck out of the amendment.

Question put, "That the proviso as amended be added to the clause;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

Bill reported to the House with amendments, which were agreed to.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I move, That the Bill be now read a third time.

Mr. BARFF.—Before that question is put, Sir, I wish simply to say that, in my opinion, the Bill is at the present time in a very unworkable form; and I would say, further, that had it not been for the assistance of the honorable member for the Thames, Sir George Grey, and the honorable member for Auckland City East, in the pains they have taken in proposing amendments when the Bill was passing through its various stages, the Bill would be more unworkable even than it is now. I make these remarks because the Government are, as it were, on their trial. They have had an opportunity such as they may never have again of introducing a form of local self-government that might redound to their own credit and for the benefit of the colony. That chance is, I fear, passing away; and I am sure that the Bill, as it at present stands, will not be found to be a great success. If this measure is ever to be a success, it will have to be a success at the outset. A very small amount of unpopularity at the commencement of the system may lead to a very wide-spread feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of the electors generally. The Government and some of their supporters may be of opinion, as they probably are, that if they can pass through any measure in any form during this session, they will have an opportunity of amending it next session; but I hold a different opinion. I say, Sir, that the people of New Zealand will decide as a body as to the merits of the measure between this session and the next; and they will decide whether the system is capable of amendment. Now, if the measure is to be a success, I say it will have to be put in a very different form from that which it is in at the present time; and I say, in regard to one particular principle of the Bill, that it is very likely that in some parts of the colony—I am not in a position to state what portions—the position of Chairman may be placed in the hands of persons totally inexperienced in all matters of administration. I say nothing can be more fatal to the success of a measure of local self-government than that such a thing as that should occur. People look not so much to the nature of the law as to its administration. They generally look to the administration to guide them as to whether a measure is good or not in principle; and I fear that, if this Bill is put into operation in its present form, the Government will not have an opportunity of amending it next session, as they now anticipate being able to do. I have been an Abolitionist for many years; and it was with great regret that I found myself in the unfortunate position during the last few days of having to go into the lobby opposite to the Government in connection with these matters. Ever since the second reading was proposed, I have held, as I then pointed out to the House and to the Government, that the measure did not meet with my approval, but I would do my best to reduce it to a workable form. I fear that the efforts of the House have not tended in that direction; and although I fear that the measure is not in a workable form, still I will hope against hope; and I trust that, although the measure does not at present meet with my approval, it may work out a better destiny than I at the present time see for it. It is most desirable that the people should have local self-government; yet the people of that government should be better than that which is proposed to be given to them in the measure now under consideration.

Mr. STOUT.—Sir, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, in order that the House may see, in the amended Bill as printed, what the amendments which have been made really are. You, Sir, have put the question that the Bill be read a third time; and I think the best thing to do is to adjourn the debate, in order that the various amendments which have been made may be fully known to honorable members, before the Bill is read a third time. I think that will be a proper course to adopt, for this reason: It is not wise that this House should pass an important constitutional measure such as this, without each member seeing the amendments made in the Bill. I believe that scarcely half a dozen in the House know what amendments have been made in Committee. Therefore I think the proper course would be to adjourn the third reading until Monday. The Government can then bring down the Bill in its amended form, have it read a third time, and send it to the Legislative Council the same day. No time could possibly be lost, because the Bill cannot be sent to the Legislative Council to-night. I therefore move, That the debate be adjourned.

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was consequently negatived.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I will not detain the House many minutes. I wish to state that, although I have taken no part while this Bill has been in Committee in opposing it in any shape or form, yet my refraining from doing so has not been by any means a consent to the County system as embodied in this Bill. I wish also to state that I think it is a great pity that the Government did not see their way to assent to the amendment moved by the honorable member for Taieri in Committee the other night. I think that if they had done so, they would have enabled myself and other members from Otago, and the people of Otago, to accept the Counties Bill. I fear that in neglecting to take that wise course, which would really have carried out their views—because it would have made the people participants in the Act for the formation of a new system of local self-government—they have raised what they little dreamed of, and that which their power will never be able to allay. I much regret the action of the Government in that respect, and I only rise to state that, for my part, as representing a constituency, my action in ceasing to oppose the Counties Bill after it passed the second reading is by no means to be taken as a consent to the Bill.

Mr. HODGKINSON.—I wish to say a few words by way of protest against the third reading of the Bill. I need not say anything in condemnation of it, inasmuch as one of the most ardent supporters of the Government, the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Barff), has made a speech which shows how easy it is for ignorance, folly, and presumption to pull down, and how hard it is to reconstruct. I will not say how hard it is for wisdom to reconstruct, because, in my opinion, there is no wisdom on the Government benches. I do not intend to take up the time of the House. I need only say that I thoroughly indorse all that the honorable member for Hokitika has said; but I do not feel the anxiety he does, because I think it will be a righteous retribution upon those who helped to pull down the old Constitution, while the Government they looked to is utterly incapable of putting anything suitable in place of that Constitution. I may also say, in passing, that I believe this new system of counties, which is supposed to take the place of the old Constitution, will never work; and also that I do not yet admit that the old Constitution is gone, inasmuch as I have a firm conviction—and, if no one else undertakes to prove it, I will myself endeavour to do so when the proper time comes—that this Abolition Act is utterly illegal and ultra vires, notwithstanding what has been said by the late Attorney-General. I think it must be in the recollection of the House that, within a very short time, that gentleman has given very confident opinions, which he has had to retract by actions, if not by words; and I have no doubt that, before twelve months have elapsed, we shall find the honorable gentleman going to the Imperial Parliament for a Validation Act with regard to abolition.

Mr. REES.—In opening the remarks I have to make upon this Bill, I think honorable members of the Ministry ought to see that it is impossible to argue upon the third reading of this Bill without having the Bill before us. There have been so many alterations in this measure itself, and in the schedules, in the provisions of the Bill, and in its principles, that I think the proposition suggested by the honorable and learned member for Dunedin City is but a reasonable one—namely, that the Bill as amended should have been circulated and in the hands of members prior to the third reading. This Counties Bill is the most important of the constitutional measures which the Government propose to take the place of the old provincial system. There are the Counties Bill, the Financial Arrangements Bill, and one or two other laws by which they propose to fill up the vacuum caused in our Constitution by the destruction of the provinces; and of all those measures the Counties Bill is the most important; and now after passing it through Committee, after having amended it in very many respects, after it has been reported to you, sir, and through you to the House, the third reading is moved without the House having an opportunity of knowing what the amendments are. Sir, I do not suppose that any single member of the House is aware of the amendments that have been made. I do not think there is a single member of the House who could now take up the Bill as it was first printed and point out where amendments have been made, and especially in the schedules, without having those amendments before him. In relation to the Bill itself, I need not say that I shall oppose the third reading on the same principle on which I opposed the second reading. I object altogether to the Bill because it pretends to provide—I use the word “pretends” in its proper sense, as a mere pretence—it pretends to provide the substitute for the old provincial form of government by which what is called local self-government is to be given to the people. This Counties Bill provides no self-government whatever. It is not self-government to have the control of rating, or the power of making roads and bridges. If that be self-government, all the colony need have would be power to rate itself for the making of roads and bridges. Government is a very different thing from that. To put such a Bill as this into law as providing a substitute for the old provincial system, which was, at all events, a species of self-government, and the only argument against which was that it was not distributed enough, as it were, in the different localities—I say, to put a Bill like this in its place seems to me nothing more than a mockery. The honorable member for Hokitika, Mr. Barff—and I am sorry there are not some other honorable members who are ready to take the same independent position he took—alluded to the efforts made by the honorable member for the Thames, Sir G. Grey, for the purpose of improving this Bill; and I was rather surprised to see on the faces of one or two honorable members a sort of laugh in relation to that statement. Honorable gentlemen who are here present in this House will remember that the whole of the amendments, or nearly the whole of the amendments which have been made in this Bill while it was going through Committee, were suggested by the honorable member for the Thames. I myself had the honor to point out one or two in clauses which could not have been worked by any possibility without amendment; but all the amendments which the Government supporters or the Government themselves introduced amount to a mere nothing, whereas anything that has tended to make the Bill workable, and to make the sections sensible, has originated with the honorable member for the Thames. He has been accused of taking up time unnecessarily, of delaying the business of the country, and of raising factious objections; and yet, in very many instances, his suggestions have been attended to by the Government, and those suggestions have been incorporated in the Bill. And yet all the thanks he gets is that he is accused of taking up the time of the House; and when it is said that improvements are owing to him, honorable members are inclined to smile. I have not heard from any members of the Committee any efforts really to amend the Bill, except those made by the honorable gentleman and one or two other persons. As it stands now, the Bill is unworkable, and it will be found that several of the sections cannot be made sense of as read with other laws—that they will not work and cannot work. I myself saw one or two; but I got called to order so often in Committee for insisting upon amendments, and was so frequently told that I did not know what I was speaking about,—although the honorable member in charge of the Bill agreed that his clauses were wrong and made amendments in them,—that I got rather tired of making suggestions, and trying to make the Bill workable when it became law. The only reward I got was outcries of "Question, question," and honorable gentlemen getting up and saying "Any person could understand the section," and that I was only delaying the business of the country. I need merely point to the 62nd section, which literally provided that the County Council, after passing certain resolutions under the 12th section, should simply act as a distributing body amongst the road districts and outlying districts; when all the time it was very obvious that there was no machinery for those districts to receive or spend any money. When I pointed that out, the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe) and also the honorable and gallant member for Marsden got up and said that anybody could understand the section, that it was perfectly intelligible, and that I was only obstructing the Committee. Even now, although the Postmaster-General has added certain words to the section which do not appear in the copies of the Bill which members now have in their possession—namely, that certain persons should be appointed to spend the money in the outlying districts—that addition will not make the section workable. I say that if the people once pass a resolution under the 12th section, they will not take any trouble in the matter, because by that resolution the Act will not come into force in their district. Some of my suggestions have, I think, been good suggestions, and I have heard no good arguments against them; and yet they were passed by without any notice in the Committee. All I have to say now is, that any amendments which would make this Bill workable sprung from the honorable member for the Thames; and I myself have done what I could in good faith to find out the faults in the Bill, and point them out in order that the Committee might if possible make it a workable measure. But I disagree with the principle altogether. It does not give local self-government in any sense, shape, or form. The Municipal Corporations Act gives far more local self-government than this Bill, and it has been in force for many years. The Road Boards have quite as much local self-government as this Bill gives, and they have been in existence for a great many years. All the difference between the County Councils and the Road Boards at present in existence is that they have larger powers of borrowing, of levying rates, of taking charge of public libraries, charitable institutions, and places of public recreation; and that is all. There is nothing more than that. I would ask, is that giving real local self-government to the people? That is not what the people want. We have heard a great deal about the outlying districts requiring real local self-government. Why, Sir, the outlying districts have nothing of that kind provided in this Bill. There is nothing at all for them here. There is, indeed, a provision that they may bring themselves under Road Boards; but they always had that power. They could have constituted themselves road districts long before this Bill was thought of. Therefore this measure proposes no machinery for the outlying districts by which the principles of local self-government can be carried out there. After all the talk about outlying districts being cared for, and having their wants supplied and their wishes and desires attended to, there is not a word in this Bill which provides for the outlying districts anything more than they ever had before under the laws now in existence. I want to know, therefore, what the merit of this Bill is; what we have been spending so much time about on this Bill, if this is all that is to take the place of the old Provincial Legislatures? If it attempted to provide for the outlying districts, and, in fact, for all the districts of the colony as it ought to do, powers by which the people could govern themselves in reality, then there would be something to say in its favour. If it extended powers to the Provincial Councils, by which the people through their representatives could rule themselves, as they do in the Cantons of Switzerland and in parts of the States of America, and as they did, indeed, under the old provincial system, then something might be said in its favour. But there is nothing of that sort here. After all the time which we have devoted to the measure, it simply comes to this: that New Zealand is split up into different parts, called counties, which have the power of levying rates in their districts to make roads and bridges. And they have this further responsibility which the people have never yet had: that this House can compel them to levy rates to make such roads and bridges as the House pleases—that is, that this House or the Governor can fix upon certain roads and bridges to be made, and can then compel the people to tax themselves to make them. That is not a very great privilege. I very much doubt if the people will thank their representatives for that. We may be sure that as time goes on they will ask what benefits have been given to them under this Bill, what burdens they will get relieved from which were cast upon them by the old provincial institutions. I am sure there is not a member of this House who can say that any benefit will be conferred upon them by this Bill, or that they will be relieved from any of the burdens that they were called upon to bear under the old provincial system. I say I entirely object to the principle of the Bill, and I do not like it to pass the third reading without stating my objections to the principles upon which it is framed, and to the provisions which it makes. We have seen this session measures repealed which were passed with great acclamation in previous sessions, and I say that in some future session we shall see this measure repealed in the same way as we have seen the Forests Act repealed. That was the measure of which this present Bill is the outcome. There was a great flourish about the introduction of that measure. That was a measure which was to advance the country in material power in every sense, to confer a lasting benefit upon the people, to pay our debt; and yet only two days ago we saw it repealed. Although the Government, strong as their hold is upon their followers, went into the lobby to preserve part of it, as I did also, still a majority of 2 to 1 were in favour of repealing it altogether. It was looked upon as a sham

—it was looked upon as a piece of deception—it was looked upon as a false principle—it was looked upon as inexpedient in the interests of the country, and looked upon as a gross mistake in ever having been passed by this House at all. That was the Bill which was to do such very great things for the country, and, as has been very happily suggested to me, which was, in addition to everything else, to pay off the whole debt of New Zealand. Here we have a Bill which does not profess to do that: it only professes to tax the people, and put other increasing burdens upon them. Let honorable gentlemen look at this Bill. Here we have sixty different counties. This is doing away with Provincialism with a vengeance. It does not do away with provincial districts; it does not do away with all the burdens of Provincialism. Under the Abolition Act, it still keeps in every province or provincial district the expenditure of provincial funds, and the exercise of provincial powers not by the elected Superintendents of the people, but by the Governor or persons appointed by him. It keeps everything which might be called oppressive under the Constitution Act and under provincial existence in New Zealand. But this Bill improves upon it. It says that there shall be sixty-five, or at any rate between sixty and seventy—I do not know the exact number of County Councils; sixty-five County Chairmen paid out of the county funds; sixty-five County Treasurers, to be paid out of the county funds; the travelling expenses of about 600 gentlemen, who will be members of the County Councils, to be paid out of the pockets of the people. This Bill, in fact, is an overburdening of debt and of expenditure upon the people. And what for? Simply to enable them to build a few bridges and make a few roads; and when they refuse to put their hands in their own pockets to expend a very great amount of money, then this House is to step in and order them to do it, and compel them to raise funds in order to pay for those works. Why, I am astonished at members of this House voting for such a thing. They have a sort of abolition on the brain. The whole country too, during the last year, had a species of abolition on the brain. This was got up by two or three continually crying out, by the expenditure of public money, and by the Government being strong enough and borrowing millions to corrupt the whole country. It is just the same as if in Great Britain about £1,000,000,000 had been spent; and that would not be so much in comparison as if the Ministry of the day had that within a few years at its disposal. The Government had all the gifts of office in their power, with all the enormous bribes that could be offered to municipalities, to districts, to counties, as well as to individuals. Then the provinces stood in the way of this tremendous corrupting power of the Government; and so the provinces were doomed to go, in order that the Government might be able to bribe, and the people able to receive bribes. So the provinces were doomed, and this abolition crept up. Why, the gentlemen who talk in this House about abolition, and who come here pledged to abolition, do not know what it means. They have never thought about it. They have never reasoned the thing out in their own minds. They have never gone to work to see what institutions they are doing away with, and what they intend to put in their place. They have heard the cry for abolition—that the provinces were in the way—so they have come here elected to vote for abolition, though they cannot tell you why. I could point out plenty of members in this House who could not give a single reason why abolition should take effect. I would undertake to argue the question out with any honorable gentleman in this House or any half-dozen, before any dispassionate umpire, and in an hour I would show that they do not know anything about the subject they talk on. If any half-dozen gentlemen choose to take up my challenge outside of the House, I am perfectly prepared. They come up simply pledged to their constituents to vote for abolition. Surely that is but a poor foundation for the alteration of the whole Constitution of the country. Why, if we take any of the great writers—though I am sorry to say that some of the people, who ought to do so, do not care to study great writers or great thinkers—but if they will take the trouble to refer to them, they will find it stated that it is the most dangerous thing in the world to interfere with the government of the country. They will find it is one of the most pregnant sources of disaffection. Bacon, for instance, tells us that it is the most fruitful source of disaffection and danger in a country when the Constitution under which the people have lived is being interfered with. He places it at the very head and front of all the dangers to which a country may be subjected. And in every country it has been the same. It was the most fruitful source of trouble in India, and was the cause of the Indian Mutiny. We find, even where countries conquer others, they do not destroy their Constitution. Even when, with the power of the sword, they have subdued other countries, they still leave them their government subject to certain restrictions. Look, for instance, at the conquest of Canada by the English! They left the Canadian Government as it was before. Take even ancient times. When ancient Powers made conquests, they nearly always left the Constitution to the country that they conquered. Take the history of Rome, and you will find that in nearly every instance where any country became subject to the Roman power through conquest—except in a case like that of Carthage, where destruction ensued—the old laws and the old government was still carried on. I have no doubt it is a great matter of amusement to some honorable gentlemen. If they would try and exercise their brains a little, instead of simply laughing or smiling when these things are spoken of, perhaps it would be better. But the mere fact of being pledged to a certain cry—a parrot sort of cry—without thinking or reasoning, seems to be amply sufficient for honorable gentlemen to come here and determinedly to go on voting, voting, voting in the direction in which, in this instance, they pledged themselves. Of course honorable gentlemen may say they were elected on a certain platform, and therefore they are bound to carry that out. I can understand that. But if that be the whole of it, let it be publicly stated so, that the people may know; but do not let us have this fact: that the people believe in the virtue of a thing which they do not understand, and which really has no virtue in it. Under the old provincial system, men had local self-government. They had the power of making laws within the provinces. They had the power of redressing grievances within the provinces. I hear some honorable gentleman say "No." I do not know whether he knows anything about it or not; but if he will look at the Constitution Act, and at the Constitution of every province, he will see that the provinces had the power of making laws and of governing themselves; and of course, under the restrictions of the 19th section of the Constitution Act, they had the power of redressing their own grievances. Why, petitions that have come up here from the provinces and gone before the Public Petitions Committee could, dozens and scores of them, have been properly treated by the Provincial Councils, and they ought to have been treated there. They were matters relating to the province, and not to the whole colony. And then, in relation to all other things—the daily laws under which men had to live within the boundaries of the distinct provinces—they had the power to regulate all those things. And will any one tell me that in all local matters the Provincial Councils were not better fitted to deal with those questions than this Assembly? What do we find here every day? Honorable members from Canterbury say they must appeal to the sense of justice of the House to defend Canterbury against other people. Would that happen in the Provincial Council? Not at all. There they have to look out for their own business and their own matters—things which in their own limits and within their own boundaries affect them and nobody else. The same with Otago. Every day we hear the Otago people complaining bitterly of injustice. We hear the same of Auckland. The people of Auckland complain bitterly of injustice meted out to them here. Things which could never have happened in the Auckland Provincial Council have happened here this session. Would any one suppose, for instance, that the Provincial Council would take action in regard to our lands such as has been taken here? Does any gentleman suppose that the Piako Swamp affair could have passed in the Auckland Provincial Council? Not at all. No man would have dared to stand up there to propose such a transaction. He might have proposed it, but he would very soon have found what the feelings of the people of Auckland and of the Provincial Council were. It is the same in regard to the management of our other local matters. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, a Bill was brought down to this House by which several gentlemen in Auckland, who had spent £2,000 or £3,000 of their own money in erecting a museum, asked to be relieved of another £2,000 or £3,000 liability by being permitted to borrow on mortgage. The Bill was passed in this House, but in another part of the Legislature it was turned back again. In the Auckland Provincial Council it would have been passed at once, because every one there knew all about it. But here, when local matters come up, I do not care from what province, they are decided by members who know nothing about them. Take the largest province. There are 22 members from Otago. When an Otago Provincial Council matter is brought up, the 22 members from that part of the country have 66 members against them—members who know nothing about the matter. The 22 members, of course, are utterly powerless, if the others happen to take a whim into their heads. The same with Auckland. We have 20 members, including the members of the Native race. Our 20 members might be unanimous; but if the members from the other provinces are against us, our interests are gone to the wind in a moment. The honorable members in this House who have been with the majority this year—the members from Wellington, the members from Nelson, and the members from the West Coast—will find that exactly the same thing will happen to them. They will find, when the best interests of their districts are at stake; when they want the expenditure of public money; when they want something done which they could easily have had done within their own borders, they will come up here, and people will say naturally enough, not with any desire to injure them, but simply because of ignorance of the whole subject, "This ought not to have been done at all. Let it go." What have we had here to-night? The honorable member for Buller complaining bitterly that in the map of the counties his district has been injured.

Mr. BARFF.—So has ours.

Mr. REES.—There is another—the honorable member for Hokitika, whom, as I have said outside of this House and now repeat, I was glad to hear to-night make sensible and independent remarks about this very Bill. Honorable members who fancy, because they happen to be in the majority to-day, that they will be able to carry what they know to be for the interests of their districts and what their districts have a right to, will find exactly the same measure meted out to them in the days to come. Those who have been in the past most favourable to abolition will be the most bitterly opposed to it in the future. Honorable gentlemen will find that their toes are trodden on, that their sensitive organs are easily touched. They will find that the true interests of their districts are neglected; that whereas, when the provincial system was in vogue, they were able, within the bounds of their own provinces, to do these things for themselves, they will meet with very scant hope here of getting those things done for them which they know to be right. Sir, this is the local self-government which we are to have. I know, from conversations I have had with members of this House to-night, that, if they had heard the arguments against abolition before they had pledged themselves to abolition on the hustings, if they had heard the arguments that have been used in the House this session, they never would have so pledged themselves. A great number of them say so; and I believe that those who do not say so—

HON. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. REES.—There are sure to be some gentlemen stupid enough not to feel the force of argument. I believe that is quite a parliamentary expression. Sir, there may be some gentlemen who would not yield to argument at all, and some who would not be able to see the force of argument. I think there are honorable members in this House it would be very difficult to enlighten; and I am very glad to think that all those are on the Abolition side. I ask honorable members who came up here in this way pledged to this cry and this sort of thing, What do they expect to get for the people, for their districts and their constituencies? I do not know what they expect to get, but I know what they will get. They will get increased taxation, and will find the wants and wishes of their constituencies utterly neglected. They will gradually see this; and they will see in this House a Ministry utterly overworked in attempting to carry on the business of the country; and things will be passed by in a rush and hurry in order that gentlemen may get to their homes. We have been four months here, and what have we done? We have not got the Government financial measures before us yet.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—Why not?

Mr. REES.—Ask the Government, "Why not?" The honorable member for Christchurch says it is my fault.

Mr. PYKE.—So it is.

Mr. REES.—I think the accuracy of that honorable gentleman's assertions generally is pretty well known to this House. I do not think there is a single member of this House who, if the honorable member were to go on asserting a thing all night, would believe it a bit more than if he had held his tongue. I think some honorable members themselves have taken up a certain amount of time in being called to order in this House. Why, Sir, honorable members really should not expose themselves to the ridicule which comes upon them. Of course, we who are here know their little idiosyncracies and peculiarities; but they have got to such a pitch that, however ridiculous they may make themselves, or whatever objects they may make themselves, they cannot bring themselves lower in the estimation of most honorable members than they already stand. But in a deliberative Assembly it is a pity to hear honorable gentlemen make such statements, or be guilty, in fact, of such acts as some of these gentlemen are.

Mr. PYKE.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable member justified in making such assertions? Is he justified in charging honorable members with making statements that are not to be relied upon?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am bound to say I think the honorable member has been transgressing. Of course, remarks of this kind only lead to retorts; and they cannot form part of an argument.

Mr. REES.—With your permission, Sir, I will find in the debates of the House of Commons and the House of Lords far stronger remarks than those I have used. I would like to know what you would define as transgressing, if you permit me to ask.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is a thing which cannot be defined; it is a matter of taste. I have said, and I do think, that the honorable member, in making personal allusions of this kind, is transgressing usual parliamentary etiquette.

Mr. REES.—All I can say is, I do so in company with Pitt and Burke, and the greatest men in the British Parliament. I will produce, if necessary, terms ten times as strong. As to a matter of taste, I am perfectly prepared to take whatever verdict the public or educated gentlemen may give upon my taste. Sir, if I am to be called to order by the honorable member for Dunstan in this way, when I am simply replying to interruptions from him, I would like to know what form of speech I am to use here; or any one else. If you rule I am out of order, I am bound to accept your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have ruled the honorable member out of order, and I have endeavoured to explain the reason why I did so.

Mr. REES.—I will not repeat the statements I have made. I do not know to what you address your ruling, that I am out of order, Sir. The honorable member is even now interrupting me, and such interruptions, when I am speaking, are indecorous. I am a member of this House, and represent a constituency; and if I am not to express, within parliamentary bounds, the ideas and views I have, I will leave this Chamber. If that is to be the position of honorable members here, the sooner they go to their constituencies, it seems to me, the better. I was stating that honorable members put themselves in a position which other members of this House may be sorry to see them take up. I am sure that we have not been in the House this session without seeing that, and acknowledging it. I ask why it is that there has been no single important measure, except this Counties Bill, decided within this four months? We have been nearly four months here. Where is the Government finance? We know nothing about it. The Premier was going to make a financial statement to-night; but instead of that, what has he done?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REES.—I am very glad to hear the honorable member. He is not often here to say "Hear, hear." He seldom comes here but to interject "Hear, hear," in a very loud voice, and I do not think he takes much part in the business of the House.

Mr. PYKE.—Not in wasting time.

Mr. REES.—I do not know what the honorable member may consider a waste of time. If there be a waste of time, it is to see the Ministry going on month after month without being prepared to bring before the House even the financial measures requisite to carry on the government of the country. I say this is evidence of one of two things. It is evidence that the Government do not intend to bring forward their finances till the last moment, in order that they may rush them through at the last; or evidence that the business of this House cannot be got through within a moderate time. Why, there has not been an Order Paper on any day which has not been groaning beneath financial and local matters. Any honorable gentleman can see who chooses to look at the Order Paper even for to-day, that more than three-fourths of the measures are local, not private exactly, but local measures that ought to be dealt with in the Provincial Councils. The business of the House will be loaded by bringing all these provincial and local matters here; and that means an accumulation of business which honorable members will not be able to get through in six months. After all, it may be that we shall have the House sitting here to repeal the Abolition of the Provinces Act, the Abolition policy, the County policy, and all these other policies. We shall have, I believe, the business of the House dragging for six or seven months every year; and the consequence will be that members will not be able to afford to represent their constituencies—they will not be able to afford the time. Such gentlemen as those who are here now, professional men and business men, will not be able to give up six months of the year to represent their constituents. They will have to give it up; and the representation of the people will be thrown into the hands of those who come here to make a trade of it, or those who come here absolutely independent of all circumstances—that class is but a very small one in the colony—who will give up their time for the public good. This, I suppose, is the benefit we are to obtain from the Abolition policy; and at the same time we are to have the whole administration of everything centred in the Ministry here in Wellington. It is all very well to talk about local self-government as distributing everything among the people; but there is no distribution in local self-government such as this provided by the Bill. There is no care of the gaols, or of the police, or of any departments. Their management is not put upon the country; but everything will have to be done in Wellington. Provision is made for the hospitals; but I believe that has been done because they will entail expense. I do not know whether they are to be controlled locally or not. Eleemosynary aid is to be given simply because the Government will not retain the expense of them. That is all. The conduct of affairs and the government of New Zealand must always take a great deal more time than in any other colony, owing to the number of centres of population; and yet we shall all have to be governed from Wellington. Those who are determined to carry out this principle of abolition would be wise first of all to see what benefit they are to gain for New Zealand, what benefits they are to gain for their districts, what benefits they are to gain for their constituents. I say none. It is for these reasons I have objected, do object, and always shall object, to this Counties Bill, or to any measure which does away with the provincial system; because by doing so it takes away the real local self-government given by the Constitution Act. Sir, I appeal again to the fact that next week we shall have been four months here, and actually to-night is the first night upon which we are to receive the Financial Statement of the Government. We have not got into Committee on the Waste Lands Bill. We have only just got through the Counties Bill; and there are four or five important Bills of the Government required yet to make their new Constitution. What we have done has taken four months, and I should like to know how long it is going to take to get through. It is all very well to say the Opposition take up the time of the House; but if all the Opposition had walked out of the House, and the other members had remained and did their duty, they would certainly have disagreed in Committee about the clauses in this Bill—that is, if they desired to see it framed in such a manner that the country could be governed by it. If passing Bills is simply to cover sheets and pages with printed matter, and to get through Bills with a great number of clauses without considering what the effect of them would be, that is an easy matter, and the Committee would get through any amount of Bills in a week; but this is a question of securing the proper government of the people, and we are here, as the representatives of the people, to see that the laws passed and the measures here adopted are such as will conduce to the public welfare and the proper carrying on of the government of this country. We are making a new, and, it seems to me, a dreadfully retrograde step. We are not taking a step in advance, not promoting the liberties of the people in any respect whatever. We are taking away rights from the people, conferring a franchise upon property, and destroying the liberties of the people. We are taking away the liberties of the people altogether by this Bill. An honorable member says "No." I do not think he knows very much about it, or else he would not say so. There is a very old saying in the Bible, but it will not apply, of course, to any honorable member: "The way of a fool is right in his own eyes." I am glad to hear that the honorable member appropriates it. If this Bill is passed, I believe it will be relegated to the waste-paper basket before very long; because I do not believe that the people, with the advanced political education they have received, will accept such a sham as this in lieu of their old institutions. I believe that even the members of this House who vote for this Bill will yet see the difficulties it will produce, and will not expect the people to be governed by it. The Bill, in my belief, is bad. I have tried to make it workable in many parts in which I believed there were errors, so that they might be remedied. I have not seen the Government very willing in many cases to accept my advice, although in the end they have taken the hints given to them, and to some extent made the alterations suggested to them. I do not believe that any amendment would make this Bill satisfactory to the people, who have been told, over and over again, that abolition of Provincialism was to give them very increased power, and they have looked for it. They would fain believe that what had been done will be for their benefit and not for their harm, not the restoration of their liberty but the extension of it. When they find, Sir, that they have been deceived in their expectations, and when the hopes which they have formed have faded into thin air, they will naturally be indignant. We can only expect that that will be the result. I hope the House will not pass the third reading of this Bill. I hope, if it is to be passed, that those who vote against it will call for a division, in order that it may be seen who the members were that foresaw the failure of the concern, and had the courage to stick to their convictions until the end.

Mr. REID.—I would just like to say one or two words before I am called on to give my vote on this question. I cannot say that I am enamoured with this Bill; it would be very strange indeed if I were so. I look upon it, Sir, that the Bill will not supply the place of the institutions that we have swept away. But, at the same time, having, as far as in my power, done everything I could to prevent the change that this House has determined on; and having been unsuccessful in my efforts in that direction, I then endeavoured, to the best of my ability, to shape this Bill in accordance with my views; but I must say that in that respect I have also been unsuccessful. I cannot agree to have no intermediate form of government between this House and the people. Under these circumstances, I must say my position has been a very difficult one, because I recognized in this Assembly three parties. I recognized the Abolition party, who are desirous of giving some form of government between the central Government and the Road Boards, or rather the people, because the Road Boards in the Province of Otago would not be sufficient to carry out a system of government that the provincial form of government had to carry out. I recognized another party, composed partly of Abolitionists and partly of Provincialists, who, seeing that we are to have abolition, are prepared to have nothing between the people and this House. I recognize that as the party who wish to have a common purse for the colony. Well, Sir, I am not prepared for that position. I recognize that the districts of the colony should still retain control over the revenue. Having failed to carry out my own views, I was forced to accept that which comes nearest to them, even this poor form of government, as I would call it, even this poor and insignificant, and I fear useless form of government, as between the people and this House. Sir, this Bill does not give the revenue, but it provides the machinery whereby the revenue can be expended. There are other Bills yet to come before the House, and we shall have the power, each according to his ability, of urging our views as to what revenue should remain available for these bodies. I could have wished that we had been allowed, in the province from which I come, to have had a Board of Works. I could have wished that we had been allowed so much: for I conscientiously believe and am persuaded that that Board of Works would have been a more effective form of government, a more economical form of government, one that would have given greater satisfaction to the people, and which would have provided a machinery of government for the whole districts. If any district chooses not to come under this Bill, how are we left? We are left with one part of the country under a form of government, and another part of the country without any government at all between it and Centralism. It is possible that there may be parts of the country that will not come in. I would say with regard to this Bill that there are one or two of its provisions that will require very great care on the part of Ministers when forming these counties; and one of these parts is that which relates to the division of the counties into ridings. I hope the Government will take very great care as to that matter, before issuing the necessary Proclamation—that they will not be guided entirely by professional men or surveyors, but that they will be guided by the opinion of the people themselves. It would be well to have Committees formed, and to allow the Committees of the districts to give their opinion. Let the ratepayers of the districts have some voice in the division of the counties into ridings. Another important section of the Bill is that which limits the number of ridings to nine. I think that that provision will tend very greatly to prevent the union of districts; for how can you expect two counties of any area to unite and still only retain the same number of representatives at the County Boards? I fear that the provincial system is pretty well abolished. I cannot shut my eyes to that fact. Some are more sanguine than myself, and perhaps their views are more correct. If the provincial system is abolished, I venture to say that gradually we shall work back to something that will very closely resemble it. I believe the provisions of this Bill will not meet the requirements of this country, which is altogether different from any country that we have to compare with it in regard to the administration of affairs. All our large communities are remote from the centre, and are more important than this centre in regard to the larger interests of the communities that have to be cared for. I say these remote centres will never consent to have their affairs administered from here, and have nothing left to them but such powers as are given under this Counties Bill. You will find that the counties, when established, will at once agitate for more power of local control than is given by this Bill. That greater power will have to be given, I believe, to such bodies as I in common with others endeavoured to urge the Government and this House to give now—namely, Boards of Works. These Boards of Works would be advantageous to the Government itself—would be advantageous in the way of giving advice on many matters, and assistance in opening up the waste lands by forming roads to them, which these separate counties could not undertake. There are many matters which I need not enumerate now which would be very well left to the control of these Boards. I believe that Parliament, after we have had a little experience of counties, will go in that direction. I am loth to take up the time of the House, as more important business will come before us to-night; but I was not prepared to go to a division without giving these reasons for the vote which I shall give. I intend to vote for the third reading of the Bill, although I cannot say that I very much approve of it.

Mr. HENRY.—I am not now going to trouble honorable members with my opinions on this Bill. I have only to say that I cannot support a thing which has done so much damage to my constituents. I say that in order to explain the vote which I shall give.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The Opposition are now availing themselves of a fair parliamentary privilege—that, I mean of speaking shortly on this measure on the motion for reading it a third time. This is a privilege which exists in all legislative Assemblies, in the interest of the Government as well as in the interest of the Opposition. We are now arrived at the end of two years' consideration of the Abolition Bill, and the upshot of it all is this tattered malion business—the Counties Bill. I am reminded of one of the first lines that one learns in the Latin language—

"Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus."

This Bill is the result of the great labour of the Assembly for three sessions. I take leave to say that next session of this Assembly we shall be more provincial than ever. The people will have had experience of the operation of this Counties Bill, and their representatives will come back here pledged, I believe, to repeal it bodily, in the same way that they repealed the measure which led to the Abolition question being raised. What a commentary was our last night's proceedings upon a measure which created so much mischief, which paralyzed public business—a measure which kept us from scrutinizing the finance of the colony, which sheltered the Public Works system from investigation! That measure passed away last night almost without a groan—dropped, I may say, out of existence; and even those who were supporters of the Bill had not the decency to shed a tear. Some two years ago, the game of the arch-performer was nearly played out, and it became necessary to stir up some new sensation whereby the public of the colony should be diverted and kept from its real business—some Will-o'-the-wisp, some ignis fatuus which would divert the public attention from public affairs. We know the story of it now. We know perfectly well that it was not a matter of three hours' consideration with the honorable gentlemen then on the Government benches, whether or not they should adopt the Abolition policy. We know that "the power behind the throne" canvassed honorable members of this House in the lobbies, and ascertained that there were forty members of this House who were prepared to pledge themselves to abolition, and the Government got three hours to decide as to the course they would take. Within those three hours, the leading spirit of the colony, the initiator of the Public Works policy and the author of our public debt, determined to pitch over the party who put him into power. He came down with his announcement, which passed like a flash of lightning from one part of the House to the other. What can you expect from an Abolition scheme which originated in this way? Nothing but the confusion, nothing but the abuse, nothing but the misrepresentation and misfortune which have followed ever since. And now, Sir, I suppose, we have abolition! There are some pleasant results which will flow to certain people in this Assembly, and to a certain class in the community. The democratic Provincial Councils, composed of people from the middle classes of the colony, which controlled and regulated the waste lands of their own provinces, are no more. This House and another Chamber will henceforth deal with the waste lands of the colony. They will settle the terms upon which the squatters shall hold their runs; and you may depend upon it the determination of these bodies will not be favourable to the settlement of the country by a large population. The grand crime of the provinces was that they stood between the Colonial Government and the people. That was their besetting sin. And what have you done now? You have created sixty-three small provinces, every one of which will, in that respect, prove to be a greater thorn in the side of the Government than the original provinces. And what have you done further? You have determined that the Chairmen of these County Councils shall not have seats in this House. I believe the Committee has come to that decision. An honorable member near me says that the limitation is, "if they have salaries." Well, that really amounts to the same thing, because you will find it impossible to get gentlemen to perform the duties of Chairmen of County Councils unless they are remunerated for loss of time; and in the end it will come to this: that you will immensely and prejudicially limit the area from which the members of this House will be selected, because the best men in the country will be found occupying the chair in the County Councils; and if they accept salaries, they are to be debarred from taking seats in this House.

Mr. PYKE.—That is altered.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I am glad to hear that; but the sins of this Bill are so numerous that the mere fact of this not being a sin, does not, to my mind, entitle the measure to abolition. It was also alleged against the provinces, that, by their log-rolling in this Assembly, they prevented anything like good party government in this House. Now, I ask, will not the log-rolling be greatly increased in the future? The very fact that the members who came from the provinces represented a large area of country, enabled them to take a larger and broader view of public questions than they would otherwise have taken; and I say now that under this new system you will find it difficult to get members of this House to take anything larger than a parish view of matters. Am I to believe that we shall have less log-rolling?

Mr. PYKE.—Yes.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Then I can only say that the honorable member for Dunstan takes a far more sanguine view than I do of the future of this House. The only difference is that, whereas the provinces rolled logs of good sound timber, we shall have here dwarfed and useless trunks—useless for any other purpose than drawing money from the Public Treasury. There is no occasion to draw attention to the Harbour Board Bills, because they speak for themselves on the Order Paper;

but let me refer to another matter. It was one of the sins of the provinces that they had the audacity to borrow. They borrowed with revenue, and the colony borrowed without it. But what have we done? Why, Sir, for the last two years to every organization that we have created for the purpose of governing the colony—whether it be counties, Harbour Boards, or other corporations—we have given powers to borrow far beyond their means of payment. It was a crime on the part of the provinces, but it is a blessing and a matter of praise on the part of the counties. The greatest crime of the provinces, however, was this: that they retained the regulation and sale of their waste lands. They determined to administer them, not for the benefit of a class, but for the benefit of the whole people. Had they chosen to part with the public estate, to have made friends with “the mammon of unrighteousness,” they would have been in existence now. Whatever else they did, they prevented anything like jobbery with the public estate, and to that they owe their decease. It has been said that the people have asked for this measure. I say they have not. The whole of the proceedings which have culminated in the third reading of this Bill form the most striking instance of gross misrepresentation and fraudulent profession that I have ever seen. What were we told last year by the Colonial Treasurer? Liberal largess was to be distributed amongst the Road Boards and counties; but when you look at their statements of this year, you find that all these magnificent promises have disappeared, and that in all their proceedings, while they give with one hand they take away with the other. I say that if the people had known before the last general election what value was to be attached to the professions of the Government, instead of having a majority of members in favour of abolition, there would have been a large majority in favour of maintaining matters as they were. We have a case in point in the question of education. I have a vivid recollection of the glowing programme put before the country last year by the Colonial Treasurer. Amongst other things, we were to have free education. I know that in the thinly populated districts of the North, where the land is held in small areas, and where a difficulty is felt in maintaining their educational affairs on a proper footing, that promise did more for abolition than anything else. But now the people find that all these promises are absolutely broken, and that they are no better off than they were before the Abolition question was broached. One recommendation in favour of abolition was that we were to effect a great saving by abolishing the cost of provincial administration. That statement was made in this House by the late Premier, Sir Julius Vogel; it was repeated by other Ministers, and has been referred to over and over again by Abolition members in this House. Nothing can give one a better idea of the utter hopelessness of convincing people by facts and arguments than the persistent reiteration of this statement; but I will undertake to say that, by the end of twelve months from the present time, the cost of governing the colony under this new system will be four times the cost of the provincial system. The colony will be one mass of paid officials. You cannot expect the Chairmen of these County Councils to do their work without payment; and if you expect members of the Councils to travel thirty or forty miles to attend the Council meetings without being paid for it, all I can say is that you have a higher estimate of human nature than I have. You will have to pay the Chairmen of these sixty-three Councils; you will have to pay engineers, clerks, secretaries, solicitors—every step you take in the direction of opening up the country will add enormously to the expense. Sir, the people have asked for bread—political bread—and we have given them, in this Counties Bill a stone, about as tough a bit of granite as they ever got; and they will not discover its indigestible qualities until they try to swallow it. I simply rose to speak now because I had not an opportunity of speaking on the second reading of the Bill. I can fairly say that I did not attempt to stop the passage of the Bill in Committee, but I did not like to see it go to the third reading without expressing my opinion. I say now, that the whole thing is a delusion and a snare. Instead of being the outcome of a statesmanlike policy, it was brought down in a fit of temper; the most delusive promises were given; we know that already a great many of these promises have been deliberately broken, and of those that remain not a tithe will ever be carried out. I feel confident that in the course of another year or two we shall travel back to the place whence we came. It will be found impossible to govern this country satisfactorily from one centre. We may not have separation; we may not have two colonies; but in spite of the Abolition proposal, and in spite of the Counties Bill, we shall have restored to us the power of governing ourselves in the centres of population without having occasion to come to this Assembly in Wellington to discuss every petty matter, as the Government now propose to make us come. I believe this Bill, in its present shape, is a vast improvement upon the measure which was first brought down. When we look back upon the position the Government has taken up in regard to this matter; when we compare the statements of the late Premier, Sir Julius Vogel, in introducing the Abolition resolutions of 1874, with the proposal of his colleagues in 1875, and compare these in turn with his own proposals of 1876, we are forced to the conclusion that, up to within three or four days of the meeting of Parliament, the Government had not made up their minds what they were going to do. They were feeling their way blindly in the dark. We all remember last session that, in addition to the Abolition of Provinces Act, we had before us another measure which occupied considerable space in honorable members' pigeon-holes. I mean the Local Government Bill. And what became of that Bill? We have heard nothing of it since. All the time Sir Julius Vogel was away, nothing whatever was done for the purpose of finding out what institutions should be put in the place of the abolished provinces. Ministers had done absolutely nothing, and proposed to do nothing, until the late Premier suggested the County system. I can only say that, without being at all desirous of asserting it presumptuously, I do not believe that Ministers set themselves to the task of considering this matter until about a month before the House met. When I consider what effect this measure will have on the people in the course of the next few months; when I look at the measure we are called upon to put into operation; when I see, as I do see, the immense disappointment the people will feel when they think of what they expected to get and what they will get, I feel certain that the whole colony will pronounce but one judgment on this measure and the whole of the proposals: that is, that they were simply fraudulent misrepresentations from the start; that the originators of them did not seek the real good of the colony or the advancement of the public interests, but that, over and above these things, they have preferred class and personal considerations. It will be found that they would not stop short at abolishing the provinces, but that they would abolish anything in order to preserve those particular institutions which they value far above the public institutions of the colony. Sir, a measure begotten and carried out in this way can only come to an untimely end, and I am certain that will be the fate of this one; but I feel deeply the losses and the disappointments which the people will have to put up with between this time and the opening of their eyes which I am certain will take place. We have what is called "responsible government." By some fiction, Ministers are supposed to be responsible for their actions. I can understand responsible government as it exists in Turkey. If a Minister there commits himself, he is soon disposed of by means of a bowstring. But what is done in such an event here? Ministers do all sorts of things—destroy the public finance, for instance—and next year we pass a vote of want of confidence in them, and they are required to go out and make room for other and better men.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And then a Bill of Indemnity is brought in.

Mr. SHEEHAN. — Yes; then there is a Bill of Indemnity. That is what is called responsible government. Why there has been no responsible government for the last seven years. It is impossible to speak in this House of the Government without giving unnecessary pain; I have been speaking of the "Government" to-night, and I have included in that term one or two gentlemen who were members of the Ministry last year, one or two who were members during the previous year, and one or two who were members in the year before that again. This is like the polypus—you cut off one head and another grows in its place. We have heard a great deal about the Immigration and Public Works policy, and I have only to say, with regard to it, that, but for it, we should have had something like pure party government. I say now with all sincerity, that, Provincialist as I am, if I thought the adoption of the Abolition policy would lead to the existence of two defined parties in this House, I would give it my support. But it is impossible that it can do so.

There are already the conflicting interests of the North, South, and centre, and these will be multiplied by this system. I suppose, Sir, there is nothing for it but to read the Bill a third time, we may as well do that. It is an unpleasant do to have to swallow, and we may as well swallow it. A proposal to read the Bill a third time the day six months would, I feel confident, not be carried; and there is no occasion, I think, to make an unnecessary motion like that, when you cannot expect any good result from it. I think the Opposition will have done its duty by entering its protest against the third reading of the Bill and dividing the House on it. I hope, Sir, to see you fill the chair which you now occupy for the remainder of this Parliament; and as certainly as you were called upon last night to put the question to the House that the State Forests Bill should be repealed, so surely do I feel that, if you continue to occupy that chair, you will, before the end of the present Parliament, be called upon to put the question to the House, that the Abolition of Provinces Act be also repealed.

Mr. BURNS.—Sir, I wish to say one or two words before this matter goes any further. I do not like this measure, and I am certain my constituents do not like it. At the same time, as I said on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, if the House chooses to read it a second time, I will not oppose it on the third reading. I feel that I am bound now to vote for the third reading of the Bill, unpalatable as it may be. It is a great pity that the House did not agree to the very moderate and temperate proposal of the honorable member for Taieri—namely, to let the whole Province of Otago choose for itself whether it will be divided into counties or not. I think, Sir, and I say it with sorrow, that by doing so this House would have been doing a very wise thing. That course would have tended to allay a great deal of the strong feeling that exists in Otago now and will exist still. As far as my own constituency is concerned, I am afraid this matter will not be easily arranged, because this House has simply blotted that constituency out of existence. This House has divided my constituency into two parts, one of which has been assigned to the County of Waikouaiti, and the other to the County of Taieri, and I am certain that neither of those counties will like to be joined to my district. I had a difficulty with regard to the district which I represent. It was my intention to move that there should be a fresh county; but I felt myself to be in a difficulty, because I thought the House would have allowed the whole Province of Otago to stand, in order that the people might cut it up themselves. From the late date of the Government laying the maps showing the county boundaries on the table, I was unable to get my constituents to express their opinion as to how the county should be framed, and it was almost impossible for me to get up in this House and propose anything of the kind. If the Counties of Waikouaiti and Taieri agree to take in my district, I feel certain that the three will never agree together. I feel that if I were to vote against the third reading of the Bill, I should be doing an injustice. Before I sit down I wish to make one remark on what fell from the honorable member for Port Chalmers the other night, and to put myself right. I told the honorable member that I believed he knew nothing about the matter; and neither did he—not more than myself at any rate. I saw that neither he nor myself knew what our constituencies would consider the proper boundaries to adopt. At the time, I saw that the honorable gentleman misunderstood me, but I did not choose to make any further remark at the time. If I had been certain what my constituents thought regarding this matter, I would have taken immediate action in the House. I think it is a great pity, and I am sure the House will yet regret it, that we did not leave the whole province as it was, and allow the people to settle these boundaries themselves. That would have been one great means of soothing the feelings of irritation that exist. The very fact of the people themselves being called upon to form these boundaries would have been the most effectual way of doing this. Now, Sir, the House has taken this position, that it has itself formed these boundaries, and it will not be such an easy matter to get rid of these boundaries—that is, even supposing that the people take up these counties at all. I say this with regret, because members outside our province do not believe that the amount of irritation exists which really does exist. I can assure them that a great amount of strong feeling exists, and it is to be regretted that the very reasonable request of the honorable member for Tairi was not agreed to. I feel that the only course left for me now is to vote for the third reading; because I consider it would be wrong to leave the country now in the position that there is nothing to stand between the people and the central Government.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Sir, I do not feel that I can vote for this measure. I shall not endeavour to enter upon the arguments that have been adduced on the various stages of this Bill, but I do not think I should be true to my own opinions, if when the division took place I were to vote for the Bill. I believe that this Bill will not answer the expectations of the House. I believe there is scarcely any member of this House who really cordially agrees with the Bill. I think that this Bill will not satisfy the country, and I believe it does not even satisfy Ministers themselves. The principal object of this Bill, and that which the country looked for in the Bill, was local self-government. Well, Sir, I do not think the Bill supplies that in any shape or form in which the people expect it. The people were led to expect not only local self-government, but also substantial revenues and independent functions that they were to exercise themselves. I do not think this Bill gives that independence and local self-government that will be looked for by the people at large, especially in the South. The scheme was looked upon in the South, at all events, as one which would give a fair distribution of the land revenue to the several districts. I believe that the form which I proposed to the House of modified Provincialism—extending to the old provinces the boundaries of the counties that were to be created—was the only possible form which would secure the proper distribution of the land revenues in those districts in which the land revenue has hitherto arisen. For years past the land revenue has not been evenly distributed in the particular road districts in which it arises; and nothing but some general system, under a body selected from the whole of the districts, could possibly secure a fair distribution of the land revenue in the future. I am satisfied that the Province of Canterbury at least will be grievously disappointed at the result of this Bill. Sir, I am sorry that I cannot vote for the Bill. I feel, however, that in the Bill there is one clause which is really the point of the Bill, and that is the 205th clause, which provides that, in all cases where sufficient provision is not made in this Bill for the objects of the Bill, the Governor in Council may make that provision. I do not think that, as a rule, that is at all a satisfactory arrangement, but the meaning of it in this case is, that neither the Government nor the House is satisfied with the Bill, and that they are going to leave with the gentlemen on those benches the responsibility of working out a system of local self-government during the recess. Everything depends upon the administration during the recess, and very little, I am sorry to think, will depend upon the merits of this Bill. I shall vote against the third reading.

Sir G. GREY.—I will still ask, is there no means of getting this debate adjourned? I feel that the subject is one of the greatest public importance.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is open to the honorable member to move that the debate be adjourned.

Sir G. GREY.—Unless the Government will consent to that, I fear it is hopeless to move it. I would point out that the whole delay to-night originated in one member of the Government being determined to take a certain portion of country into a county in which he had a very large interest himself, and after a very long period of time they were obliged to abandon that attempt in a great part. Now I desire myself to address the House on this subject, and a great many other honorable members would like to do so, if time were allowed them. I submit that it is not respectful to the country to hurry through such an important measure at such an hour of the night. I believe it is very unusual to take the third reading of an important measure of this kind immediately after the Committee has made its report, and when alterations have been made which no one can bear in mind. I think the whole thing is very irregular, and certainly the fault is not with the Opposition. I do trust that the Government, who caused the delay, will now allow the debate to be adjourned. Moving the adjournment of the debate will give the Treasurer an opportunity of making his financial statement, and on Monday this matter can be settled. If there is the least hope of the Government assenting, I would do that.

Major ATKINSON.—If the honorable gentleman has finished his speech, perhaps I shall be able to say something.

Sir G. GREY.—I move the adjournment of the House.

Major ATKINSON.—It is hardly necessary to say that the Government will not consent to that.

Sir G. GREY.—I beg to move, That the House do now adjourn. I shall press that to the vote, and, if it is lost, I can speak afterwards.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman will not be able to speak afterwards.

Motion for the adjournment of the House negatived.

Mr. READER WOOD.—I think the proposal of the honorable member for the Thames, that the debate should be adjourned, is in itself a very reasonable one. The ordinary course is that, after amendments have been made in a Bill, at least one day is allowed before the report is agreed to. In a measure of such importance as this, I think it is a great pity that this course has been departed from. There is no doubt whatever that the amendments made in the Bill are much beyond mere technical and unimportant amendments; and therefore I urge on the Government the desirability of giving still further time for honorable members to express their views on such a measure, and particularly when the Bill itself may be before them in its complete form, so that they can really understand the bearing of the amendments. I beg to move, That the debate be now adjourned.

Sir G. GREY.—I believe I can now speak on this question. I think the debate should be adjourned, in order that so important a matter may fairly be spoken to by honorable members. I have pointed out that we are not responsible for the delay, and that therefore we are entitled to the privilege of an adjournment. I think that the matter is one of very great importance indeed; because, in truth, every vestige of self-government is about to be swept away from this country. I wish to point out, as one reason why an adjournment should take place to enable honorable members to make representations on this subject, that we have none of the privileges now left to us which are usually enjoyed by British subjects. The Premier laughs at that; but it is a sad truth, and no one knows it better in his heart than he does himself. I would point out that we have not an hereditary monarch in this country; that we have not an hereditary Upper House, nor have we an elective Upper House. We have here, as a superior branch of the Legislature, one of a form known in hardly any part of the British possessions, and in very few countries in the world. Secondly, in this Assembly we have not the ordinary privileges possessed by British subjects generally throughout the Empire, because property returns to this House, from the power which it possesses of voting, in various electoral districts, an undue number of members. That is one most important question. In that respect, we are deficient of that amount of representation which is ordinarily enjoyed by Her Majesty's subjects. Necessarily, as a consequence of that, the taxation of this country is an unequal taxation. It is a taxation which does not fall upon individuals in proportion to their wealth, or to the advantages which they enjoy. It is a taxation to which all contribute nearly equally—the poor and rich alike. Then, from property having an undue power and representation in this House, those taxes are unfairly expended. They are expended principally for the benefit of a class. Now, you will see, Sir, that under this Counties Bill as it stands—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am very loth to interrupt the honorable member, but in the question of adjournment of the debate it is desirable and usual that honorable members should confine themselves to reasons for adjournment of the debate.

Sir G. GREY.—I must yield to your ruling, Sir; but I thought no stronger arguments could be adduced for the adjournment of the debate than those I was using. I cannot help thinking that those arguments were clearly proving that it was desirable honorable gentlemen should have an opportunity of addressing this House at length upon such an important subject. If I am forbidden to make such remarks, I cannot help myself; but I must say that the conduct of the Government has been little courteous to me. Under the circumstances, I think the Premier should, in a courteous, gentlemanlike manner, have answered my question, instead of plunging me into considerable difficulty by saying that when I had done my speech he would make a reply. That embarrassed me, and prevented me from making the speech which I was entitled to make, and deprived me of the answer which I think, by all rules of parliamentary courtesy, I was entitled to have given me. It is not only on this question, but on many others, that the honorable gentleman has treated myself and other honorable members with a want of courtesy, and with a want of parliamentary custom and latitude, which I think is humiliating, and certainly hurtful to the feelings of honorable gentlemen. But if I am obliged to be subjected to treatment of that kind, and shut out from the observations I think I ought to be allowed to make, nothing remains for me but to sit down, protesting against the course pursued.

Mr. W. WOOD.—When the honorable member for the Thames was speaking to the question of the third reading, he seemed to be placed in a difficulty by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government not replying in that manner which he had a right to expect. Therefore, in order to give the honorable gentleman a chance of speaking to the question, I think it would be as well for some honorable member to move, when the question of adjournment is disposed of, that the Bill be read a third time this day six months. I shall therefore move the amendment when this question is disposed of.

Motion for the adjournment of the debate negatived.

Mr. W. WOOD.—I now move, Sir, That this Bill be read a third time this day six months; and I take the opportunity of uttering my protest against this Bill, and against the circumstances which have given rise to it. I consider that the country has been deluded, and that members were not returned to the House to carry out this purpose. I say many of the members of the late Parliament betrayed their constituents. The fact of my being here proves that they did so; and it is further proved by the fact of other members from the district from which I come being here also, and holding the views we do. But it is not necessary for me to go into the matter now. The hour is late, and I know the honorable gentleman for the Thames is anxious to address the House. I shall, therefore, conclude by uttering my protest against the Bill, and declaring that I will vote against it.

Mr. FISHER.—As I have paired upon this question, and there may be some misunderstanding with regard to my vote, I beg to say that, if I were to vote to-night, I should vote against the third reading of this Bill, as I did against the second reading. I think it is a mistake altogether, and that it will not answer the purpose required, while it will land the country in a state of confusion. I merely mention this because, as I paired once before, and my pair was not recorded, I do not wish my motives, of which I am not ashamed, to be mistaken. I wish it to be known that I vote against this Bill, and do not at all believe in it.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I now resume the remarks I was making when you stopped me. I was remarking that taxation was in this country imposed by a majority sent here by property, and not in proportion to population; that taxation was so imposed that its incidence fell upon the masses, and that property was left almost untouched. This Counties Bill, which pretends to be an instrument created for the purpose of giving self-government to the people of the country, increases that disadvantage. It is possible, under its provisions, that whilst a man with small property has but one vote in a county, a man with considerable means may possess forty-five votes in returning members to the Council. And then, what I believe will be deemed incredible in other countries, while property takes from the people at large moneys raised from the masses by unfair taxation, considerable subsidies are to be given from the moneys so raised to the County Councils to be expended again by property, and not in fair proportion to the contribution by the people at large. It was one remarkable feature in the old system of Provincial Governments, that there were Governments throughout the country elected with a tolerable degree of fairness, influenced by no class feeling, and having the inestimable privilege that the laws passed by them did not travel out of the Colony of New Zealand to be confirmed—a privilege enjoyed by no other country under the British Crown. Sir, you must not imagine, and the country must not imagine, that this question of the abolition of Provincial Councils is one in which New Zealand alone is concerned. Many other parts of the British Empire were looking to New Zealand to see how institutions of that kind worked, believing that they might even be advantageously introduced within the limits of the British Islands. It will now be said, from the example apparently given in New Zealand, that people value institutions of this kind so little, and care so little for liberty and freedom, that it is not worth while to give them to the inhabitants of portions of the British Islands who would gladly ask for them if placed in their power. I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind that means have been taken to influence the opinions of some of the statesmen of this country to lead them to adopt the conclusion they have adopted in regard to these institutions, for the express purpose of giving an example to other portions of the Empire, which would enable statesmen at home hostile to such institutions to declare that such institutions were useless. I regret to say that, in my firm belief—and I say this with no intention of wounding or giving offence, but believing it is a duty laid upon me to make such a statement calmly and deliberately—I believe that unfair means have been had recourse to, to lead the inhabitants of this country blindly to surrender themselves to a guidance which was leading them into that course by which their free institutions were taken from them. Of that we can look for no more marked instance than the memorandum recently addressed by the Premier to the Governor of this colony, circulated throughout the country for the express purpose of encouraging those who were bent upon abolition, and of discouraging those who were struggling for their rights—a memorandum characterized by a want of accuracy which, on the part of a Government, I think was shameful—a memorandum characterized by boldness of statements wanting in that rigid regard for truth which such statements ought to have—a memorandum misleading in itself—a memorandum which the Governor of this country was induced to forward under his own name and under his own signature, when, Sir, he ought to have been taught to have shrunk from following such a course. I say we could have had no better instance than that of the unfair means taken to induce the people of this country either to ask for abolition, or to accept it as an evil from which they could not escape—to lead them to believe that their Sovereign had assented to a law by a positive statement that she had done so, to which law those who made that statement knew she never had given her assent—to lead the people to believe that the great Law Officers of the Crown in England, men well versed and practised in such subjects, had declared that this Assembly had power to do that which it attempted to do, while those who made that statement well knew that the Law Officers of the Crown in England never gave an opinion of the kind. A statement of that kind must have encouraged those who were pressing on to gain an object which they knew would give them great advantage, and must have discouraged those who contended against such objects, who desired to remain loyal subjects to their Queen, and to do nothing contrary to that which the law required from them. But this is not the only instance of such proceedings. As has been very well pointed out by the honorable member for Rodney, bribes have been held out to counties, to municipalities, and to Road Boards—promises made which were not to be fulfilled, and which, in my heart I believe, those who made them knew, at the time they were so making them, they could not fulfil—promises now being made which I am equally certain they cannot carry out—promises which would lead counties to believe that for the next five years they are sure of certain advantages promised to them, but which those who made the promises know cannot be performed. They know the weight of debt which overloads and overshadows this colony. They know the state of their finances. They know they cannot fulfil the pledges which this Bill would appear to contain. All these considerations make me feel that it is the bounden duty of every man who cares about his country—every man who values public rights, public honor, and public welfare—to vote against the third reading of this Bill. And I say that those too who believe that this measure amounts to nothing ought still to vote against it, because, after all the improvement they have made in it, it is but a sham. I say that, because I believe the provincial system is not yet abolished. I believe, differing from many others, that before this session has closed, the Government themselves will gladly make abolition permissive. I believe that they will thank me for the measure I have introduced, and will gladly accept it; and I believe that, once it is left to the provinces themselves to determine whether their existence shall now end or not, it will be found that several will decline to commit self-destruction. Such, Sir, is not only my hope but my belief—my firm anticipation. I think the Government themselves must have felt that they have entered upon a course of difficulty which they little calculated they would have to encounter, when they first undertook to carry out the plan which they are now trying to force upon the country. They may rely upon it that difficulties are arising in the South, and will arise in the North, which will prevent their success in the schemes they have undertaken. They may rely upon it that within the next few days appeals will be made by telegraph to the Home Government which will compel instructions to be given to the Governor of this country differing from those which would suit the views of the gentlemen who sit upon the Government benches. They may rely upon it that within a few weeks many men in New Zealand will feel that a time is coming, and that very quickly, when great names are to be made, which will last for ever in the history of this country; and they will find that all that is noble, all that is good, and all that desires greatness will spring forth upon this occasion, and will leave an imperishable renown behind them. Within the next few months those names must be determined which will for ever live in the history of New Zealand; and men knowing that will not be slow to acquit themselves as great and good men should do in the difficulties which are about to come. I cannot conceive the infatuation which has led men on in the course which this Government have adopted. I cannot conceive how they can justify themselves in many acts they have performed. How could men submit simply to occupy those benches the will of a single man for whom they were provide an office in England in recognition of their having been placed in the posts which they hold? How, Sir, can they bring themselves to try to take from their fellow-men rights which their country conferred upon them? How can they bring themselves to hurry on unfairly an unjustly proceedings which they have resolved to carry out? Why try to stifle this debate? Why not have allowed an adjournment, so that on Monday next those who desire it could have spoken their sentiments on the subject to the constituents and their fellow-countrymen in New Zealand? Why tyrannically use a majority in this House to rob us of a right which all our deliberative Assemblies possess—the right of directing and guiding the opinions of their fellow-countrymen? Why have hurried on to-night—I say this with all deference to the Chair—the third reading of a measure which, according to all parliamentary usage, ought not to take place on this occasion? Why have they occupied all the early part of the night in an attempt to wrest for one of that Ministry—one member of it—power over a great district of the country in which he has so large a personal interest? I cannot tell what my feelings are when I think of what has been done to-night in that respect to perpetuate what I believe was a great and a gross wrong—an effort which has prevented myself and others from speaking at a time when our strength might have been greater and our minds less worn out, and which has compelled unfairly a debate on this great question to take place at this hour of the morning, when it might have taken place quite early in the evening. They might, with common justice, have allowed the Colonial Treasurer this evening to have made his Financial Statement, and have let this debate take place on Monday next. Protesting against the course thus followed, protesting against this measure itself, I simply say that, to the very best of my ability, I shall in every way act against the third reading of this Bill.

Captain KENNY.—As it is my intention to vote for the amendment that this Bill be read a third time this day six months, I wish to make a few remarks. I ask the indulgence of the House because I find myself placed in a somewhat peculiar and painful position. I have supported the Government hitherto, because they have endeavored to carry out the Abolition policy. But I find that in bringing this measure before the House they have not been content with that policy, but they have adopted a plan of reconstruction of which I cannot approve. It appears to me that they have in this Bill continued many of the evils which I believe Provincialism has been fruitful of. We shall have, it seems to me, a double form of government, and be afflicted with too much government. A number of honorable gentlemen who have spoken to-night have pointed out the evils which this Bill perpetuates. It will therefore be quite unnecessary for me to go over that ground. But I think it is due to the Government and to the honorable gentlemen with whom I shall find myself voting to-night, that I should state plainly that I vote against the Bill on grounds in which possibly I shall not find much sympathy from either party. I believe that in the course I am taking I am fully representing the feelings of the constituents I have the honor to represent. I know that the course I am taking now will not in any way prevent the ultimate carrying out of the Abolition policy. I merely wish on this occasion to enter my protest against a course of action which I believe the Government themselves did not originally contemplate. I think, if my memory serves me right, that I am borne out by an expression of the Premier himself during last session. When the question was asked, "What did the Government propose to substitute for the provincial system?" The honorable gentleman replied, "Nothing." Now, I believe we want nothing in place of Provincialism—that, in many portions of the colony, the existing Road Boards could carry on the local works, and that, within those portions of the colony where Road Boards do not now exist, a measure might be introduced forming Road Boards or any other description of machinery that might be found necessary for particular parts of the country, such as gold fields. I must say I am inclined to indorse the opinions of some honorable gentlemen who have to-night stated their belief that the time will come when the question of abolition that will be raised will be the abolition of the counties. I think this country has been over-governed. My objection to the provincial system is, that it is an excrescence—that it is becoming an extravagance. I do not mean to say that it has not done its duty, and has not performed a part in the government of this country; but I believe that the necessity for that form of government no longer exists, nor do I think there is a necessity for replacing it by a system of modified Provincialism. On these grounds, I intend to vote against the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. LUMSDEN.—The course I will take on the present occasion will be somewhat similar to that indicated by the honorable gentleman who has just sat down. I look upon this as a very poor substitute for Provincialism. I know that there is a small portion—and I say "small" advisedly—of the community in the district I represent who have expressed themselves very strongly against Provincialism, and who have attacked Provincial Executives and provincial administration in language that I cannot but call most indecent, led on by a local journal and by a small clique. If the Government in Wellington were to refuse to listen to the claims of those gentlemen—supposing the provincial system were swept away—they, too, would come in for their share of the abuse which Provincial Executives have hitherto had to bear with equanimity. I had no intention of submitting to the claims of these noisy cliques, who invariably have their own purposes to serve. I know that the great majority of the people in the district of Southland have a warm affection for the provincial system of administration. I know that much dissatisfaction has arisen, and that there will be dissatisfaction arising in connection with any administration; but I know that, generally speaking, the people were satisfied it was the system best adapted to the wants of the community, and would be so adapted for some time to come—that the country was not ripe for this change; and I cannot see that the system that is now proposed by this Bill will be at all satisfactory to the people. I feel, however, that the best way to bring about a climax to the dissatisfaction will be to give the people this County system. I feel that there is throughout the colony a large amount of dissatisfaction—not only at the abolition of the provincial system, but at the state of uncertainty and suspense in which the whole public business of the country is being kept. Not only is this suspense attributed to the Abolition measures, but the Opposition are also blamed for it. I shall be no party to this system of suspense. Although I have no faith in this County system, I should prefer now to relegate the matter in the usual course to the other Chamber, and see what they will make of it. But I say here that I will be no party to it. As I said before, I do not wish to hinder the Government, who I believe are thoroughly honest in their intentions, and in their belief that this will be a good system of administration for the districts of the country. I give them credit for good faith. I have no faith in the system, but I do not wish to hinder them, or hinder that effect being given to the will of a majority which a majority has always a right to claim. I do not wish to be factious in any case, but I decline to commit myself to work this out. I will be no party to it. If the Government party are strong enough to carry it, let them carry it; I will avoid voting either for or against it. I cannot say, with the honorable member who last spoke, that something in the shape of an extension of the Road Boards should be substituted for the provincial system. There is another point I feel perfectly satisfied on. I might have been induced to support the Government if they had introduced some scheme by which the people of the district I come from might have been formed into one body. They were greatly dissatisfied when their provincial independence was taken from them, and they are desirous to have the powers they then held in some way restored. I would therefore be inclined to support anything that will tend in that direction, and I advocated the constitution of a county for Southland, as something that would further that desire. I have much doubt, however, whether the proposal contained in this Bill will satisfy the people. I have been told that a strong expression of opinion has been given recently. I have not seen the memorial, but I believe it was signed by 800 people, and was forwarded to the Government, expressing the desire of the people of Southland that they should have no connection with the County of Otago at all. I fancy that this feeling has sprung out of the desire to have their provincial administrative powers restored to them, and I should like very much to see those powers restored, perhaps in some modified form. The proposal indicated by the honorable member for Taieri was, I think, a very good one, although it would not have been very satisfactory to Southland. Making one county of Otago would not have been acceptable to Southland; but had the honorable member's suggestion been adopted, a simpler and thus less expensive system would have been brought into operation than is likely to result from this Counties Bill. I cannot see how over sixty counties can be conducted at a less expense than the nine provinces, and I fancy that the sixty Chairmen will cost—for they must be remunerated for their services—more than the nine Superintendents. Members of the Councils will have to be paid for their services, for they cannot be expected to travel twenty, thirty, forty, or perhaps one hundred miles without being paid for their attendance. Believing that the whole paraphernalia of local self-government as provided by this Bill will be very expensive and very unsatisfactory, I will not vote either for or against the Bill.

Mr. STOUT.—Sir, I do not intend to take up the time of the House with making any lengthy speech, and I only desire to offer one or two remarks, simply because, when I asked for the adjournment of the debate, it was denied. My objections to the Bill are threefold: at least I shall only refer to three at this time of the morning. The first I consider to be a most radical defect in the system—the divorce between the country and the towns. I regard that as a most grievous blunder. Instead of tending to create a unity of interest and feeling in the colony, a feeling will be created between the towns and the country that will have a most mischievous effect in the future. You are divorcing the people of the towns from those in the country, and training them to believe that their interests are opposed to each other, and training them to work separately for that which ought to be their common end. There are many instances in which it will be found absolutely impossible to carry on, unless there be a good feeling between the country and the towns. I may instance the hospitals and the charitable institutions of the colony. It will not be expected, for one moment, that the towns are going to maintain these; and if the towns do not maintain those institutions, I ask what will become of them? Their maintenance will be cast on the General Government, or they will not be supported at all. If they are cast on the General Government, it will be found that the General Government will have to undertake duties and responsibilities to a large extent, and will have to expend money out of the Consolidated Revenue, and that will cause additional taxation. That is my first objection. Another objection is this: that the Bill tends to disserve the town population from all share in the administration of the waste lands of the Crown. This is a most grievous mistake, and a most grievous wrong. If you are to train the town and city population to look at the waste lands administration as something apart from them, you are relegating the most important function of the government of the colony to a selected class of people—namely, those who are interested in pastoral and agricultural pursuits—and the result will be that the framing of the land laws will be so managed that they will not provide for settlement in future. Then there is another objection. The counties will be led, in order to get rid of taxation, to sacrifice the land estate of the colony. The curse of this colony in the past has been the selling of the land which has been regarded as a profitable source of revenue. Consequently the land has been sold, careless whether its disposal provided a settlement or not. That has been the origin of so many landed proprietors, and that has caused the finest agricultural land in New Zealand to be seen, as one travels through it, without a house upon it, or without any improvements, and nothing but sheep, sheep, sheep. You can travel through fine districts in Canterbury, over fine districts in Otago, in Wellington, in Nelson, and I believe in other provinces also—I can only speak of those I have mentioned—where there could have been homes for thousands of people instead of which the land has been sold in large blocks to proprietors, and no settlement has been provided. I see that the Land question will be one of the most difficult questions to deal with in the future, and by this system you are simply intensifying the evil. What will every county be come? Why, every county will become grasping and greedy for land fund, and they will ask that the land should be sacrificed careless of settlement. That is one evil this County system will cause. Another is that it will not provide for opening up and selling new country. Where will all the revenues go? The districts that will most profit from the Land Fund will not be the outlying districts, but the largely-settled districts, where the country has been divided up into small farms. These will get the largest amount of subsidy; and what will be left to provide for roads in the outlying and sparsely-populated districts? They will get nothing. I can point to districts in Otago. Take, for instance, the County of Waikouaiti, where there are most expensive works to be constructed. In Waikouaiti, a very large bridge will be required next year; but how will it be made? Bridges and main roads will have to be maintained; but how will that be done in the outlying districts? If I had time, I would trace the history of this County system in New Zealand, and it would be a most peculiar one. I would begin with the Local Government Bills of 1867 and 1868, and I would show how this County system originated. There was no word of this Local Government system until, in a fit of ill-temper, the Premier came down with a proposal to abolish the North Island provinces, because the House did not readily agree to his Forests scheme. However, before the Forests scheme had time to be developed, the House, by two to one, actually negatived it, by passing a repealing Bill. That Act was the basis of the whole of these constitutional changes. I can quite understand a statesman advocating a scheme for the abolition of the provinces; and I should have had much more faith in the County scheme if it had been proposed to found a new Constitution for New Zealand in the manner in which new Constitutions are usually proposed. In that case, it would have been presented before the people purely upon its constitutional merits, and on those alone. If we look at the history of the formation of new Constitutions in other countries, we shall see that this has been done: Take, for example, the history of the creation of the United States Constitution. How was it brought about? Was it brought about by letters in the newspapers and by the offering of bribes,—by suggestions to the people that, if they voted for the new Constitution, they would get more money spent in their particular localities? Sir, the American Constitution, when framed, started upon the assertion of general principles, that have almost passed into proverbs throughout nearly the whole civilized world. In this colony, how was this proposed new Constitution supported? I say it was by a system which will yet prove most pernicious, a system of going to the people and saying, "If you will only vote for this measure, you will get more money." That was the beginning and the end of these constitutional changes in New Zealand. We have had the changes rung upon that, even up to the present moment. What are the Bills before the House, the Provincial Appropriations Bill and others, but bribes? This is the method in which the Constitution of New Zealand has been altered, and the result will be calamitous to New Zealand in the future. I will tell the House why. Because there will be no measure proposed as the measures for reform were proposed in England, for the people will be asked to judge of a measure by the money they are likely to get. Fancy the Reform Bill in England being judged of by money. And yet this is the method in which the Constitution of New Zealand has been destroyed. There are those who have taken part in this debate who will live not only to regret what they have done, but to vote against the course they have taken. No doubt there were those who went into the lobby in favour of the repeal of the Forests Bill who had previously voted for the passing of that Act, and they went into the lobby with no regret but this, that the Bill should ever have been placed on the Statute Book at all. So it will be in reference to this County system. Not that I would oppose a County system if the people desired counties. But I would desire that a County system should be inaugurated by the wish of the whole people in the different districts, and that only when there was a general desire on the part of the people for it, in order that they might have greater liberty in managing their own affairs. We were told that nothing should stand between the people and this House; but the whole scheme of the Government has been to prevent the people from coming to this House, because they at last got afraid that there would be roads and bridges and public works mentioned in it. And what is it now? You are to bring in a County system between the people and this House. And what will that amount to? Why, Sir, you will find that every County Chairman, as is done—so it has been stated this evening—in Nova Scotia, will be sending up a list of the public works which he considers will be necessary for his district, and this Assembly will cease to be a legislative body; it will be a huge Board of Works for the distribution of patronage. If this scheme had been introduced to give the people more power over their own affairs, over their roads and other works, and over their local institutions, I do not believe that any objection would have been raised to it. If they had really desired to introduce this system of government, they ought to have come down with a County Bill creating sixty-three counties in New Zealand; and when that system had been worked for several years, and when by these counties the functions of the provinces had been absorbed, they could have come down with a scheme of abolition if they pleased. Instead of that, you will have sixty-three counties. Some of them might well be termed parishes. You will have sixty-three Chairmen, and the lowest sum you will have to give them will be £100, £300, or £500 a year. You will have the payment of the Chairmen and secretaries, leaving out the cost of surveyors, advertisements, and other expenses attending the carrying out of the County system. You will have the payment of two salaried officers in each county, and you will have an expenditure exceeding the cost of maintaining the provincial system throughout the whole of New Zealand. The expense both of the General Government and this House will also be increased; and what will the people get for the expenditure of the money? Will they get more roads made? Will they get more bridges built? Will they get more schools established? Will they get more charitable institutions endowed? There is no one in this House who will say that more roads will be made, more bridges built, or more institutions maintained. They will get during the next two years a mere barren cry raised for some political purpose, in order to absorb not only the functions but the revenues of local institutions that exist in New Zealand. You will have a policy inaugurated in New Zealand by the introduction of the Forests Bill, and ended by the passing of this Counties Bill—a policy which may well be described as a policy of blundering, or, to use a phrase adopted at Home, a policy of plundering and blundering, that will end without any credit to those who inaugurated it. It is well known that the majority of this House have gone in for what is termed abolition. -I believe there are not half a dozen persons who support abolition who really know what abolition means—they simply take up the cry of abolition. I have no hope of seeing this policy altered until the country experiences the evil effects of it. Perhaps not next year—that would be too soon—or the next five years; but I believe ten years hence the people will look back with regret at the abolition of the provincial system. Then will come that agitation which has commenced now, and which will never cease until some sort of Provincialism is again restored. It is absurd to think that the people can forget the manner in which this Abolition Bill has been introduced and carried out. Do we find that the union of Ireland and England has been forgotten, or the manner in which it was carried out? Do Irishmen forget the page of Irish history, a most dark page, a page wherein the Parliament was bribed? I say, Sir, that we have inaugurated the same scheme of union, if it may be termed union—the scheme of abolition here. It will remain on our historic page also that abolition was brought about by bribery. The result will be the same as in Ireland, where, during many years, much agitation has existed. It exists now, and it will exist in times hereafter—an agitation which menaces the freedom of England and English subjects; because it is well known now that Irish members have almost ceased to regard Imperial interests; they confine their attention almost solely to the question of Home Rule, and thereby are injuring the functions of the English Parliament. That happened in Ireland; and I say there will arise in New Zealand a true local government party—a true Home Rule party—that will be most injurious to the future of New Zealand politics. I believe it will end in one of two things—in the splitting up of this colony into several colonies, or else a localism in dealing with New Zealand affairs such as the provincial system never inaugurated. The provincial system was truly a national system. It was the only system suited to a colony situated as New Zealand is, with a long strip of seaboard and with settlements at various parts from one end of it to the other. It was the only system which allowed for the conservation of national interests, and gave scope for the opening up of the country and for the settlement of it. Under that system you had this Parliament dealing with national affairs, and purely local affairs were not intruded upon the consideration of this Assembly. You have abolished that system; and what have you reared instead of it? You have reared a system that will create heart-burnings in every part of the colony. I do not believe there is one district in the colony but what will regret the County system. As soon as you have it created and established, you will find that it will not be successful. In every little village or town you will have money spent, not in opening up the country, but merely providing for by-roads through the large farms of wealthy settlers. That will be the result of the County system, and that is the reason why I shall vote that this Bill be read a third time this day six months.

NATIVE LAND PURCHASES.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, Whether his attention has been drawn to a letter signed by Mr. John Rogan, a Judge of the Native Land Court, which has been published in a Poverty Bay paper, denying the accuracy of statements made by the Hon. the Native Minister in documents laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament; and whether any steps have been taken, or are in contemplation, with regard to it? He might say he asked this question without having a distinct knowledge of the circumstances to which it referred. He simply asked the question because it appeared to him to involve a very curious dereliction of duty on the part of a public officer, or else some extraordinary circumstances which might have justified a deviation from the ordinary rules of the public service. He could see there was some connection between the matter and the subject of the paper which had been laid on the table in return to a motion by the Hon. Mr. Mantell; but he was not in a position to express any opinion on the merits of the dispute involved in the discussion between Mr. Wilson and Judge Rogan. He simply desired to ask the Colonial Secretary, whether this precedent of a Judge of the Native Land Court publishing a letter reflecting upon the Government was to be allowed; and, if so, the particular reasons that might justify its being printed. If any information came to his knowledge before an explanation was given by the Government as to the actual matter referred to in that letter, he would hold himself quite at liberty to make any motion on the subject he thought proper.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said, since the honorable gentleman had placed this question on the Paper, he had seen the letter to which it referred, and which, if he might be permitted to say so, he had read with considerable regret. The answer to the latter part of the honorable gentleman's question was, that the Native Minister had been, as honorable members were perhaps aware, for some time absent from his place through illness; but he had no doubt that whatever steps were necessary to be taken in regard to this affair would be taken immediately his honorable colleague was in a position to resume his duties.

LIBRARY.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES asked the Hon. Dr. Pollen, What steps the Government propose to take with reference to the resolutions agreed to by the Joint Library Committee on the 29th of August, requesting that new plans should be obtained before proceeding with the erection of new buildings for a library?

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said the Government proposed to take a vote this year for the necessary expenditure on the building, and, as soon as that was done, to call for competitive designs.

KOMANGARAUTAWHIRI BLOCK.

* The Hon. Mr. NGATATA, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he did so because the Natives did not understand why the Crown grant was issued to the sons of Thomas Ellison.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid upon the table of the Council the papers connected with the issue of the Crown grant of the block of land known as 'Komangarautawhiri,' and the reasons why His Excellency the Governor was advised to issue a Crown grant for the same."—(Hon. Mr. Ngatata.)

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said there was no objection on the part of the Government to the motion of his honorable friend, and the papers would be produced. The subject was an old one, and had been already more than once before the Legislature.

Motion agreed to.

LAW PRACTITIONERS BILL.

* The Hon. Colonel BRETT, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was introduced solely with the view of amending "The Law Practitioners Act, 1871," and contained a provision whereby any one objecting to the admission of persons applying to the Supreme Court to be allowed to practise as barristers and solicitors was required to give due notice to the Court of the intention to oppose the petition of the applicant. The Bill only affirmed a broad principle, and did not specify any particular person or persons as coming under its operation, so that he trusted the Council would take a liberal view of the object of the measure, which was to enable any legal gentleman, whose character had been questioned, to seek redress in the Supreme Court. The Bill formed rather a connecting link with two former Acts passed in 1866 and 1871. It was, therefore, he thought, necessary for him to give some explanation of the measure. The gentleman more particularly affected by the Bill, and whom, from a motive of delicacy, he would only designate as Mr. S., was in 1849 convicted in England of an offence which was committed under an impression, that in signing the name of a gentleman to a legal paper in duplicate, the original having been lost, he was not guilty of any moral turpitude, as there was no pecuniary advantage to be gained by the transaction. Mr. S. was convicted of forgery, and underwent a sentence of twelve months in Newgate. This took place more than a quarter of a century ago, and therefore, as the sentence had been borne, he considered that the offence had been expiated, and in a great measure condoned. In the year 1851 Mr. S. came to New Zealand, with a view to practising his profession. In 1863, he voluntarily presented a petition to the Supreme Court setting out the facts of his case, and asking for permission to practise. In 1865, the Judges decided that the conviction did not debar him from practising. In 1866, the Attorney-General brought in a Bill to the Council, entitled "The Law Practitioners Amendment Act, 1866." In Committee, the Hon. Mr. Miller procured the insertion of clause 3, which reversed the action of the Judges, and precluded this gentleman from practising. It would be apparent to every honorable member that that was ex post facto law. It was considered unconstitutional, and a violation of the constitutional law of Great Britain. That Act, he maintained, was a most unjust one. It was legislation directed against a gentleman who had committed an offence some twenty-five or twenty-six years previously, and it perpetuated an act which was one of cruelty to that gentleman, while it was ex post facto, and he might say ultra vires. In 1871, Mr. Smythies petitioned both Houses of Parliament to be relieved from the operation of the Act. A Bill was passed in the other House giving him relief; but when that Bill came to the Council, the identical clauses which gave him relief were struck out, and other clauses inserted, relegating the matter to the decision of the Judges. In 1872, in conformity with the provisions of that Act, Mr. Smythies petitioned the Judges again, and his case was then heard. A very careful investigation, which was more in the form of a trial, took place. The proceedings at this trial or investigation had been printed. In his opinion they had been very carefully drawn up, and the whole circumstances laid down from beginning to end. With the permission of the Council he would read some of the views expressed by the Judges. In one part it is stated,—

"In coming to a conclusion adverse to Mr. Smythies upon the question raised under the first subsection, it is fair to him to state that the fraud which he appears to have practised was, of necessity, as harmless to others as it was useless to himself."

Now, what stronger report could be made in favour of this unfortunate gentleman? Surely they would say that there was no moral turpitude in his act. Now he came to another portion of the distinguished Judge's remarks:—

"And we feel constrained by the facts to admit that it would not be easy to suggest any case, coming within the legal definition of forgery, which would imply a less degree of 'moral turpitude' than we are bound to infer must have existed in the case in question."

He would now read another portion which was very strong, and which he was sure ought to have weight and would have weight with honorable members:—

"On the whole, we arrive at the conclusion that the circumstance of the petitioner's offence did not imply such a degree of 'moral turpitude' as necessarily to require his perpetual exclusion from the exercise of his profession."

The following portion had an equally strong bearing upon this gentleman's case:—

"We may say at once that these charges would not, in our judgment, either separately or together, have been sufficient to justify the Court in striking Mr. Smythies off the rolls, or probably even in suspending him from practice. Moreover he has, in some instances, been able to explain his conduct in a way more or less satisfactory."

He thought honorable members would admit that they should take into consideration the leniency of those remarks, and should pass this Bill. It only proposed to give this gentleman an opportunity of again appearing before the Judges of the Supreme Court—gentlemen who were the guardians of the purity and honor of the legal profession. He was sure honorable gentlemen would not think it fair to shut the door against this gentleman receiving justice. He only wished the Judges to report on his case, because when the last trial took place his prosecutors came forward at the very last hour, and he had no opportunity of refuting the evidence brought against him, which was adduced only a day or two days before judgment was given. This Bill intended to give relief not to this gentleman sole but to all those whose characters might be unjustly aspersed, by imposing upon their accusers the necessity of giving twenty days' or a month's notice. It was a most cruel act to perpetuate the penalty for an offence committed some thirty years ago. This gentleman was advanced in years; he had nearly run out the period of life allotted to mankind; and surely, when this unfortunate gentleman passed away, they would not allow the cold and heartless world to point the finger of scorn at his innocent widow and orphan children. As they knew, the Duke of Wellington gave evidence in Parliament on the abolition of flogging and in answer to a question he stated that there were gentlemen in the army who had attained that rank of general officers, and who in former days had been flogged. In the army a man might have been in the defaulter-book fourteen, fifteen or twenty times, and might have received punishment; still, if his name was clear of the defaulter-book for two years, the whole of his former conduct was whitewashed, and he could leave the regiment with a good character. He would ask honorable members if they had not, in their youthful days, committed offences which they would be sorry to see brought into daylight. He himself would regret some of his offences. He hoped, therefore, that honorable gentlemen would do as they would be done by, and would look upon this matter in a charitable and Christian spirit, and forgive as they would expect to be forgiven, allowing this man to go and sin no more.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE felt it to be his duty to move, That this Bill be read a second time that day six months. The ground on which he asked that this Bill should be virtually shelved was that they had exhaustively considered the subject previously; they had taken a lenient view of the matter, and tried their best to do what they thought was just at the time; and their recommendation was adopted and carried out in another place. No doubt there were some circumstances attending this case which deprived it of some of the worst features of the crime of forgery and uttering, but they were, after all, not of such a nature as to entitle him to obtain pardon in England, and he had never come purged before any tribunal in the country where he committed the offence. Arguments based on the injustice of ex post facto legislation must always give way to expediency. There were many things contrary to law which nevertheless, for the safety of the bulk of the population, it was necessary to do; and it was an acknowledged principle that, when cases arose, such claims should be fairly compensated. Acting on that principle, the Government of the day, chiefly because it was recommended by that Council, had the courage, against considerable opposition, to propose and carry a vote of £1,000 to this individual, who had met with this qualified wrong. He said "qualified wrong;" because, although admitted to practice, Mr. Smythies had been admitted on a misunderstanding—a misunderstanding which had arisen from an imperfect narration of his own case. He had not, as he should have done, supplied the Judge with minutes of the trial, but gave a short newspaper extract, which alluded but very cursorily to the trial. He admitted that he had been found guilty of one of the two offences of forgery and uttering, but not that he was found guilty of both; whereas, in point of fact, he had been found guilty on both charges. Therefore, that must be regarded as an intentional misstatement. Looking at his case from the point of view in which he presented it, one of the Judges at all events supported his case, and he was admitted to practice. It was found afterwards that this case came completely within the category of cases in which public interest was opposed to the right which had been so acquired, and the Bill of 1871 was brought in to deprive him of it. And what did that Act provide? The 5th clause of that Act provided,—

"Any person who, having been admitted to practice as a barrister or solicitor of the Supreme Court prior to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, shall have been disqualified from practising as a barrister or solicitor of the Supreme Court by the operation of the third section of 'The Law Practitioners Amendment Act, 1866,' may apply to the Supreme Court for exemption from the penalties of the said Act under the following circumstances, namely:—

"If he shall satisfy the Court,—

"1. Either that there are circumstances in his case not adduced at his trial which if adduced would in the opinion of the Court have influenced the jury to find a verdict of 'Not guilty:' or,

"2. That the circumstances of his case do not imply such moral turpitude as to unfit him for the exercise of his profession.

And if in either of the cases provided for by subsections (1) and (2) he shall in addition satisfy the Court that since his conviction and up to the time of his application he has pursued a course of upright conduct."

It was with respect to the latter part of that clause that Mr. Smythies had failed. He admitted that this gentleman's case was an unfortunate one, and his removal from the roll of solicitors appeared to be an infraction of the almost invariable practice of not carrying out ex post facto legislation; but that gentleman received, in consideration of the quasi injury to which he had been subjected, the sum of £1,000. He (Colonel Whitmore) hoped that when that money was liberally given to him by the Government—and, to some extent, courageously given by the Government, because the great body of the profession and a large number of members of both branches of the Legislature were very much opposed to it—they would have heard the last of this case. There could be no question that it was not only his original crime—which was a very grave one—but also his conduct since he had been in this country, which was against him. It must also be borne in mind that the position of solicitor was one of singular trust in this country, and one which it was very important should be filled only by people in whom the utmost confidence could be reposed. Disturb the confidence felt in that profession, and a very large number of persons in the country would be put to very great inconvenience indeed. Introduce into the ranks of the solicitors of New Zealand persons who were not to be trusted, and who had, in their previous history, been found guilty of such crimes, and an enormous number of persons would no doubt be robbed of means which they could not afford to lose; and those persons would be the most helpless members of the community—women, and gentlemen who had no business habits. In the interest of those persons, and in the interest of the good character of the colony—which ought not to be supposed to be an asylum and place of congregation for all solicitors who were unable to practise in any other country in the world—it ought to be their desire to keep the ranks of the legal profession as pure as they could. However much the Hon. Colonel Brett might have worked upon their feelings on this occasion, and however much they might sympathize with the misfortunes of this gentleman, they ought to resist such feelings, and refuse to re-open a question completely set at rest by an exhaustive debate in 1872.

*The Hon. Mr. HALL said that, whichever way honorable members might vote on this occasion, he was sure they would all appreciate the motives which had induced the honorable and gallant Colonel to bring the subject forward. It did credit to his kindness of heart, and his anxious desire to promote the cause of justice. At the same time, he claimed to be no less anxious to do justice than his honorable friend, and it would have been a matter of great satisfaction to him if he could have felt himself justified in voting for this Bill. But on reconsideration of the whole facts of the case, he felt that he must give his vote on this occasion as he had given it on previous occasions. His honorable friend had so clearly and fairly stated the history of the case, that he need say very few words on that subject; but he thought the Council ought to be again reminded that, though it was true the Legislature did a wrong by ex post facto legislation to Mr. Smythies, yet they went as far as they were called upon to go to remedy that wrong, when they enabled the Judges of the Supreme Court to re-admit him to practice if, during the time he had been in practice in New Zealand, his conduct had been such as to entitle him to be retained in his position as a solicitor. In pursuance of that legislation, the Judges heard Mr. Smythies' petition, and his honorable friend had not completely laid the result before the Council. It is quite true that the Judges did say,—

"We may say at once that these charges would not, either separately or together, have been sufficient to justify the Court in striking Mr. Smythies off the rolls, or probably even in suspending him from practice. Moreover, he has, in some instances, been able to explain his conduct in a way more or less satisfactory."

But his honorable friend ought to have gone a little further. The Judges went on to say,—

"Yet the question here being whether we can, with safe conscience, affirm that he has carried himself throughout these transactions as an 'upright' man, we feel bound to declare that we cannot do so, and that there remain, after every allowance made, unanswered imputations which are fatal to his case."

That was the deliberate judgment of the Judges of the Supreme Court; and he was sure honorable members would admit that the Judges were not only upright and impartial, but known to them all as kind-hearted and considerate men. If, therefore, the case came before the Council without any other feature, he would be unable to vote for the Bill. But that was not the whole history of the case, as pointed out by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore. The Legislature went farther—and he thought it was to their credit that they did so—in remedying the wrong which it was asserted they had inflicted on Mr. Smythies. In 1872—chiefly, he thought, at the suggestion of members of that Council—a resolution was proposed in the other branch of the Legislature for the payment to Mr. Smythies of a sum of money in compensation for any wrong the Legislature had inflicted upon him. That resolution was passed; a sum was placed in the Appropriation Act: that sum was received by Mr. Smythies, who gave a receipt for it. He considered Mr. Smythies accepted that sum in full satisfaction of all claims he had upon New Zealand. It had been asserted, however, that the question was not what Mr. Smythies was induced to sign, but what was the intention of Parliament in voting this money. Now that was true. They ought to ascertain what was the bond fide intention of the Parliament in voting that money. The vote would not be largely debated by that Council, as they did not appropriate money; but it was debated in the other branch of the Legislature, and he might be allowed to make quotations from some of the speeches made in the course of that debate. The resolution was brought forward by Mr. Bathgate, and was to the following effect:—

"That a respectful address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to place the sum of _____ upon the estimates, to be paid to Mr. Henry Smythies by way of compensation for the loss which he has sustained by the operation of 'The Law Practitioners Act Amendment Act, 1866.'"

In moving that resolution, Mr. Bathgate made a speech from which the following were quotations:—

"The question might be summed up in this way: How much loss had Mr. Smythies sustained through the action of the House in passing 'The Law Practitioners Act Amendment Act, 1866'? He might sum up the whole question by quoting one single sentence from a short note handed to him by Mr. Smythies. He states, 'If I am turned adrift without compensation, which would enable me to establish myself in some other business, the remainder of my life, and that of my wife, must be one of utter poverty and misery.'"

Therefore Mr. Smythies asked that sum, not for the purpose of coming to Parliament again, but for the purpose of establishing himself in some other business. Mr. Bathgate went on to say,—

"It was right that they should take into consideration the future value of his business. They had taken away not only the four years' employment, but they had taken away the full value of the profits he would have received from his business during the future."

And again,—

"They could atone to some extent for the wrong done, and put an end to that much-voiced question, by enabling him to turn his attention during his remaining days to some other line of business, and preventing that poverty and ruin which must overtake him if compensation be refused."

It seemed to him that that was conclusive as to the understanding upon which the House was asked to vote the money by the gentleman who proposed this resolution. Then the gentleman who followed him, Mr. Murray, stated,—

"He did not think the House was in a position to vote such a sum as would indemnify Mr. Smythies for all the loss he had sustained; but some consideration should be given to the matter, not merely in regard to compensation, but in order to close the subject, which had been brought before them for the last two years."

Then Sir Julius Vogel, who spoke very strongly in support of Mr. Smythies' case, said,—

"He had seen a letter by which it appeared that to carry out the proposal which he (Mr. Vogel) made on the previous day, that he should have a yearly grant, with a view to his coming up to the Legislature from year to year to seek redress, would be impossible, because Mr. Smythies felt that he had no longer strength to do himself justice. He was old and feeble now, and broken down, and did not feel equal to making further efforts. Therefore, all they could do in the matter was to make a money grant, which at once and for ever would settle the matter."

Then Mr. Steward said,—

"If, in consequence of the act of the other branch of the Legislature, the House could not reinstate Mr. Smythies, all they could do was to give him some money grant, and thus end the matter. It had been suggested that there should be an annual grant. He did not agree with the suggestion, as he thought it would be better for the House to finally settle the question, which had been for some considerable time before the public, the Legislature, and the Judges in various ways."

During the same debate, Sir Julius Vogel quoted a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Miller in the Council, in which he stated,—

"There were many ways of treating it. There was the way proposed by the Minister of Justice, and there was also a money reparation way. He maintained that it would be better to pay £10,000 to that individual, if wrong had been done him, than for them to repeal an Act which was founded absolutely upon what was right in the abstract and in every other way."

He made also a quotation from the Hon. Mr. Sewell, as follows:—

"As to the question of compensation, he perfectly agreed with the Hon. Mr. Miller, that it would be better for the colony to pay £10,000 rather than adopt such a course as was proposed."

He asked any honorable member whether after reading those speeches—the speech of the proposer and of the chief supporter of Mr. Smythies' claim—it was not abundantly clear that the intention of the House in voting that sum of £1,000 was to settle not only claims for past grievances, but to settle the matter for ever. He felt strongly on the subject, because at the time the money had to be paid he filled the office of Colonial Secretary, and it was his duty to see the intentions of the Legislature given effect to. He required the Attorney-General to prepare a very clear and distinct receipt to be signed by Mr. Smythies before he received the money. That receipt had been laid on the table, and he held a copy in his hand. In that receipt Mr. Smythies stated—

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON suggested that the honorable gentleman should read the whole of the receipt.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL only proposed to read a portion of it, because he was afraid of wearying the Council. However, the receipt was as follows:—

"I, the undersigned Henry Smythies, do hereby acknowledge that I have this day received from the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer of the Colony of New Zealand the sum of one thousand pounds (£1,000) sterling, being a sum of money which, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the said colony, passed on the second day of October instant, was voted to be paid to me 'by way of compensation for the loss which he has sustained by the operation of 'The Law Practitioners Act Amendment Act, 1866.' And I do hereby further acknowledge and declare that the said sum is received by me in full discharge and satisfaction of all or any claims or demands which I allege to have or to have had against the said colony or the General Assembly thereof, for or by reason of anything contained in 'The Law Practitioners Act Amendment Act, 1866,' or any Act amending the same, and which may in any manner have affected or concerned me, directly or indirectly, in the respect of the practice of the profession of a barrister of the Supreme Court or solicitor thereof, or any other function, duty, or privilege which as such barrister or solicitor I was or might have been entitled to perform or exercise."

He could not possibly understand how any gentleman, in the face of that document, could say that the £1,000 which was paid to Mr. Smythies was in compensation for claims for previous losses, and not in full satisfaction of all claims he had on account of the passing of the Act of 1866. On those grounds, he thought the Council must absolutely say No to the proposition of his honorable and gallant friend. If they did not, he thought they would be giving way not to the real merits of the case, but to the sheer force of importunity which Mr. Smythies brought to bear upon them. His honorable friend had drawn a very touching picture of the painful position in which Mr. Smythies was placed. The honorable gentleman had, he thought, a little overdrawn it. It was not quite correct that they debarred Mr. Smythies, who was a man of great ability, from earning his livelihood in some other way, because, in point of fact, they knew he was doing so; but what his honorable friend asked them to do was to enable Mr. Smythies again to go to the Supreme Court, to be put back into the position of an officer of the Supreme Court. The position of solicitor was one of very great power, and to which were attached considerable privileges. He was a person in whom the Court necessarily placed very great confidence, and whose word and certificate it took as it did not take that of any ordinary person. The question now before them was, were they, after the Court had once refused, as the extracts he had read showed, to send Mr. Smythies back again to the Court and say, "We wish you again to consider whether Mr. Smythies should not be placed in the position of an officer of the Court"? He did not think anything that had come before them had shown that this was just. The history of Mr. Smythies since he was admitted to practice—part of which had been laid before them in affidavits—showed, he thought, that it would be a great misfortune to the locality in which he resided if he were readmitted to practice as a solicitor and barrister of the Supreme Court. His course of conduct during the time he was practising, as shown in the affidavits, was such that they would be inflicting a very great injury—to use the mildest term—upon any community, and would be doing it a great wrong, if they went out of their way to again place Mr. Smythies in the position of a solicitor. On those grounds, and on the ground that what had been done in the matter of the grant of money was done in full satisfaction of any claims Mr. Smythies might have, and was received by him in full satisfaction, he thought they were bound to refuse to entertain this application. While he gave full credit to his honorable friend for his kind motives in bringing this subject forward, he felt bound to vote against the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that, while the difficulties in this case certainly originated with Mr. Smythies himself, he must express his regret that in these later stages needless difficulties appeared to have been interposed which were not attributable to the action of that gentleman. He must admit that, after what had been read by the Hon. Mr. Hall, it would seem that it was understood, at any rate by the Legislature, that the compensation of the session of 1872 was intended to be a final settlement of accounts with Mr. Smythies. Yet Mr. Smythies himself did not hold that view of the subject; and he would vote for the second reading of the Bill, however hopeless it might be. On a former occasion it fell to his lot, by direction of the Petitions Committee, to introduce a Bill, which was rejected, and which proposed to afford relief to Mr. Smythies. On that occasion he went fully into the merits of the case, and he then said, what he now repeated, as regarded the charges of sharp practice against Mr. Smythies—which had been kindly recirculated amongst them in the form of a parliamentary paper—that when they investigated them and went fully into the merits of the case, it appeared that there had been a little sharp practice on both sides; but that on the other side the sharp practice had been far worse than that on the part of Mr. Smythies. He was sorry that an additional difficulty had been thrown in the way by the wording of the receipt which was signed for the money, but he could not himself see his way to regard that as an insuperable difficulty. He was afraid that Mr. Smythies signed the receipt at a time when he had very little prospect of further relief without additional evidence; and he could only account for it by supposing that, possibly, the £1,000 appeared a very large consideration, and that the innocent simplicity of Mr. Smythies was not equal to the occasion. He would support the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES would support the amendment. After the remarks which had been made by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore and the Hon. Mr. Hall, there was very little to be said. Those honorable gentlemen had gone into very nearly every point; but there was one particular on which he thought he might add a little to what had been said, and that was with reference to the character of the legislation. As honorable members would remember, the clause that was introduced into the Law Practitioners Act was modelled upon a clause in an English Act of George I., which, he thought, very clearly laid down the principle upon which legislation of this character should be based, and afforded ample reason for enacting provisions which might be stigmatized as retrospective, and would also justify that retrospective legislation. The clause in the English Act read as follows:—

“And for avoiding the great mischiefs and abuses which arise from infamous and wicked persons already convicted of wilful perjury or forgery, &c.”

If there was one class more than another likely to be dangerous to a community, it was the class of lawyers of a character described in that clause; and it seemed to him that, though the Act might be stigmatized as retrospective legislation, it acted justly in debarring such persons from holding a position which would place them in confidential relations with the most helpless of the community. If persons of that character were allowed to practise, it would, as the Hon. Mr. Fox had said in another place, be simply placing the wolves in charge of the sheepfold. That retrospective legislation, such as this might be called, could be justified, he would show by reading an extract from what was said in 1871 on this subject in another place by Mr. Rolleston. That honorable gentleman then said,—

“It had been said that retrospective legislation was unjust and unfair. Now, generally, the objection to retrospective legislation had an element of truth in it, which made it exceedingly taking; but in a case like the present it was inapplicable. Retrospective legislation might be unjust and unfair where the rights of individuals had been injuriously affected in a way which had not been contemplated at the time it was passed; but it appeared to him that the criminal law was founded on principles which were universal, uniform, and fixed, and which did not depend upon a question of time. It was no injustice on the part of the House to pass a law which declared that a certain crime incapacitated a man from practising a certain profession, when such a law was passed in the interests of the public generally. It was not for the purpose of inflicting pain or punishment upon an individual, but for the protection of the public.”

With that object he held that such action was justifiable. He concurred so fully in the remarks that had fallen from both the honorable gentlemen who had opposed the Bill, that he would only be wearying the Council if he repeated, perhaps in less eloquent terms, what had already been said. His recollection of the particulars of this case, and the knowledge he had acquired of the circumstances, did not exactly bear out his honorable friend Colonel Brett in stating that Mr. Smythies gained no pecuniary advantage from the crime of which he was convicted; for, if he recollected the circumstances aright, he forged the order to recover costs from a client against whom he had no other recourse, and from whom he could not have legally recovered the costs, amounting to about £300 or £400, without some such action as he took. He could hardly be said to have gained no pecuniary advantage.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON had listened with some surprise to this debate, because he had heard a good deal concerning the case of a certain individual, but not a word about the Bill itself. Now, he had looked through the Bill, and he could not find any reference whatever to Mr. Smythies, or anything affecting his case. The Bill apparently was introduced with the object of making clear some points which were not quite clear in the law of 1871, as to granting facilities for persons to go before the Court and have their cases reheard. He thought it was a great pity that Mr. Smythies' name had been brought up on this occasion. He felt a certain amount of sympathy for that gentleman, but he recognized that it was very much his own fault that he had not been readmitted to the Bar. He had no doubt that, had he been able to satisfy the Judges that up to the time of his application for readmission his conduct had been proper, he would have been readmitted. He would not enter into the circumstances of the case, but would repeat, with regard to the Bill now before the Council, that there was nothing that should frighten them very much. The main point seemed to be contained in the last clause. He believed there was some doubt as to whether, under the existing law, a person could make a second application for readmission, and he thought it was desirable that this point should be decided. No doubt it might be said it was not right, after persons had once been refused, to give them an opportunity to bother the Judges again and again with applications for admission; but he believed no Judge would, in any way, object to rehear a case, provided there were sufficient grounds disclosed in affidavits to lead him to think the applicant was entitled to a rehearing. He would certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said he intended to support the Bill. He believed the adoption of the word "upright" as indicating, with other terms, the nature of the conduct which Mr. Smythies should prove to have observed during the time of his probation, or between the passing of the Act of 1866 and the period of his application for readmission, had rendered it impossible for the unfortunate man to get inside the Bar; and he remembered how the Hon. Mr. Sewell laughed triumphantly when he saw that word inserted in the Act of 1871.

* The Hon. Colonel BRETT, in reply, would remind honorable members that this case had been twice before both Houses of the Legislature, and had been twice investigated by the respective Petitions Committees, and he might say, with regard to the Committee of the Council, that it had been favourably reported upon on both occasions. He did not think it was liberal on the part of the Council to repudiate the decision of its Select Committee, which, every one would admit, had always taken the greatest care in arriving at its conclusions. The last petition on the subject prayed that, if any wrong had been done to this unfortunate gentleman, it might be rectified; and that petition was signed by nineteen gentlemen, all of whom were members of the legal profession. If the legal profession petitioned that this gentleman should be allowed to practise again, he could not see how the laity could object. The Hon. Mr. Hall had said that the £1,000 was given to Mr. Smythies as compensation on condition that he never again brought his case forward. He (Colonel Brett) understood that that money was given to him in adjustment of all money claims. Surely it was not in the nature of a money transaction when a man sought to reclaim his character and his honor! A gentleman's honor, no matter of what profession he was, was as dear to him as life itself; and he trusted the Council would take that view of the case. In regard to the payment of compensation, with the permission of the Council he would read a letter by the late Premier, Sir Julius Vogel, the original of which he had himself read some time ago, and which was in contradiction of the view taken by the Hon. Mr. Hall, when giving his version of Mr. Smythies' receipt. The letter was as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter, I have to say that, in my opinion, the £1,000 paid to you debars you from any further claim for compensation, but not from taking any steps you think fit, or the Legislature from taking any steps it thinks fit, to relieve you from the disabilities under which you labour.—I remain, &c.,

"JULIUS VOGEL."

That receipt surely did not preclude Mr. Smythies from appealing to the members of the Council to be allowed to appear before the Judges of the Supreme Court, who were the guardians of the honor and purity of the Bar. They were not, he hoped, going to shut the door of the Temple of Justice against this gentleman. Locks, bolts, and bars should fly asunder to justice. Justice was what this unfortunate gentleman wanted; and he merely asked that the Judges should report upon his case again. If the Judges reported unfavourably, he would then be debarred from practising; but if they reported favourably, and Mr. Smythies was permitted to practise again, surely they would not object to that, or oppose such a thing, nor could they feel sorry if this gentleman, after a full inquiry, were allowed to resume his profession. He would say no more, but express a hope that the Council, with Christian humanity, would temper justice with mercy.

Question put, "That the word 'now' proposed to be left out, stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

GOLD DUTIES BILL.

* The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he hoped it would receive more favourable consideration than the last Bill they had before them. Its object was to reduce the export duty on gold from 2s. to 1s. 6d. an ounce. He believed that in Otago the feeling was universal amongst the miners that such a reduction should take place; but he believed that in Westland and Auckland there was a division of feeling. However, he did not know that even in those parts of the colony the majority were not in favour of such a reduction. There was no doubt whatever that at the present moment it was a question whether it would be a profit or loss to continue mining in certain parts of the country, owing to the imposition of this duty. Honorable gentlemen might say that it was a rental for the use of the land, but it must be recollected that there were very many other duties imposed on miners besides this export duty. The miners had to pay for their miners' rights at the rate of £1 per annum; and they also had to pay for miners' licenses, registration fees, and for water rights. The whole taxation of the miners amounted to £82,000 a year, which on 16,000 people amounted to £5 2s. 6d. per head; and the gold export duty amounted to 2½ per cent. of the value. The miners, as honorable gentlemen were no doubt aware, had sent a communication to the Premier, from which he would read the following extract:—

"We venture to assure you that, so far from the miners wishing to evade local taxation for necessary works, they are quite willing to pay such equitable rate as may be agreed to by any local government existing, or which may be called into existence, in which they are fairly represented; provided that it is not specially collected from them as a class for the supposititious benefit of the population of all classes in, and to come in during the next few years, their district, county, or province."

In answer to that, the Premier said,—

"Under the new system, which will I hope prevail, each district will have to attend to its own wants; and there are few gold field districts which will be able to afford to dispense with aid from the gold fields revenue, including export duty. I think you will find that, under the Government proposals, the residents, including the holders of miners' rights, in gold fields, will have very substantial powers of self-government. We do not propose to give a power to tax mining property; and the whole of the gold fields revenue, including export duty, which we propose to surrender, will, I think, be too valuable a resource for the gold fields community, after due consideration, to be willing to forego."

That was the proposal of the Government; but since that the Rating Bill had passed the Legislature, and the clause exempting mining property from rates had been struck out. Therefore the miners would be rated under the Rating Act; and, in return for that, he thought the least the Council could do was to reduce the export duty on gold. The whole of the reduction proposed to be made was only 25 per cent. of the present amount imposed, and would not fall heavily on such a rich district as Westland, where thousands of people were now rushing to, or in the Province of Auckland; but it would be a very substantial benefit to the province from which he came. In other colonies, the gold duty had been almost entirely abolished; and he thought they, as time went on, should abolish the gold duty too. He thought this was a proposal which the Council would warmly support; and he hoped the second reading of the Bill would be carried by a large majority.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES hoped his honorable friend would not be disgusted by his making the same proposal with regard to this Bill as was successfully made with reference to the last Bill. He would now move, That this Bill be read a second time that day six months. He had various reasons for moving this amendment. They all knew that the gold miners had special privileges. They had all along enjoyed an immunity from certain local rates; they had a political franchise given to them on account of their miner's right; and a large expenditure was saved to them by the escort which the Government provided. They also had very expensive roads constructed to the most populous centres on the gold fields; and, in some cases, railways had been pushed forward. And, more than that, as part of the large scheme of Public Works and Immigration, in some districts very expensive waterworks had been made to aid them in prosecuting an industry which was of a transient character. Now, he thought that, so long as special privileges were continued to be given to miners, they must expect to have to bear some special burdens, and the special burden in this case was not so very onerous after all. It should also be borne in mind that it was probable that, if they lightened the special burden in this case, in accordance with the proposal of this Bill, it was not at all certain that they would be lightening any burden which pressed upon the miner. It by no means followed that if the gold duty was lessened, the miner alone would be benefited by it. He was disposed to think that in most cases it would not be the gold miners, but the gold buyers—the banks—that would gain by this proposal. But independently of that altogether, and upon the other consideration to which he had referred, he thought it would be quite time enough, when the miners were placed upon the same footing as all other settlers with respect to political and other privileges, to release them from this special liability. They knew very well that at the present time the mining interest was a power in the State, and had been enabled to become so and continue so mainly because their representatives represented a class. He had not the least doubt that that had been felt in various Legislatures. He could speak for one at least, in which the power of that class of representatives had involved the Provincial Government in very large and not unfrequently unnecessary expenditure. Now, representatives from the gold fields said they did not desire to be left separate from other settlers; that they sought no special privileges—that they desired to be considered as part of the population. He would say, in reply to that, if such was the case let them withdraw the special privileges which the miners now enjoyed, and then relieve them from special liabilities. In former sessions various alterations had been made in the Electoral Acts, but he did not find that the representatives of mining districts were willing to agree to the withdrawal of the special political privileges which they enjoyed. He remembered very well one occasion, in which the Miners' Representation Act was altered, and there being a difference of opinion between that Council and the other branch of the Legislature. He dared say the Hon. Mr. Hall could recollect that occasion, because a member of the Conference reminded that honorable gentleman of the "revocare gradum," and he thought they had found that that anticipation was correct. Then there was another view to be taken of this question. The Hon. Mr. Campbell referred to the declaration that the miners were willing to bear local burdens. Now, under the altered system of things—the new order that was about to be established—he apprehended that this gold duty and all those special gold revenues would become local revenue, so that in fact it would not be a withdrawal of revenue from a locality for general purposes, but the application of special local revenue to local purposes; and that, he thought, ought to satisfy the mining community. It seemed to him that, if the gold revenue was to be materially lessened, some counties would find it rather difficult to make both ends meet. While moving the amendment, that the Bill be read that day six months, he wished it to be distinctly understood that his great desire was to see the miners rank with the rest of the community, subject to no special liabilities and entitled to no special privileges.

* Mr. BONAR said that, as coming from a part of the country mainly dependent upon gold mining, it might be naturally expected that he would give his support to a motion proposing to relieve the miner from an exceptional tax. But, in the face of the great requirements of the gold fields, and in the face of the large amount of work that would require to be carried out, and for which the gold fields would have to look to the colony, in the face of the altered state of things referred to by the Hon. Mr. Menzies, he could not give his support to any motion which would have the effect of reducing the revenue from this particular source by 25 per cent. It must be borne in mind that, although only 25 per cent. was asked at present, that was but a prelude to the reduction of the whole of the gold duty. What would be the position of a large county like Westland if the whole of the gold duty was abolished? Its position would be simply this: It would be barely able to carry on ordinary business, even with assistance from the Government. In the face of the large population there, with a heavily-timbered country and a large amount of work to be done, in the face of the large amount of money still required to be expended in order to construct and maintain those water-races on which the future success of the gold fields so much depended, they were not in a position to strike off any item of revenue. Some few years ago, a reduction was made in the gold duty from 2s. 6d. to 2s. What followed? The practical result was, that although the gold duty was reduced by 6d. an ounce, a still greater reduction in the price of gold was made by the banks, to whom the whole benefit went. There was a combination amongst the banks, and the price of gold was reduced by 1s. per ounce. Therefore the reduction which was made at that time merely deprived the gold fields of an amount of revenue which would otherwise be available; and when the representatives of the mining districts tried to get assistance for necessary works on the gold fields, it was continually thrown in their teeth that the gold duty had been reduced. If they now struck off a portion of this gold duty, the gold-mining districts would have to come to the Assembly and ask it to make up for the loss. He did not think that was what the mining community desired, and he did not think it would be a desirable state of things to bring about. He maintained that it was impossible for the majority of the gold fields in the colony to do without the revenue coming to them from this special taxation. It had been argued that the miners were perfectly willing to be rated the same as other people, and desired to be placed on an equal footing with the other settlers. It had been said that as a matter of fact the property of the gold miners could be rated, and was rated, in the ordinary way; but from his own experience he could say that they had tried to rate gold miners, and had utterly failed to do so. The very farthest that they had been able to go was to rate the dwellings—the hut or tent in which the miner lived. As for attempting to place a valuation on a miner's claim, or upon anything of that sort, it was simply impossible to so fix the value as to recover the rates upon it. Therefore, practically the miners were not rated. He had known a very curious case in connection with one of the Road Boards in Westland. The whole of the Board, except one member, paid no rates; yet those were the persons who imposed rates on freeholders in the district. He thought that showed it was impossible to arrive at the same results by direct rating that could be arrived at by levying gold duty. The latter was easily collected, and did not press very heavily upon the miners. No doubt, if the colony was in a position to dispense with it, and at the same time had sufficient revenue to expend on necessary works on gold fields, he would say, Abolish the gold duty. It was special taxation, and he would be happy to see it wiped away. But at the present time the colony could not do without the duty, and therefore he would be forced to support the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Menzies.

The Hon. Captain FRASER intended to support the motion of the Hon. Mr. Menzies, but from an altogether different cause. He considered that this Bill was a popularity-seeking sham. He was totally opposed to the gold duty or to any export duty whatever. He saw no more reason for an export duty on gold than on wool. He wished the miner put on exactly the same footing as other people. Repeal their special privileges, repeal the gold duty; let them pay £1 for permission to mine, but no more. Gold mining in Otago had now become a quiet settled industry. Let them suppose a company possessing one of those reefs, with a capital of £10,000. They might obtain in the year 10,000 ounces of gold, and after paying all expenses probably very little would remain for net profit, and if they took from that 2s. an ounce—say £800, or 8 per cent. on the capital—it might make all the difference between keeping up operations and putting a stop to them altogether. What he would like would be that the Government during the recess should consider the question, and next session bring in a Bill placing the miners on the same footing as other people, and repealing this duty altogether. With reference to the expense of the escort, that was maintained not for the benefit of the miners, but for the benefit of the banks, which ought to be compelled to bear the cost instead of the Provincial Governments. It was only in barbarous countries such as Buenos Ayres that export duties were imposed on the commodities produced; and he hoped some means would be devised for making miners pay rates in the ordinary way.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that this Bill was introduced in another place by a private member, but in its passage through the House it received the assent of the Government, and he would vote for the second reading of the Bill. He was free to admit, however, that there was a great deal to be said on both sides of this question. In one portion of the colony there was a gold field, with which he had some acquaintance, which will have no other revenue than that derivable from this particular source; and he was aware that this reduction in the duty, small as it was, would be very greatly felt by that community, when it came to depend, as it would shortly, solely upon gold fields revenue for the prosecution of works within the district. He alluded to the Thames Gold Field. He did not know enough of the circumstances of other parts of the colony to be able to say whether or not it would be desirable there to make this reduction. But it was within his recollection that the Otago Provincial Government—as far as he could gather from official sources which were sufficiently clear to give a glimpse of their real sentiments—were themselves not very favourable to a reduction of that duty, and the consequent loss of revenue. However, he saw that this was a question on which a difference of opinion might very well be allowed; and as far as other gold fields were concerned, there were honorable gentlemen in the Council who could speak with very much greater authority than himself.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON said he had ever looked upon this gold duty as one of the most just and equitable taxes that was ever imposed in this country. The digger, as such, had an enormous amount of privilege granted to him; and this gold duty was the only way in which they could get at him as a digger to compensate for those privileges. The Hon. Mr. Bonar had pointed out a case in which a Road Board was entirely composed of men who did not pay rates themselves, but who were entitled to levy rates upon the rest of the community among whom they lived. He had always, both in the Provincial and General Legislatures, opposed any attempt to reduce this duty, as he had always regarded it as a just and equitable tax. He would therefore vote against the second reading of the Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. LAHMANN would vote for the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Menzies, but for different reasons than stated by the honorable gentleman. They had heard a great deal about special privileges which the miners enjoyed, but had not been told what those special privileges were. He failed to see that the miners enjoyed any privilege for which they did not pay, and pay more in proportion than any other portion of the community. He regretted very much to find that the industry of mining was so little appreciated, and far less understood, by honorable gentlemen who ought to know better, having moved about gold fields for a considerable time. He fully agreed with the Hon. Mr. Bonar that the reduction of 6d. an ounce from the gold duty would not benefit the miners at all, or at any rate not to a sufficient extent to make it desirable that the duty should be reduced. On the other hand, the Government did not act with justice in declining to abolish the duty altogether. By consenting to the duty being reduced, they acknowledged that it was not an equitable tax, and, in fact, was no more than a just one. When it was considered that the mining community in New Zealand had contributed about a million of money in duty on gold, some idea would be formed of the importance of the industry. Further, it should not be forgot that the individual miner paid far more to the Consolidated Revenue than almost any other inhabitant of the colony. Speaking of the miners as a body, and from his own experience in the then County of Westland, he could say that a community of 15,000 souls contributed more than £100,000 per annum to the Customs revenue; and he said, without fear of contradiction, that there was no part of New Zealand where an equal number of the inhabitants paid so much towards the Consolidated Revenue as the mining community. What were the special privileges the miner enjoyed? He had to pay not only for his miner's right, but also for all that was done for him to get justice in the Courts. If he wanted surveys made, or if he applied for other rights, he was obliged to pay very high. What was it made the miner reluctant to contribute the ordinary taxes but these duties? He said, "I am taxed already exceptionally and sufficiently. The mining community of the colony pays more than any other section, and why should I be taxed any more?" He had himself experienced, as County Chairman in Westland, how difficult it was to collect taxes from the miners, but the reason given was always the existence of this duty. Honorable members said they wished to maintain the gold duty in order to supply funds to meet the great requirements and wants of the gold fields, including water-races and so forth; but he would ask those gentlemen, did the miners expect to enjoy the privilege of getting water for nothing? Whenever the miners obtained supplies from water-races they paid for them, and paid very dearly. Therefore that argument would hardly hold good. He would vote against this Bill because he hoped and expected that the Government would think it just and desirable to bring in a measure to abolish the duty altogether. When that was done the miners would willingly contribute their fair share of taxation, in the same proportion as other sections of the community were bound to do.

* The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL would like to correct a misapprehension which the Council might have fallen into in consequence of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Menzies. The honorable gentleman said the miners were specially privileged in regard to voting. As far as that went he agreed with the honorable member, and he hoped that inequality would ultimately be remedied. But that was no reason why the miners should be taxed in this particular way. The honorable gentleman then said that the miners had their gold brought down free. Well, the total cost of the transport of gold in the Province of Otago was about £200. He also said that they had roads and railways made for them. Other portions of the community had roads and railways made, and why should not the miners? It was no argument whatever to say that because roads had been made to the gold fields, therefore the miners should be specially taxed for them. The honorable gentleman had a road and a railway not far from where he lived, and he would object to be specially taxed on that account as against those who had a similar road and railway. Then the honorable gentleman argued that this reduction would not benefit the miners, but that the banks would get the advantage of it. He must be aware that, with so many branches of banks on the gold fields and so much banking competition as there was at present, the very utmost price was given for the gold. If what the honorable gentleman said was true, it would not hurt to put another sixpence an ounce duty on the miners, because then the additional sum would come from the banks. They might rest assured that gold, like every other commodity, brought its full value, and that, with the competition which at present existed, the banks, merchants, or whoever purchased, paid the utmost price. He was assured some time ago by a banker that the only advantage banks derived was an increase of their circulation, and he believed that was the case. He was much pleased to hear the speech in which the Hon. Captain Fraser advocated the reduction and abolition of the duty, but could not account for the action he proposed to take in voting against the Bill when he certainly spoke very strongly in its favour. He hoped the Council would read the Bill a second time.

Question put, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The Waitara Harbour Board Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

The Wellington Debts Bill, the Attorney-General's Bill, the Public Trust Office Bill.

ABOLITION.

Major ATKINSON.—I have the honor, by direction of His Excellency the Governor, to lay on the table a copy of a letter addressed to His Excellency by Sir George Grey, the Superintendent of Auckland, covering a telegram to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and I move that the documents be read.

Mr. STOUT.—I should like to know why the usual course should be departed from in this particular instance. I consider that it would be a dangerous motion to pass, as the result would be that all Government papers laid on the table during the session might be read. I do not know why this motion has been made, and I would ask the Premier to state his reasons for asking that this correspondence should be read. I know not what his object is in making this motion, unless he means that we should do no other business to-day than discuss this correspondence.

Sir G. GREY.—Before the correspondence is read, I would like to ask if any discussion can take place upon the correspondence after it has been read?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question will have to be put, that the correspondence be read. Any honorable member may speak upon that question. Motion agreed to.

The CLERK read the correspondence, as follows:—

Sir G. GREY to His Excellency the GOVERNOR.

"Wellington, 7th October, 1876.

"MY LORD,—I have the honor to enclose, for your Excellency's information, copy of a cablegram which I am just transmitting to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, London.—I have, &c.,

"G. GREY,

"Superintendent of Auckland.

"His Excellency the Governor."

(Enclosure.)

Sir G. GREY to the Right Hon. the SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES, London.

"Wellington, N.Z., 7th October, 1876.

"Urgent.—I dutifully refer to my letter 5th June last. Government determined to enforce Abolition Act without consulting Provincial Legislatures, and against wish of provinces containing more than one-half white population of colony, two-thirds of Natives included. Disturbances imminent. Some threaten employment Queen's ships. I earnestly pray telegraph to prevent disturbances. Abolition Act should be disallowed, if Provincial Legislature not consulted.

"G. GREY,

"Superintendent of Auckland.

"Right Hon. Secretary of State for Colonies."

Mr. STOUT.—Would it be open to me now to move that the statement be printed? If so, I have much pleasure in moving, That the telegram and letter covering it, which have just been read, be ordered to be printed. In doing so, I desire to point out the peculiar course which the Executive of the colony has taken in regard to this matter. There was another correspondence which passed between His Excellency the Governor and another Superintendent, and I would like to know why the Governor has been advised to send the one correspondence to this House and not the other. Of course, no members of this House will be allowed to criticise the actions of His Excellency the Governor, because he only acts by the advice of his Ministers. Therefore, in criticising the action of the Governor, we are only criticising the action of His Excellency's Advisers. I think it is an extraordinary course for the Advisers of His Excellency the Governor to adopt. What have they done? There has been a correspondence going on between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago. In that correspondence there appears a memorandum signed by the Premier. The statements in that memorandum are, I think, peculiar. I shall not use a harsher term than to say that the statements are, I think, peculiar. That correspondence afforded a discussion in this House as to the accuracy of some of the statements contained in that memorandum. That correspondence is carefully kept from the House; that correspondence will not appear in the records of this House. How does it happen that the Governor, having had a correspondence with two Superintendents on one and the same subject, elects to send to this House the correspondence of one Superintendent and not that of the other? I say it is peculiar tactics for the Government to adopt. The Government then take this further unusual course: They ask that the correspondence between the Governor and the Superintendent of Auckland should be read. On the reading of the correspondence, the Government and their supporters seem to indulge in laughter, as if it had been done with a view to creating some amusement in the House. I cannot understand the action of His Excellency's Advisers. Do they mean to say that their own memorandum addressed to His Excellency is not fit to be laid on the table of the House? Why is it kept back from the House? what is the meaning of it? Then we have also this memorandum, this copy of a telegram which was sent to His Excellency the Governor by the honorable member Sir G. Grey out of courtesy to His Excellency. It is sent down to this House without a word of explanation, or any intimation of the steps which Ministers intend to take with reference to it; or whether they agree with the statements of his Honor the Superintendent of Auckland or not. I would like to know whether they have considered this question from a constitutional point of view, and whether they do not think now that it is desirable that the Provincial Legislatures should have been consulted in this matter. I had a right to assume that they sent down this telegram to the House in order that it might take action in the direction of allowing the Provincial Legislatures to be consulted. That is the only meaning I attach to this telegram being brought down to this House. I would like to know why they did not advise His Excellency to send down the correspondence between the Superintendent of Otago and His Excellency? I would like to know whether they intend to consider the constitutional position of affairs; and whether they do not concur in the advice given in the telegram to the Secretary of State? I have only to say that this House should be thankful to the Superintendent of Auckland, Sir George Grey, for the action he has taken in this matter; I think it is proper action to take. If constitutional views had been adopted, the Provincial Legislatures would have been consulted before any action was taken. That is what would have been done in any other country. I ask the Government to point out one single instance where legislative powers have been taken from any Legislature without that Legislature being first consulted. I move, That the correspondence be printed. I am glad that the correspondence has been laid before the House. I know not why the correspondence with Ministers has not also been laid on the table. I am only to suppose that the Government are rather ashamed of the correspondence, and that that is their reason for not bringing it before the House.

Mr. REES.—It is too late in the day for any one to feel surprise at any action taken by the Government, otherwise I should have felt surprised at their action in thus bringing down this memorandum from His Excellency the Governor, or of course from themselves; for we know what that means. Why has that been put before the House, and not the correspondence with another Superintendent, as alluded to by the honorable member for Dunedin City? Why has the correspondence not been laid on the table in relation to the Otago matter, as well as the Auckland matter? I am not at all surprised at anything the present Ministry may do in relation to the matters which are now agitating the country, or in relation to the steps which may be taken by members of the Opposition, especially the leading members of the Opposition, in regard to this matter. I noticed that when this letter was read, several honorable gentlemen laughed. I have noticed the same thing on several occasions. Perhaps the Ministry, for instance, can afford to laugh, and several of their supporters. I do not think they will find it any laughing matter before any length of time has gone past. There are no men so blind as those who will not see; and the members of the Mini-try and their supporters are prepared to laugh at anything which indicates a spirit of resistance on the part of the people to any high-handed measure attempted to be carried through by the Government of the colony. If they were not purposely blind, if they did not close their eyes on purpose, they would see the signs of the times. Can it be said by the members of this House that they do not know that the people of a great portion of the colony are mutually preparing to resist the measures which the Government are carrying through? Honorable members will find it no laughing matter. Those who ought to know better are determined to carry out this course of proceeding in this Assembly. I believe one-half of the honorable members and the Ministers themselves know better the state of the public feeling, and yet, notwithstanding their serious misgivings, they are attempting to carry this thing through by simple bravado. The Ministry and their supporters are determined to carry it through with a high hand, irrespective of the consequences. This is not the first time in history that such a thing has been done, and I suppose it will not be the last time. Any person who has carefully examined this matter and observed the position of affairs will not say that this is a laughing matter. He will see that the credit of the colony is at stake, that its financial position is very critical, that the colony is in the throes of a new birth. How any honorable member could dare to laugh at these things, how the members of the Government could dare to laugh when messages like these are sent down by His Majesty's representative in this colony, is something more than I can understand. Is it to be supposed that when men of position, men whose names are known where the names of members of the Ministry have never been heard of, men of European reputation, take upon themselves to peril their reputation by statements such as this, the representatives of the constituencies here are to presume to laugh at them? It is the height of impudence. It is of a piece with that impudence and ignorance combined which would prompt laughter when serious matters of this kind are being treated of. If this were treated as a matter of serious importance, and with due consideration for the circumstances surrounding, and if these papers were brought down for the purpose of inquiring whether there was any truth in the statement or not, it would be a different thing. But when the Premier presents to the House papers like these in such a way, his only intention is to attempt to cast ridicule on the honorable member for the Thames. That is the only object; and I challenge the Ministry to say whether they have any other object in view in laying these papers before us, except to cast ridicule upon the honorable member for the Thames. Every member of this House knows that that is their only object; and every member who is foolish enough and ignorant enough to laugh when such a paper is tabled, shows that he is perfectly prepared to follow the lead of the Premier and his fellow-Ministers. But if honorable members will only look at the state of affairs, they will see that there is very little to laugh at in this matter. We have had within the last few days a correspondence between the Superintendent of Otago and the Governor—of course the Governor, as shown in the memorandum of the Premier, means the Ministry—we have had that correspondence published in the newspaper press of the day; and what does it show? It shows, on the one hand, that there is a wide-spread feeling of disaffection and discontent in the great Province of Otago; and it shows, on the other hand, that Ministers are not beneath stating that which is not true in relation to public matters, in order to fortify their own case. When we say that such is the case, is it a time for laughter? We know that men have laughed, and have shown no wisdom, in great constitutional crises like this, by laughing at all warnings; but it seems to me that such a matter should be treated with the greatest gravity. I wonder Ministers have not laid the memorandum of the Superintendent of Otago on the table, and thereby shown what is the united voice of more than half the community of this colony. It seems to me that it is discreditable to representative institutions that Ministers and their followers should laugh on such an occasion as this. The Provinces of Otago and Auckland together comprise within themselves more than half the European inhabitants of the colony. There is no deficiency of intelligence in them; there is no want of courage; they lack nothing that would make them good citizens; and when, through their representatives and through their Superintendents, they take a stand like this, is their expression of opinion to be made a subject for mockery by this House?

Mr. MACFARLANE.—I object altogether to the honorable gentleman stating that it is the united voice of the people of Auckland. I beg to tell him that it is not so.

Mr. REES.—I can quite understand the honorable member for Waitemata saying that; but I tell him that, if he went back to his constituents to-morrow, he would not be re-elected to this House. I myself would undertake that; and so it would be with the majority of Auckland members, including the honorable member for Waikato himself, who oppose the action we are taking. It would be just the same thing with some of the Otago members. It seems to me that some men are so wrapped up in their own private interests, and in attempting to get what they can either in their own persons or for their friends, that they lose sight altogether of the interests of the country in the matter, and seem prepared to set at naught or laugh at all serious matters, and care nothing whether it leads to resistance and bloodshed so long as their own object is carried out. I would ask you, Sir, as a reasonable man, after the years of dissension we have had, and when there are two strong parties speaking as they do and acting as they do in this House, whether it is a safe position to take up to cast ridicule in this way upon people who are only carrying out their earnest convictions—whether it is safe to do so for the Constitution of the colony or the interests of its people? I noticed that, when a portion of that telegram was read which stated that members of the Government and their supporters said that Her Majesty's ships should be used, Ministers and their followers laughed. But I have heard members of this House say so, and there is not a member now present who has not heard it; and yet, when the fact is brought before the House, it is to be laughed at! I believe the mail which comes in to-morrow will bring correspondence that will surprise Ministers. I believe it will bring letters to the Governor, which, to some extent, will surprise them. Whether it be so or not, members of this House and the Ministry may rest assured that the people of Auckland and Otago are in that state in which it is not safe to laugh at them. And the constituents of the honorable member for Waitemata will be found just as bad as any others, just as excited about these matters, and just as ready to show that they are quite prepared to peril a great deal in defence of what they consider their rights. I live in that district, and the honorable member who represents it does not, and I know more of the feelings of the people there than he does; and I say that the feelings of the people there for a considerable time past have been so worked up that they are ready to peril all in defence of their rights and privileges. Any men of sense—if we could accuse Ministers of having sense—must know from the public meetings which have taken place what are the feelings of the people. In days gone by, when the American States were on the verge of revolution, exactly the same arguments were used, and the same steps taken by the English Government as have been taken by Ministers here, and those who reasoned with them and warned them of the result were simply laughed at. But when George Grenville went out of the House after the repeal of the Stamp Bill, he was hissed by them, and he found it no laughing matter. I venture to say that before many months have passed, every member of this Ministry will be hissed by the people, and those very honorable members who now support them will turn round upon him and say, "How foolish you were not to see the signs of the times!" There is on this side of the House a well-founded conviction of right, but I ask is there on the other side?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. REES.—I would ask the honorable member who says "Yes," how he can show that it is so. If it be to get great power into their hands, and to obtain great possessions of land from the Government, I can understand it. That is the principle which attracts them. If it be to obtain large expenditure of public money in various districts, I can understand it. If it be to obtain grants of public money, or lucrative employment, I can understand it. But the principle which aims at the public good, looks to the public interest, and which endeavours to build up on true foundations public feelings and nationality—I should like to know where that exists upon the Government benches, and amongst the ranks of their supporters? That is a question you might ask from this to next year and get no answer. And when the Superintendent of Otago and the Superintendent of Auckland put by everything, to come here and attend to the duties of the country, they are laughed at because they aim to divert disturbance from the Colony of New Zealand. I hope this paper will be printed, because I look forward to a time, not far distant, when there will be a great revulsion of feeling in regard to all these matters. I see a not far distant time when the party now in power will be turned out of office ignominiously; when they will find no one, either in Wellington or in any other part of the colony which now supports them, ready to place confidence in them. The results of public meetings show this even now. This Counties Bill is already causing confusion throughout the country; their Financial Arrangements Bill will be worse; and their whole measures show how ignorant they are of true constitutional government. There is nothing more than that from beginning to end; and as I have before pointed out, the farther they go the worse they will get, and the deeper they will sink in the mire. This is but one step in that direction—this attempt to cast ridicule upon the honorable member for the Thames, when he is endeavouring to do that which is his duty; that which every man who knows anything about the matter feels to be his duty; that which every man whose eyes are not fixed upon things immediately before him, and that are solely for his own interest, must know to be his duty. Men who can forecast the future, and see the effect of all these things upon the colony, will see that the steps taken by the Superintendent of Auckland and the Superintendent of Otago were the only steps that could be taken consistent with the dignity of this country and the safety of its people. I am astonished at those honorable gentlemen bringing down this document in this way, because, like the engineer, they will be "hoist with their own petard," and it will show how little they can read the signs of the times, or see the hopes, and feelings, and purposes, and fears of the great mass of the people they are supposed to govern. The Government sitting upon those benches are but the wreck of many Ministries, the refuse cast up by a little eddy, allowed to stay there for a time, held there by persons who, forming a majority of the House just now, wish to have this abolition carried into effect—placed there for a time; but, directly that is accomplished, they will melt away, and like the snow-flakes on the river, will pass away, leaving no trace behind—except, indeed, a trace of evil on the history of this country. I feel certain that more than half the inhabitants of this country will echo the statements in the telegram sent Home by Mr. Macandrew and Sir George Grey. Nearly all the people would, I believe, be glad to see the whole government interfered with, so as to prevent the disturbances which are imminent through the conduct of the Ministry. I sincerely trust this paper will be printed and remain upon the records of the House as a monument of the foresightedness of the honorable member for the Thames, and of the folly of Ministers in pursuing the course they have entered upon.

Mr. MACFARLANE.—The honorable gentleman has repeated over and over again that the united voice of the people of Auckland is in favour of Provincial Governments. If the honorable member does not know, he ought to know that at the recent elections three-fourths of the people were pledged against Provincial Governments, and in favour of abolition. I might refer even to the speech of the honorable member for Rodney, who said then that Provincialism was done, and that abolition was an accomplished fact. Provincial Governments cannot be re-established. I was in favour of them at one time, but now I regard them as having passed away. I have been accused of changing my opinions; and the honorable gentleman has challenged me to go before my constituents. All I have to say is, that if he will resign I will resign at once.

Mr. REKS.—I will do so to-morrow.

Mr. MACFARLANE.—Agreed. Let it be done to-morrow.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—If the honorable member for Waitemata resigns, I can guarantee him that his eloquence will startle this Assembly no more. The honorable gentleman obtained his seat here by professing to be a thick-and-thin supporter of Sir George Grey; and had it not been for Sir George Grey's support and influence, he would never have seen the inside of this chamber. He might have come before this House as a petitioner, but he never would have made his appearance here as a member. The honorable member has referred to me more than once in uncomplimentary terms, and has to-day brought my name up in an unwarrantable manner. He has referred to me as having given pledges I have not kept, and has garbled the newspaper report to give his statement the semblance of truth. What I did tell my constituents was, that I would not vote for Provincialism as it existed in Auckland, with an empty treasury and the Government unable properly to fulfil its functions; and, upon being pressed for a further explanation, I said that I would vote for an alternative form of government, which should consist either of four provinces or two colonies. The honorable member ought not to attempt in this manner to snatch a judgment from this House against me. Not many days ago the honorable member referred to me in a particularly offensive way. I made a statement in moving a motion with reference to works in the North of Auckland, and he said he could support it because it was not one of those reckless statements I usually made. Sir, when I have anything to say I say it in this House, not in the lobbies. I am not a log-roller; and I hope the honorable member will not continue this mode of attacking me, because, as long as he does, I can assure him I will give him a Roland for his Oliver. I remember that, when the seat for Waitemata was in the market, the honorable member was amongst the staunchest possible Abolitionists, who held that Sir George Grey was either a knave or a fool; but as soon as that gentleman and his friends became candidates, they were prepared to cast abolition to the winds. From that moment they would do anything that Sir George Grey wanted them to do. My honorable friend the member for Waitemata, to save his seat would have been proud to have become a messenger in the Provincial Government Office. With respect to the question before the House, I think that when the Government sent down the telegram now before us they ought also to have sent down the correspondence that took place between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago. It may have been intended to create a laugh at the expense of the honorable member for the Thames, but I have myself heard threats to the effect that if the people of Auckland and Otago refused to carry abolition into effect, Her Majesty's ships would be sent to carry out that purpose, and that gentlemen would be sent from an insignificant spot on the shores of Cook Strait to see that the purposes of the Act were properly fulfilled. Those gentlemen may come; but will they ever return? If the people of Otago and Auckland, in the belief that this Act is ultra vires, make up their minds to resist it, I would recommend those gentlemen residing on the shores of Cook Strait to stay where they are, and mind their own business. The chances are that, if they do not, they may not have an opportunity of coming back to attend to it afterwards. I do not say that all right is on this side of the House; there may be right on both sides; but I do say that any Government which proposed to make such a radical change as this should have seen its way to make everything clear from the first. Their neglect to do so was criminal; and if it should happen that the people of Auckland take up a position of hostility to the Abolition Act, and prevent it being brought into force, I say that all the blood that may be shed, or the disorder which will arise, will rest upon the heads of Ministers who have for two years past neglected to obtain that advice and those opinions which would have made clear the powers and functions of this House. The honorable member for Auckland City East has referred to the case of America, where warning after warning was given to the then head of the English Government—Lord North, I think it was, who was not like our Premier, because he had a tendency to go to sleep in the House—and what happened? Why, Sir, a most powerful revolution succeeded. That was a strong case in point; but we have also the case of the French Revolution. And how was that brought about? Representations were made to the Government time after time as to the point at which the feelings of the people had arrived, but nothing could convince Ministers that a revolution was at hand. They laughed at the idea—but four or five years afterwards the head of the King of France dropped from the guillotine. I do not anticipate anything of the kind here, but I know this much, and the Ministry must admit its truth, that if a large section of the people of Auckland and Otago say, "We defy you to put the Abolition Act into force," they dare not attempt to do it. Now, how much stronger would the Government have been if they had shown that they clearly had the power to bring this Act into force! If they had taken these steps we should have been compelled to submit, though we might not have thought it the best thing that could happen for the interests of the country. But, as the matter stands now, when it is an open question as to whether the law is good or bad, the people may reasonably refuse to obey it. I do not regard the question as settled at all, and the people themselves have reason to believe that it is not settled. It is not a matter to boast of, because it will be a thing that we should all regret that there should be resistance to law or authority; but if there should be resistance, the whole responsibility will rest with Ministers. They have not used ordinary precaution. Step after step has been neglected, and the people have been led into a position which they recognize to be a very serious one. I should like to have seen the correspondence between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago printed along with this despatch, and, if it is competent for me to do so, I will move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think it is competent for the honorable member to propose such an addition to the motion, as the House, as yet, has no official knowledge of the existence of that correspondence.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I asked for your decision, Sir, because I was in doubt; but I think Ministers would only do what is right and proper if they produced that correspondence, as they have already laid on the table the paper forwarded to the Governor by Sir George Grey.

Mr. THOMSON.—When the House met on Friday at half-past seven o'clock, we were all anxious to hear the supplementary statement of the Treasurer. We were on the tiptoe of expectation. The galleries were full, members were in their places, and then, instead of giving us the statement, the Government went on with the Counties Bill. I think they ought to have known that there was debatable matter enough in that Bill to occupy the whole evening, and it appeared to me at the time that the Treasurer was not prepared to go on with the statement: either he was not ready, or the clerks had not the figures prepared. And what do we find this morning? We are all anxious to hear this great Supplementary Financial Statement. The Committee of Supply stands first on the Order Paper, but instead of the statement, a Minister lays on the table a correspondence of a very debatable character. He is not satisfied with merely laying it on the table—he moves that it be read, in order that members may have certain things forced on their view. I do not think there is one member of the House, even amongst those supporting the Government, who did not think it strange that the correspondence between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago has not also been brought down; so that it appears to me that this motion is made for the purpose of inducing discussion and occupying the afternoon sitting. The galleries will be much fuller in the evening, there will be a number of ladies present, and it is much easier to speak in the gaslight. It seems as if these documents were tabled to fill up time until the usual adjournment at half-past five.

does not give the Government credit for ordinary ingenuity. If I had wanted to speak at half-past seven o'clock instead of in the afternoon, I should have fixed that hour as the time for going into Committee of Supply. I was, as the honorable gentleman very well knows, quite ready to make my statement on Friday night, and it was only because the Counties Bill occupied more time than was anticipated that I was prevented from doing so. If the honorable member for Clutha thinks that I kept my statement back purposely, he is quite welcome so to think. With regard to the matter now under consideration, I have to say that I should have thought that the reason why the Government followed this course would be perfectly clear. The reason was, that his Honor the Superintendent of Auckland has thought it necessary to set aside all the regulations relating to communications with the Secretary of State, laid down for the guidance of officials in this colony, and to transmit direct to the Secretary of State a communication which was apparently of the very greatest importance; and the Government have immediately brought that statement under the notice of the House. I may state that, immediately I received these documents, I thought it my duty to lay them on the table of the House. It has never even occurred to me that anything the honorable gentleman could write would bring him into ridicule. I thought he wrote everything in serious earnestness, and consequently I laid the papers on the table for the information of the House, and asked that they should be read. If the statements made in the document are truths, the Government would be greatly wanting in their duty to the country and to the House if they did not at once produce the document to the House. The Superintendent of Auckland states in his telegram that dangers are imminent; and if that be the case, it was our duty to bring the matter immediately before the House. If honorable gentlemen opposite wish to discuss the question, let us appoint a day when it shall be taken. I say that I was bound immediately to bring the matter before the House. The reason why there have been no telegrams between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago laid on the table is that we are not aware that any such telegrams were sent. The correspondence between the Governor and the Superintendent of Otago was not laid on the table, because it may not yet be complete, this did not matter, as it was made public at the request of the Superintendent. The present correspondence, however, could not be published unless it was brought under the notice of the House in the ordinary way. I do not believe in the truth of the statements made, and I do not consider that the correspondence requires the immediate consideration of the House; but, if there are honorable gentlemen who do believe in it, I have given them an opportunity of immediately bringing it under the notice of the House, and of taking any steps they may think necessary in regard to it. I may say that immediately this question is settled, I shall make my Supplementary Statement.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, as I am deeply interested in the matter before the House, perhaps the House will hear a few words from me in regard to it. I am dissatisfied with the course the Government has pursued. The Hon. the Premier has just made a statement to the House which I think he said would be palpable to everybody; but I do not think any statement so calculated to mislead has ever been made. He says that it was the duty of the Government to produce these documents at once to the House; and he says that he has done this with no intention of casting ridicule upon them. Now, I maintain that he has not stated the fact. Any one who observed his manner, and that of his colleagues, when he brought down the correspondence, must have seen that what he has stated was not the fact. I have never heard a more wanton statement than that which has just fallen from him. If he wished to proceed with this matter, as he says he did, he would not only have laid the correspondence on the table, but he would also have indicated the course the Government intended to pursue in reference to it. It is quite true that he intended to irritate and provoke the people to the disturbances that are likely to take place, and to throw the fault upon the unfortunate persons whom they will have forced into them. No more cruel and wicked system of policy could be pursued by any Government than that. Now, Sir, let me tell the House that they are likely to be misled altogether by the remarks which have been made to them on this subject. The honorable member for Waitemata, I believe in perfect good faith, made remarks which also may mislead the House. He stated that three-fourths of the inhabitants of the Province of Auckland were opposed to the provincial system, and he proceeded to allege certain facts in proof of that assertion. But, Sir, the facts which he alleged, rightly considered, prove the direct contrary. It is true that a large portion of the population of the Province of Auckland were opposed to the provinces as they existed at the commencement of this session, despoiled of all revenues, and with every just power taken away from them. That they certainly were opposed to. But let anybody consider what took place when it was proposed to give to the Province of Auckland separate life, and the revenues to which it was entitled. Think of the public feeling and enthusiasm which were then evoked, and let anybody say that the Province of Auckland did not wish to exist as a separate province. The honorable gentleman knows as well as I do that such is the desire of the people of Auckland, and he should not stand up and state anything to the contrary to this House. Now, Sir, I submit that I have done my duty in sending the telegram I did send to the Secretary of State; and let me point out to the House this fact, that the Government have never dealt fairly with the House or the country in reference to this matter. They are quite willing to publish anything sent to them upon which they think they can cast any slur or ridicule, or be able to point out the very slightest mistake; but they never publish, nor do we ever see, the letters sent by the Governor to the Secretary of State. We are never told what steps His Excellency takes in reference to communications so made. I say that the Governor ought never to have sent that telegram down here—if it has come down with his consent—without at the same time stating what his reply to it was. I say that if he has been guilty of such a transaction he deserves the condemnation of this House. We have been told that we ought not to speak of the Governor in this House; and the other day the Premier and the Minister of Justice sprang to their feet and caused a flutter and sensation amongst the chickens of the Ministry as if a hawk had been swooping down on them, because I dared to mention His Excellency's name; and you, Sir, called me to order. But I was right in what I did. I say that the Government have been casting a great cloud over this country. The provinces know nothing of them as a Ministry. There is no law, no custom of the Empire, no custom of our race, which says that where there are separate Legislatures, possessing the powers which the Provincial Legislatures do, and a Governor possessing the powers which the Governor does possess in regard to them, that there is any power which can be set up in opposition to those powers. I laugh the Ministry to scorn. What are they to me? Members for petty constituencies—some of them having no right to sit on those benches at all, Civil servants taken and pitchforked into office—how can they stand between me, as Superintendent, and the Sovereign, or between me and the Governor of this country? If the Governor goes astray on their advice, it is no excuse for him that they have advised him. The honorable member for Egmont may laugh. He may try to drive his countrymen on to bloodshed as he has been doing for some time; but, Sir, due punishment will yet be visited on his head for the course he has been pursuing. He laughs when I state that threats have been used, but he knows that threats have been made even by his own followers. He believes that himself; and those Ministers are to acquire, unlawfully, vast possessions through the course he is helping them to follow out. He knows that they will get those large possessions, and he knows that no proper investigation will be made into the circumstances. In my hand I hold a Gazette issued on the 5th instant, and signed by Daniel Pollen, another Minister, in which they offer for sale some seventy sections of land, some of them at £5 an acre, in the neighbourhood of the Piako Swamp, to which they had given a title to another Minister. I ask, was anything worse than this ever known? But I tell them, Sir, that myself and others are acting rightly in attempting to get the Home Government to put an end to transactions of this kind—to prevent them from being carried out and completed. I shall never cease to try to prevent this sort of thing being done. Sir, this is a great question. They may laugh. They may have their followers using language such as those behind me in this House on one occasion recently used. A friend of mine was speaking, and saying nothing improper, when one of their most violent followers said, so that I could hear him, "We will have five or six of them hung." That was the language used. They may laugh at so irritating people, and may turn that into matter of jest; but speeches of that kind are not made and cannot be made without provoking feelings of irritation in members' minds—speeches made in passion, speeches made in earnest, speeches made as showing the sentiments which lurk in the minds of those who are attempting unjustly, by the aid of this Ministry, to acquire large tracts of public land to which every one of Her Majesty's subjects has the same right as themselves. I say the Governor has not done his duty to the provinces in this matter. I speak of him boldly, by his name, Sir.

Major ATKINSON.—I rise to a point of order. I ask whether the honorable gentleman is right in using His Excellency's name.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member is not in order. If the honorable member will permit me, I will give to the House my view. I think it does not belong to us, according to parliamentary usages, to refer directly to another branch of the Legislature, either the Governor on the one side or the Legislative Council on the other. We have here persons representing the Government of the country, and it is for them to accept all responsibility. I will further add, I can see no advantage whatever in speaking directly of those who are not here to defend themselves; and I believe that it is upon that principle that the ruling I have given rests.

Sir G. GREY.—Your ruling, Sir, divides itself into two parts. The latter part I will consider presently. Upon the first, I still, as a subject of the Queen, hold that these Ministers are unknown to the Constitution of the country. They are not responsible. We cannot impeach them as Ministers can be impeached in England. We have no hold or control over them. We have no power over them such as is possessed by the English Parliament. We have a right, as a free Assembly, to determine what system of government we will have. We have a right to determine what course we will pursue in reference to the Ministry. There is no analogy between ourselves and the Parliament of England. And, Sir, I say it is easy upon the other hand, in reverting to the second part of your argument, to say that a person not present to defend himself should not be attacked; but if the person lends himself to an act such as has been performed this day, then, Sir, I say I have a right to speak upon that act, and upon its consequences, as far as the welfare of the people of this country is concerned. I say, Sir, that for ourselves there is no hope, if the Prime Minister is allowed to act as he is now going on. His conduct throughout the session has been often most insulting to members, and such as I believe no Minister of the Crown ever dared before to adopt in his place in Parliament, when we were pursuing a most proper course, and everything has been done to irritate us to that resistance which is likely to take place if the Governor puts himself in the hands of persons who treat us as we have been treated to-day, by this document being brought down. I have the right to speak of the Governor by his name. If the Governor had sent down a message, enclosing papers, to the House, with a recommendation that anything should be done, it would have been a proper course. But he places in the hands of a Minister, who has often insulted me in this House, a paper with no recommendation at all, but with the evident purpose, as was seen by the laughter of the Premier and of his colleagues, to add insult to the insults already offered to me. I say the Governor who does that, I have a right to speak of by his name. If not, our liberties are entirely gone. As it is, our lives are threatened. They may say what they please, the Ministry may pretend to deny the fact, but they have indirectly given their friends to understand that force will be used against the people of this country.

Major ATKINSON.—It is absolutely without foundation.

Sir G. GREY.—I can simply say that their friends make statements of that kind, and there are members here to bear me out in that. Ministers have at least taken no pains to stop that belief; they have given no denial. I wrote to the Governor of the colony in April last, bringing this subject under his notice. They have suppressed the statements they made to the Secretary of State upon that subject. Everything we ought to have known with regard to this point they have withheld from us. It is my duty to state to the House, and to the country, and I do it with sorrow, that I believe disturbances are imminent. I believe, if the people have the least sense of what is their right and due, they will resist to the death the attempts made to take from them all which men value. Believing that—I cannot believe otherwise—disturbances must result from the course which is being followed, I communicated that to our Sovereign. I know that the truth has been withheld from the Queen by the Governor. I use his name: the Governor has withheld from his Queen the truth with regard to the state of affairs in this colony.

Major ATKINSON rose to order.

Sir G. GREY.—There is nothing out of order in that. A despatch was laid upon the table. We have a right, if from our Sovereign that knowledge is withheld which is likely to imperil our lives and properties, to complain. Am I not to complain that that knowledge has been so withheld? I say, Sir, again distinctly,—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will allow me. I wish I could convey to the honorable member and the House my view. It would not be becoming in me—if I made an attempt the House would not support me—and I should be unworthy the position I hold, if I in any way attempted to prevent an honorable member from expressing his opinions or making any complaint. I do not do so. I take exception to the method in which they are brought forward. It has been the usage, whether wisely or unwisely, since the House of Representatives has been in existence, to treat responsible Ministers as responsible Ministers. We have attempted to imitate—very imperfectly, I admit—the usages in a constitutional way adopted at Home; and, so long as I am in the position I now hold, I will endeavour to follow that course. I hope the honorable member will not think for one moment I would prevent an honorable member giving the utmost utterance to his opinions—I would be one of the last men in the colony to prevent that; but I take exception to his mode of doing so. It is unusual to make direct reference either to the Governor who governs this colony as Her Majesty's representative, or to the Legislative Council; and I endeavoured to give just now the reason and ground of such ruling. It is manifestly inconvenient to do so, in the absence of the persons who would be spoken of, when there are persons here whose duty it is to be responsible for all such matters. Whilst I am upon this subject, may I be permitted to recommend to the House an arrangement which would prevent some of the unpleasant results that have ensued from remarks made sotto voce by members disagreeing with others? I was shocked when I heard the statement made by the honorable member for the Thames as to observations which had been used by some member or members sitting near him upon some recent occasion. There has been a very great absence in this House of those arrangements which are very necessary in order to properly carry out government by party in Parliament. It is desirable that those who belong to the Opposition should have seats together, and that they should not have sitting among themselves—I state it with very great respect: I know of no other word—members who act as claqueurs. I believe, if the House would take that in hand, good would result, and I would do my best to make such an arrangement effective. I have stated the ruling according to the best light I have. I shall call to order any honorable member who refers directly to the Governor or to the Legislative Council.

Sir G. GREY.—I still submit upon that subject that there is a partial misunderstanding. I quite agree that the Governor, as a branch of the Legislature, should not be spoken of in this House. But, Sir, the Governor is the only medium of correspondence which we are allowed to have with Her Majesty the Queen. He holds in that respect a position entirely different from the Sovereign. He is really a servant of Her Majesty's Ministers. I spoke of him, Sir, in the latter capacity. I spoke of things which were known to the whole House. The Governor, by the hands of his Ministers, communicated to the House a certain despatch upon the Abolition Bill; and I submit that never, in the previous history of this country, have circumstances of the same kind prevailed. My own belief is that our liberties, our property, and our lives, all that is of value, are now at stake, and that our only chance of having some assistance in getting justice done in this case was by a fair, truthful, and accurate representation of the circumstances of the country being made to the Queen by the officer whom she appointed to perform that duty. I submit I have a right to complain that that officer did not perform his duty in this respect—the gentlemen on those benches I know nothing of—and it is in that respect I speak. I am sure Her Majesty the Queen has had no fair warning upon the points to which I have alluded; and I am sure that her Ministers at Home have had no fair warning upon that subject. In the Queen's instructions to her Governor, I find nothing which tells him to recognize those gentlemen as the means of communication between Her Majesty's subjects and herself. Especially is there nothing which places them in the position of intermeddling between the Superintendents of provinces and the Governor. The Governor has two distinct sets of functions under the Constitution Act; he has another set of functions under the Royal Instructions. Under the Constitution Act, the Governor, by a separate part of that Act, a part which has no relation to the subsequent part referring to the General Assembly, has certain duties imposed upon him in reference to the provinces. Those gentlemen are not named in that Act. They are unknown to the Constitution, unknown to the Queen in those respects. Then there come in another part of the Act provisions by which the General Assembly is constituted and is made up of three distinct Estates—the Governor, the Legislative Council, and the House of Representatives. This House may lay down rules for its own guidance in respect to its communications with the Governor, and this House is also charged to look after the general welfare of this country. I maintain that, as one of the representatives of the people, being here I have a right to address the Governor in his first capacity, as a person who has to deal with Superintendents of provinces, and to make such representations to Her Majesty as would secure to us our proper interests, our safety, our property, our lives, because I believe it will come to that—I say, Sir, that I have a right to use the Governor's name in that capacity. Those Ministers cannot be impeached; those Ministers are not responsible to Parliament: the Governor can be impeached; the Governor is responsible to Parliament. I say that I have no right to make any observations regarding the Governor upon any point on which there is the least doubt; but if the Governor communicates to this House an actual State paper, I have a right to call the attention of the House to the contents of that State paper. And if it is a State paper which is likely to injure the provinces of this country, I contend, Sir, that I have a right to ask the House to assist me in getting proper representations made by the Governor in the shape of those which have been sent Home. That is all I have attempted to do. If you look at the Royal Instructions, you will see that the Governor occupies an entirely different position from the Crown. The Queen's subjects are told that they can only approach Her Majesty through the Governor. As I have said, if that officer does not do his duty to the Queen's subjects under those instructions, he can be impeached, he can be punished; and no individual, without Her Majesty's consent or authority, can interpose between Her Majesty's subjects and the person to whom she has confided this great trust. Why, it would be no excuse for Her Majesty to plead to the British Parliament that unknown gentlemen, who might have left the colony, had advised certain things to be done—it would be no excuse for her to say that the ills which had fallen upon Her Majesty's subjects were due to ignorance, it may be of the course which her representative was pursuing—that evils had fallen on the Queen's subjects through his having taken the advice of absolutely unknown persons who can be in no way punished for having given that advice. Such a thing is utterly impossible. Then Ministers say that persons can communicate their grievances to the Governor. What has taken place in this House throughout a great deal of the session? When we have made complaints, they have been met with absolute silence and contempt. Ministers have made no reply whatever. If we had appealed to Her Majesty, a courteous reply would have been returned; if we had appealed to His Excellency the Governor, a courteous reply would have been sent. But through this dumb body standing between the Governor and ourselves we can get no reply. I have seen Ministers almost in a body absent themselves from the House in a way which I have never seen before, entirely neglecting the public business. I say we have a right, in reference to those points in which the Governor does neglect our interests as subjects of the Queen, to appeal to Her Majesty and the Imperial Parliament. If the Governor does not do his duty to us, if he will not hear complaints, where is our remedy? Is it in rebellion? I say rebellion has not been taken up by us. The honorable member for Timaru himself admitted that a revolution was begun by this Government last session. They began a great revolution which was to destroy our Constitution, which was to take from the people here the power of having their rights redressed. We did not begin it. And if at last, if at the last moment of despair, seeing no other course left open to us, we are driven into outrage of some kind, who is to blame?—those who have goaded on the people to desperation, or those who have been goaded into desperation against their will and their wishes? Why not let Ministers stand up and say that they will leave to the Provincial Legislatures the power of determining whether they will or will not accept this Abolition Act. That is all that is asked for, and then the House will see how the matter will be dealt with, and the honorable member for Waitemata will see that too—they will see how the Provincial Legislatures will act under such circumstances—when they will have the power of making their own terms with the Colonial Government. The people of Auckland would then have the power of saying, "If we do come under the Abolition Act, we will have such revenues secured to us as we believe to be ours by right." They would be able to speak for themselves. Why should the honorable member for Waitemata, acting against the welfare of his countrymen, try to take from them the power of speaking of their own wrongs, and the power of getting justice? Was there anything more unfair ever heard of? His object is to safely keep his friend in power. Having a member for Auckland in the Ministry, his object is to keep that Auckland member in power, and he asks us to trust to that honorable gentleman—an individual man—instead of to ourselves—a body of sensible men. That is his object and intention. And how do the Government ever propose to carry that out? Why, by one of the most shameful yieldings to private interests I have ever heard of. A great Minister of the Crown is to be paid, not to take his seat daily to advise the Governor in Council upon all those various subjects now left with the Governor in Council to make laws upon, but to take his own ease or to follow his own pursuits in the Province of Auckland—purchased into the Ministry upon terms which, I say, any man who loved his country would not accept—purchased into the Ministry upon terms of neglecting his duty as a Minister—and being allowed to follow his own pursuits and his own interests. Was such a thing ever heard of before? Imagine a great Minister of England, some man whom the Ministry thought it essential to buy over to their interests, being bought over on condition that he should become a Minister, it might be for the Home Department, the Foreign Department, or that he should become Attorney-General, the great adviser of the Crown—imagine him accepting office on the terms that he was to reside in Ireland or in a remote part of Scotland, where his private interests lay, and that he was base enough to sell himself to a Ministry on terms of that kind. I say, Sir, that these are days when it becomes men to arouse themselves—to determine to struggle for their liberty and rights. I say, knowing that these disturbances must come in consequence of the course now being pursued, I was bound in duty and honor to my country to warn the Home authorities of what was about to take place. I have striven to the last not to do that; but, having determined to do it, I did it openly. The moment I made up my mind to do it, I sent to the Governor a copy of the telegram I wished to transmit Home. He could have transmitted another. Perhaps he has. Where is it? When I did that openly, and justly exercising the same rights as the Superintendent of a province as he possesses as Governor of this country, why did he send that telegram to this House, and not send down some recommendation with it? I am proud, Sir, of the course I have taken. I feel I have done that which is right, and that in no respect have I done wrong. I have done nothing secretly; I have done it openly. I have not instigated the mass of the people to believe that the Queen's forces were to be employed to trample on their fellow-men, and shrink from making such an avowal. Everything that I have done I have done openly and fairly. I have not made a measure an Opposition measure, and declared that it was not so. I did not do as was done the other night—declare that a measure was not a Government measure, and yet force men to leave the House who had promised not to vote against the Government. When the Government were told that it was a Government measure, they did not deny it or feel ashamed that they followed such a course. Everything I have done I have done fairly and openly, and I am prepared to stand by it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I wish to say this, that any one who desires to approach His Excellency the Governor can do so by address; any one who desires to approach this Parliament can do so by address; and if he desires to approach Her Majesty, he can do so by address. I believe that in each case his representation would be taken into consideration. In this House there is a certain mode of procedure to be observed. It is the Government who are responsible for the acts of the Governor. It cannot be maintained that by an observance of this procedure we are to be prevented from having our wants made known; and as to that procedure, we cannot be too guarded in following in the steps of parliamentary usage.

Mr. BOWEN.—I should not have risen to speak on this subject but for the extraordinary speech just made by the honorable member for the Thames. I should like to point out to this House that the comments that he has been pleased to make on the conduct of His Excellency the Governor are really an attack upon the system of responsible government which is established in this colony. We have worked for years on the principle of responsible government. ("No," "Yea.") If the honorable member who has just spoken does not now believe that there are responsible Ministers, he pretended to believe that there were responsible Ministers when he was Governor of this colony, and pretended to act through them. All I can say is, that it is not merely an insult to the position that Her Majesty's representative holds—an insult which I am surprised to hear, coming from an honorable gentleman who has held the Queen's Commission himself,—but it is an insult to this House, which has for years supported the administration of government according to the principle which now obtains: that is, the principle which is called in all the colonies responsible government. I do not care to answer taunts as to who this person or that person may be who is sitting on these benches. It is a matter of taste if any honorable member by way of argument chooses to call his opponents insignificant. The House has it in its own hands to say whether it will allow business to be carried on by this set of men or that. There is a constant contradiction in what is said by honorable gentlemen opposite. Some say the Ministry are merely retained in office to carry out abolition, and in the next breath they say that abolition is distasteful to the majority of the people. Either this House does not represent this country, and the electors did not know what they were doing when the question was deliberately put to them; or else honorable gentlemen opposite are trifling with the time of this House and the country. It appears that the great sin which has been committed, and which has induced the honorable member for the Thames to use such reprehensible language as he has now used with regard to the Governor, is that a document which he wrote himself has been laid on the table. Is he ashamed of it? The responsibility of laying it on the table lies entirely with the Government, and it would have been a very extraordinary thing if the Governor had withheld a document which his Advisers told him it was important to lay on the table. It is a matter of importance when the Superintendent of a province takes upon himself to adopt what he himself has just told us is an unusual course—namely, to address himself directly to the Imperial Government without first addressing the Governor of the colony. When he takes such an unusual step as that, and states to the Imperial Government that disturbances are imminent, and calls upon the Imperial Government to interfere, I think we, as a Government, should be failing in our duty if we did not at once lay the document on the table. That is a very different thing from a correspondence between a Superintendent and the Government of this colony, however important that correspondence may be. The honorable gentleman seems to forget that he has taken a very unusual course, and one which requires that the attention of the House and the country should immediately be called to his proceedings. I do not think honorable gentlemen generally will approve of the expressions used with regard to Her Majesty's representative—such an expression for instance as that he is a servant of Her Majesty's Ministers, and that he did not represent truthfully the state of the country to the Imperial Government. I would ask this House whether it is right or even decent that an honorable member should get up in his place and speak of Her Majesty's representative in such a manner. Has the Governor said or done anything to justify such language being used towards him in this House? I think, at any rate, that such expressions will not commend themselves generally to the good taste of the House. The House has the Government here to answer for anything that is done, and that Government is perfectly prepared to take the whole of the responsibility upon themselves. The honorable gentleman has more than once spoken of his action as Superintendent of the Province of Auckland. We do not know the honorable member as Superintendent in this House. We do not know him as an ex-Governor or as the Superintendent of Auckland. We know him only as one of the honorable members for the Thames. The best proof of the absurdity of pretending to recognize him as representative of the Province of Auckland is the denial instantly evoked from other honorable members from that province when he attempts to speak as their representative. Does he represent Mongonui? We have a representative of that district in the House, and I do not think he has ever gone into the same lobby with the honorable member upon any constitutional question during the two years the honorable member has been in the House. Does he represent Waitemata? Does he represent Marsden? Does he represent Waikato? Does he represent Waipa or the East Coast? Does he in fact represent more than half, or rather less than half, of the Thames? I take it that his colleague Mr. Rowe represents that district more directly and distinctly than he does. I say that no honorable member, whether Superintendent or not, has any right to speak as representative of any place beyond the one which has returned him to this House. I do not wish to delay the House any longer, as my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer has been for some time desirous of making his Financial Statement. I can only once more express my surprise at the outburst of indignation on the part of the honorable member for the Thames at the publication of a document which he himself thought of such great importance that he took the irregular step of sending it directly to the Imperial Government without the intervention of the Governor; without, in fact, pursuing the course which he acknowledges himself has always been observed in the colony, and which he ought to know better than anyone else in this House is the only legitimate course to be taken if he wishes to communicate with the Colonial Office.

Mr. READER WOOD.—The honorable gentleman has talked in a very emphatic manner, and not in his usual insouciant way, as if he did not much care what transpired about the constitutional position of Ministers, and the insults levelled at His Excellency the Governor by the honorable member for the Thames. Perhaps the honorable gentleman holding such views as he does with regard to Ministerial responsibility, will inform the House whether it is the business of Ministers to advise the Governor as to the despatches which he writes Home. I do not know whether any new system has been introduced with regard to the relations between constitutional Ministers and the Governor; but I know that some years ago such a thing was not done. If honorable members will bear in mind that this is a despatch by the Governor, they will see that they have a right to use His Excellency's name directly, and it would be wrong to pretend that Ministers are responsible for such a despatch being sent Home. It was upon one of these despatches, and upon that only, that the honorable member for the Thames made the remarks which evoked the not very pointed reply of the Minister of Justice. The honorable gentleman also told us that this House knew nothing of the honorable member for the Thames as Superintendent of Auckland—that he was only known in this House as the honorable member for the Thames. But I apprehend, if this House does not know him as Superintendent of Auckland, the Constitution of the country recognizes him in that capacity; and this House ought also to recognize the Constitution of the country whilst it exists and until it is set aside. The honorable gentleman likewise asks us whether the honorable member for the Thames, as Superintendent of Auckland or in any other capacity, can be said to have the same views and the same feelings as the honorable member for Waikato, the honorable member for Waitemata, the honorable member for Waipa, and other honorable members in this House. The honorable member for Waitemata, who very rarely ventures to address the House, and to whom it is always necessary that particular attention should be paid when he speaks, told us this afternoon that the honorable member for Rodney and others were now desirous, which they were not before, of continuing the old system of Provincial Governments in the country. I ask that honorable gentleman whether he was not a supporter of the honorable member for the Thames in the proposals he made in this House with regard to Separation—whether he did not support those resolutions by which the honorable member for the Thames desired to put something in the place of the old system of Provincialism which has hitherto existed? And when those resolutions failed, did not that honorable gentleman simply abandon his position altogether and go over to a new system,—a different system, and one that was never spoken of before by any men who stood at the late elections in Auckland? On the hustings during those elections only two courses were suggested—one, separation in some form; and the other, the unity of the colony and a common purse. The honorable member also accepted the latter, and voted for the resolutions of the honorable member for Waikato, which followed those of the honorable member for the Thames; but now, instead of sticking to his colours and doing the best he can to force this House back again into one of these positions, he takes the miserable position which is accepted by the present Ministry, and which the country has never been asked whether it will accept or not. What were the propositions of the honorable member for the Thames? That there should be some definite and fixed financial system, upon which the business of the country could be safely administered. It was the same with the proposals of the honorable member for Waikato. And now what are we asked to do? To govern the country for twelve months by means of Treasury bills, and let the future look out for itself. That is the grand position of Ministers, and that is the position which the honorable member for Waitemata now takes up—a position which the honorable member never spoke of to his constituents in any way, and to support which, I answer for it, no single constituency in the colony would return a representative if he went boldly and straightforwardly and told them the course he intended to pursue. I think such taunts as the honorable gentleman threw out are entirely out of place. Over and over again I myself, the honorable member for the Thames, and other members from Auckland, have said, with as much precision as words are capable of, that we did not desire the old form of Provincialism—that in the Province of Auckland it could not be carried on for a single month by any one. But we did say this, that Abolition on the terms offered was as bad, if not worse, not only for the province but for the country at large, as the old system. We tried to get something different, something that in itself was reasonable and intelligible; but we had opposed to us a mere scratch system that cannot by any possibility be carried on even under the great modern principle established in this House of borrowing upon every conceivable occasion—cannot possibly be carried on for more than twelve months. The honorable member for Dunedin City, Mr. Stout, and the honorable member for Clutha have been taunted with saying that the honorable member at the head of the Government evidently did not desire, and could not have desired, to bring his Financial Statement forward to-day, or he would not have done his best to raise a debate upon this subject; and the Premier says those honorable gentlemen are perfectly welcome to hold that opinion, but it is wrong. I think they can very well be excused for holding that opinion. For the last fortnight we have been day after day expecting this statement, but it has been put off from day to day, and we have been told, "It will be made to-morrow or next day," and so on, until we really did not know when we were to hear it. Anxious as I am to hear the statement, I am afraid I shall not have an opportunity of doing so if it is not made to-day, for I really cannot spend a lifetime here waiting for it. And yet when we came to the House to-day expecting that it would be delivered, this paper was laid upon the table, which was not at all necessary, and which was certain to cause an irritating debate. One would suppose that, if Ministers desired to be excused from bringing forward the Financial Statement, that was the very course they would adopt. I do not desire to put off the Financial Statement, and therefore I shall occupy time no further.

Mr. ORMOND.—I am somewhat surprised at the statement made by more than one honorable gentleman, and particularly by the honorable member for Parnell, that this question of abolition was not put to the people. If my recollection does not betray me, it was the boast of those very gentlemen last session that they, by their action, had given the people an opportunity to consider it; yet now they do not hesitate to assert, over and over again, that that in which they gloried last session was something that never happened. As to the statement that this House does not represent the country, why, Sir, if this House does not represent the country, where is there any body in the colony that does? This House was elected on the Abolition question, and on the understanding that it should substitute a purely local form of government. We may differ as to whether the details of the measure we have been engaged in framing are the particular forms the people wish to see adopted, but it is incorrect to say that the people themselves have not decided the main question. I should not have risen at all but for the question so pointedly referred to by the honorable member for Parnell; but since I have risen I should like to make a few remarks upon the characteristic speech delivered by the honorable member for the Thames. To my mind—and it is with very great regret that I say it—it is a pitiable thing that we should hear, from an honorable gentleman who came to this House with such prestige, such speeches as we have listened to to-day. What were the leading features of that speech? Not for the first time, the honorable gentleman spoke of His Excellency the Governor in a way that this House cannot approve of. Beyond doubt, this House listens to these statements with great distaste; in fact, they could come with no worse taste from any one else in the colony than from the honorable gentleman himself. He has occupied the high position of Governor of this colony in the past. He himself is at the present moment the recipient of pension money for services rendered in that capacity, and he should be the last man to bring forward His Excellency's name in a way which he must know is entirely wrong, and entirely unconstitutional. The honorable gentleman dealt, in a way in which I am sorry to say he never fails to deal, in imputations of a gross character not only against members of the Government, but against members of the House. The honorable gentleman never makes a speech in this House in which he does not cast imputations upon the character of honorable members, and question their motives. I can hardly realize how it is that the House patiently listens to the honorable gentleman whilst he repeatedly and continuously abuses the characters of our public men. Is the honorable gentleman the only man in this House who acts from pure motives? One would think so from the position he takes up. My honorable friends who sit on the Government benches, with their experience of the honorable gentleman, may well treat with utter contempt the charges which he habitually hurls at them. If they were the only persons to whom he applied abuse of this kind, if it were only political opponents against whom these charges were hurled, we should not feel so much surprised; but this session we have witnessed the spectacle of this honorable gentleman—who is nominally known as the leader of the Opposition, but who is so utterly impotent for the position—not only attacking the characters of his opponents, but, on the slightest provocation, imputing the grossest motives to members of his own party.

Mr. STOUT.—Name.

Mr. ORMOND.—I will "name" if the honorable gentleman anxiously desires me to do so. I will first allude to the case in which the honorable gentleman hurled imputations against the honorable member for Avon and the Canterbury members. I will next name the case of the honorable member for Bruce, who was attacked by the honorable gentleman when the Counties Bill was under discussion in Committee a few evenings ago. I would like to know where you will find in this House a member who bears a higher character for consistency than the honorable member for Bruce; and yet, because the honorable gentleman ventured to differ from the honorable member for the Thames on a question of boundaries, he was charged with acting in a manner opposed to his duties as a representative of a Southern constituency, because his private and personal interests were involved. And with these cases before his eyes, the honorable member for Dunedin is silly enough to dare me to bring forward instances of the thorough wrong-headedness of the honorable member for the Thames, and of his complete inability to fill the position he holds, or nominally holds, as leader of a party. What have we seen him do? We saw him, this session, start with a compact party under him; but now all its best members are gone from him, because they could no longer consent to be dragged through the dirt. The honorable member for Dunedin (Mr. Stout) laughs; but he knows very well that it is the only wish of that party to get rid of the leadership which is weighing them down, and rendering them impotent for any useful purpose. The honorable gentleman knows, and we know, that the honorable member for the Thames has been practically deposed from the leadership of his party. We know perfectly well that every member of the Opposition has told him that it would be desirable that he should withdraw from his position because he was weighing them down, and preventing the Opposition, as a party, from doing any good or useful thing. Honorable gentlemen on the other side may still laugh; but they know too well that, if they come back next year under the honorable gentleman's leadership, they come back to an impracticable position—one from which no good can result.

Mr. STOUT.—We know nothing of the sort.

Mr. ORMOND.—Then I know it; but what I complain of at the present moment is, that the honorable gentleman should be allowed to hurl, right and left, unfounded imputations of the grossest character against honorable members. We are all actuated by as high motives as the honorable gentleman, but we do not bring ourselves down to the course which the honorable gentleman adopts. The speech of the member for Auckland City East was also characteristic of him. From him, also, we heard those absurd imputations of motives so much indulged in by the honorable member for the Thames, that all the efforts of honorable members on this side of the House are guided by the hope of gaining some personal, paltry advantage.

Mr. STOUT.—Hear, hear.

Mr. ORMOND.—The honorable member has well exemplified the utter shamelessness, if one may use such an expression, of making such imputations, and it is beyond all forbearance that honorable members should be subjected to them. The honorable member for Auckland City East talked about who represented the people! I should like to know how much that honorable gentleman, and several other honorable members who come from the Province of Auckland, represent the people. I speak, of course, of those who were elected upon the Sir George Grey "ticket." For myself, I would scorn to sit here upon any such ticket. If I could not sit here in my own right, I would prefer not to be here at all. I certainly would not consent to occupy the position of the honorable member for Auckland City East, and many other members who sit around the honorable member for the Thames. They were elected to be joints to Sir George Grey's tail, to be whisked about as he chose to whisk them; and these are the gentlemen who talk to us about representing the people—who tell us, forsooth, that we represent nothing! I will only further state that this discussion has been entirely provoked by the speeches from the other side. There is no end or object to be gained by it; but, for myself, I could not sit here and listen without objection to these gross imputations which have been made by members on the Opposition benches.

Mr. ROWE.—I should not feel satisfied with myself if I did not make a few observations on the present occasion. The honorable member for Auckland City East—who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place—when addressing the House this evening said that those honorable members who voted with the Ministry only sought to further the interests of themselves and their friends. I do not object to such imputations being made against me by the honorable member. They will go forth to the country for what they are worth, and when placed in the balance will weigh very lightly indeed. But, Sir, the honorable gentleman, while in his seat, has told me that I shall be afraid to go through the streets of Auckland when I return. All I have to say in reply is, that I lived in Auckland many years before the honorable gentleman saw it, and I was not afraid to go through the streets then. I have lived in Auckland since he has been there without experiencing any fear of the kind; and I was going to say that if I lived in Auckland after the honorable gentleman left it I might be afraid. However that may be, I shall not be afraid to face my constituents when I go among them. Sir, the honorable gentleman made the remark that nearly the whole of the members from Auckland were elected because they promised to follow Sir George Grey. Well, he certainly could not bring that accusation against me; but if he could do so, I should consider it the very worst accusation that could be brought against me. What folly, what excessive folly, it is for those gentlemen to come here and tell us that we do not represent our constituencies! Why, Sir, a number of those very gentlemen would not have been here if they had not promised to follow Sir George Grey through thick and thin. They were never elected on their own merits, nor because their constituents had any confidence in them. They were simply elected on Sir George Grey's ticket—they were supported by his Committee, and that is how they got into Parliament. I may say that myself and several other members have not stood on such a ticket. I have steadily voted for the principles I advocated when I first stood before my constituents, and nobody can say anything to the contrary. The honorable member for Parnell, when speaking, said something about a division of the colony and separation. Well, Sir, I should have thought it the greatest calamity that could have befallen the colony if what are known as the Separation resolutions had been carried by this House, and I glory in the fact that I was not one of those who supported the proposal. If these resolutions had been carried, "Ichabod" would have been written against the names of those gentlemen who supported them, and they would have lost their political reputations for ever if they had had any such reputations. I say that even Auckland itself will rejoice ere long that those resolutions were not carried. Now, Sir, my honorable friends have been talking about bloodshed and all that kind of thing. That is, as far as Auckland is concerned, the veriest nonsense ever uttered. The Auckland people know too much to go in for rebellion. But at any rate if there were a rebellion at Auckland, I am very glad to say that we have a large force of Volunteers at the Thames, and I shall not be afraid to go into the midst of them when I return to my home. Those men who talk about rebellion will not fight. There is not courage enough in them, and there never was. They can talk and use a multitude of words, but it goes no further than that. The Auckland people, I say, possess too much good sense, and are too deeply interested in the welfare of the colony; and if there is one desire in their breasts above all others, it is that the colony should be united, and energetic in pursuing those courses which are conducive to the prosperity of New Zealand. If the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) talks till he induces the Auckland people to rebel, I pity him. I must admit that he has a great deal of eloquence, but all his eloquence will not induce them to do that. But, Sir, there was one thing about which I did feel sorry, and my honorable colleague will pardon me if I refer to it. The honorable gentleman pointed to the Postmaster-General, the honorable member for Waikato, and told us that he had sold himself to the Ministry. But I ask, Sir, ought not a member of this House to be ashamed of such an assertion as that? What right has he to make such an assertion? I have known the honorable member for Waikato for many years, and I say that, after all he has done for the colony, any man who comes here and uses such expressions with regard to him must be lost to all sense of shame.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Sir, I have always heard since I came into this House that the honorable member for Clive had a little room upstairs somewhere; and from his assumption of knowing everything that goes on, and the remarkable accuracy of his statements with regard to the movements of the Opposition, I know now what use that little room is put to. That little room is kept for the purpose of seeing what the Opposition are doing. The honorable gentleman has spoken of us as a remnant, and says that all our best men have gone away from us. Well, all I can say is, that if they have gone in consequence of anything that has taken place this session, I am very glad to be left behind. Of the many things said by the honorable gentleman, one at least deserves not to go unnoticed. He seemed to hold a doctrine out for our approval, that because a man from many years' service has become entitled to a pension from the Crown, therefore his lips are to be sealed, when he takes a seat in this House, from opposing the gentlemen on the Government benches. Well, Sir, that accounts for another thing. That honorable gentleman has not as yet received a pension from the Government, but he is in receipt of full salary; and if his doctrine is that a pension is to undermine independence, we can understand that the receipt of a full salary will have the effect of blowing away independence altogether. The Hon. the Minister of Justice has told us that the Government are prepared to accept the whole of the responsibility of this thing. But there are many men who are prepared to accept and take anything they can get. The Hon. the Minister of Justice does not stand alone—his own department can tell him that. I give the Government full credit for their power of expansion; and when I heard the Hon. the Minister of Justice say how much responsibility they could take and were in receipt of, I could not help thinking of the old fable of the frog and her offspring, when they were in the field with the bull. The frog tried to expand herself to the size of the bull; and we have seen the same sort of thing here this session. This system of expansion has been going on, until, like the paper-bag in the hands of a small boy in the street, it will expand till it bursts; and this burst is near at hand now. He also thinks it is contemptuous to speak of the Governor as a servant of the Crown.

Major ATKINSON.—No, as a servant of the Ministry.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Well, Her Majesty's Ministers do represent the Crown, and therefore the term was practically "servant of the Crown." The expression was, "the servant of Her Majesty's Ministers at Home." Why, Sir, those Ministers themselves glory in being servants of the Crown. Has the Hon. the Minister of Justice never heard the maxim, "He that would be greatest, let him be the servant of all"? I think the honorable gentleman must rise in the moral scale a little. Then the honorable member for Clive used the phrase, "so utterly without fact," in regard to the honorable member for the Thames. Is not that the very phrase we have been applying to the Ministers of the Crown? Who asked for this debate this afternoon, and, just for the sake of raising a laugh amongst those offspring who were witnessing the process of expansion, moved that this correspondence be read? The honorable member for Clive flattered the honorable member for Bruce, but I do not think the latter gentleman is to be bought by flattery. At the commencement of this session I heard the Hon. the Premier speak of an honorable member as a future great statesman; and I think the same sort of thing is being done now with regard to the honorable member for Bruce, though in a smaller sphere. In regard to the question immediately before the House, I may say that we have heard a great deal from Ministers, but yet they have not told us what answer they advised His Excellency to send in reference to the correspondence before us. I think it was their duty to come down and take the first opportunity of drawing the attention of the House and the country to this correspondence; but in my opinion it was also their duty to show what course they intended to take in regard to it. They ought to have told us what steps they had taken, if they are responsible, as they claim to be, for the actions of Her Majesty's representative. It is well this debate has arisen to show the weakness of the Government in this House in commanding a majority. What is the use of a majority which will go to the "Aye" or "No" lobby as they are commanded, if there is no management of them? As far as the management of a majority goes, the present Government have shown themselves weaker than any Government which has preceded them, and this debate has helped to intensify that weakness.

Mr. TOLE.—Sir, I am not astonished at the manner in which the honorable member for Clive has spoken, for, as far as my observation goes, he appears always to perform the inferior part of the work of the Ministry. After three or four weeks of bottling up, as I may call it, of abuse, he always appears then to avail himself of the first opportunity to let it off at the honorable member for the Thames. He rarely speaks unless he wishes to attack that honorable member, for obvious reasons. He has, however, thought proper, in relation to the following of the honorable member for the Thames, to stigmatize—for that is the sense in which his words were used—them as his “tail.” Well, Sir, I can say this at least, that I consider it a greater honor to be a part of the tail of a body that is here, than to be part of the tail of a body that has ignominiously departed from this House. I do represent some principle here, but I do not suppose the honorable member for Clive represents any. I was astounded at the laughter with which Ministers received the subject which has been under discussion to-day, in the face of such perilous and imminent events. I am astonished, also, at the laughter with which they meet contradictions to their statements. It is ludicrous to see them laughing at what involves their honor and the honor of Her Majesty’s representative, and then with mock serenity jump up to a point of order at once when his name has been respectfully used in relation to his action as Governor by the honorable member for the Thames. That is a position which I cannot understand. It may be that as a new member I am not initiated in the deportment of Ministers, but I may say that during the whole of this session I have been shocked with the levity of Ministers in regard to such important matters as the present. It will be remembered, Sir, that the other day a memorandum was written by the Premier to the Superintendent of Otago, in which reference was made to the superior opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England in relation to Abolition. The honorable member for the Thames asked, on the first opportunity in the House, that a copy of the opinion should be laid upon the table. It might naturally have been supposed that the Government would have given a categorical answer to the honorable member’s simple question; but they requested the honorable member to postpone his question, and to give formal notice of it. The next day the Premier got up and answered baldly, as he could have done on the day before, that no opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England had been received. At the same time the people had been led to believe by the terms of the memorandum of the Premier to the Superintendent of Otago, which had been published in the newspapers, that an opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England did exist. By that memorandum they misled the people by inducing them to believe that Her Majesty had given the Royal assent to the Abolition Act, when Her Majesty, they must have known, could not give such an assent. All the power the Queen has is that of disallowing an Act within two years, and that power she has not yet been pleased to exercise: there is still time in which such power of disallowance may be exercised. The Ministers have thus misled the people—I use the word “misled” advisedly—into the belief that Her Majesty has assented to this Act, to make it appear that the matter is fixed and confirmed. An action of that kind on the part of the Government is to be very much deplored; and it is to be regretted that Ministers should have adopted the course pursued by them. In that view I would move, if I be in order, the following amendment:—That this House regrets the terms of the memorandum, without date, of Ministers to His Excellency the Governor, published in the New Zealand Times newspaper of the 4th October, 1876, in relation to the correspondence with the Superintendent of Otago upon the subject of the Abolition Act.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think it is an amendment which I can put. It refers to a matter of which the House has no cognizance. If the documents were papers of the House, or if they had been laid on the table by leave of the House, it might have been moved by way of amendment.

Mr. STOUT.—I think it is to be regretted that the business of the day should have been interrupted in the manner in which it has been interrupted this afternoon. It is not the first time that the business of the country—I presume I may term it so—has been interrupted by the Government. On Friday night, when the Government supported, if they did not actually move, an amendment of a substantial character in the Counties Bill, through their action in that respect the additional Financial Statement, which was to have been made at eight o’clock on Friday, was not made at all, and the debate on the Counties Bill lasted until after two o’clock in the morning. The Government now apparently think it their duty to bring down an incomplete correspondence and to lay part of it on the table. The communication is only one of others that have been addressed to His Excellency. The Premier’s explanation was that this was the most important communication he had ever had the honor to lay upon the table of the House. Thus he valued this communication from the Superintendent of Auckland as of more importance than all the rest of the Government despatches and all the other papers laid upon the table. I would like the Premier to explain how it happens that the only thing laid upon the table of the House and read to-day is the copy of the telegram from Sir George Grey. The reply of His Excellency to the Superintendent of Auckland is not laid before the House. Does he mean to say that he has advised His Excellency to be so discourteous to the Superintendent as to give him no reply? The excuse he gave why the correspondence between the Superintendent of Otago and His Excellency the Governor was not laid upon the table of the House was, that the correspondence was incomplete; it was still going on. Does he mean to say that this correspondence is not finished? I am surprised that the honorable member should fall back on that explanation of his conduct. I wish to say one or two words in reference to what has been done about introducing His Excellency’s name into this debate. It is not usual in the Home Parliament to introduce Her Majesty's name in debates in such a way as to influence the decision of the House. But I think, Sir, you will find it laid down in "May," page 331, that Her Majesty's name may be used in the House of Commons so long as it is not used irreverently, so long as no insult is intended to Her Majesty, and so long as the use of that name is not to influence debates. I presume that His Excellency the Governor cannot be placed in a higher position than Her Majesty the Queen. I can conceive circumstances arising where it would be absolutely necessary for this Parliament to take some steps in relation to the conduct of the Governor; and should it be precluded from discussing that action? What does it amount to? It amounts to this, that a servant of the Crown is not to have his action criticised in the Parliament of the colony. That is certainly not constitutional government. I admit that the Governor can have no knowledge of what takes place in this House excepting by an address; but it would be the duty of any honorable member, if he stood alone, to bring before this Parliament, even upon a motion for an address to the Crown, any charge he believed against any servant of the Crown in the colony. In reference to that, I can only say that the Governor stands in two positions—one as an independent branch of the Legislature, because he is a part of the General Assembly, and no doubt it is not wise in the House to discuss his action as a part of the Legislature; but as Governor he has certain duties to the people of the colony, and in that relation it is our bounden duty to discuss his conduct. Possibly he might not act on the advice of his Ministers, and therefore we should have a right to discuss his conduct. But coming back, I can only say that I very much regret that the Premier should have laid incomplete correspondence on the table, and at the same time kept back what he called incomplete correspondence between the Superintendent of Otago and the Governor. I was not aware that the latter correspondence was being continued, and I would like to know from the Premier whether it is to be continued. Does he know it is to be continued? If he is going to say that, because there is some chance the correspondence may be continued, he would not lay it on the table, it would never get on the table of the House at all; it might extend for twenty years. I do not intend to reply to all the criticisms, but I would ask the honorable gentleman to bear in mind that it is his duty as Premier to consult the feelings of the colonists as a whole; that as Adviser of His Excellency it is his bounden duty to so frame measures that they shall not be mere measures for a majority, but for the colony. And I go further and tell him this: that if the Ministry had banded themselves together to destroy the colony's credit, they could not have acted differently from what they are doing now. Are they not aware that everything which transpires in this colony is known to the money-lenders in London? I do not say our credit is bad; but I know this fact, that if the Ministry are going to raise large additional loans upon the London market, they will have to pay considerably higher interest than they have paid hitherto, or else the loans will not float at a premium, but be at a very large discount. At the very time you are going to raise the loans, you are having raised up in the colony a feeling of hatred to the Central Government, and thus encouraging a feeling of insecurity among the money-lenders. Instead of attempting to smooth over any harshness of feeling that may exist in the two outlying districts of the colony, Auckland and Otago, what does the Premier do but spread dissension throughout the colony? That has been his sole object. Why was this telegram laid upon the table if not to cause dissension in the colony and create a harshness of feeling? We came to the House this afternoon to listen to the Financial Statement with no idea of criticising the Government or its action; but they bring this matter down for the sole purpose of having a fling at the Opposition, and for no other purpose. Look at what they did in reference to the memorandum which has been published in the Press of the colony. They stated facts in the memorandum which—I will put it in this form—they could not verify in a Court of justice; and if they attempted to verify them they would find they had made a very serious mistake. What do they say? They actually put this in the memorandum to His Excellency the Governor: "Ministers are fully aware of, and deeply regret, the strong feeling against abolition apparently held by a portion of the inhabitants of Otago." They might have said, "We regret it, but the Act has been passed. We cannot alter it. We cannot pass a measure to change it. There will always be some disagreement about a new law." But what do they say? "Fermented"—they say "fermented," I suppose they meant fomented—"as it has been by misrepresentations and agitation, for which the Superintendent himself is in a great measure responsible." Well, Sir, I can only say this: that if they mean to say that the Superintendent of Otago has stirred up ill-feeling against the General Government at the present crisis, they are making a charge which is utterly without foundation. I can speak from my own personal knowledge, and I say it has been the aim of the Superintendent of Otago since he left this House, and when he met the people of Otago—not merely the people of Dunedin, but representatives came in from all the country districts to be present at this meeting—I say his aim and object were to try and smooth over asperities and to get the people to seek redress in a constitutional manner. He told them that they should exhaust all constitutional means—every constitutional method—before anything else was tried. I believe you will, by next mail, hear of another telegram sent to the Secretary of State asking, in a constitutional manner, for redress, before resort is had to anything else. And yet, knowing this, what have the Ministry done? They have thrown down a challenge to the people of Otago; they have insulted them in their memorandum in a way no Ministry ought to have insulted the people.

They have not only insulted them, but they have accused the people of a want of common intelligence. Do you mean to say that it is in the power of one man—of one man who has only addressed two public meetings during the recess and one during this session—to produce such a feeling in the minds of the people in reference to the attitude of the Government towards them? Have the Government no political organs in the Press? Can the Government make no speeches in reference to this matter? Sir, I cannot understand such an accusation being made against the Superintendent of Otago by the Premier. Leaving this memorandum, which I hope on a future occasion I shall be able to discuss in the House, I wish to make one or two remarks upon what fell from the Minister of Justice. He started in a peculiar manner, and this is not the first time he has brought this subject up. He asks, Have we not got responsible government? He says I have said "No, no!" I repeat it again. I say that, since the inauguration of the Public Works policy in 1870, there has been no such thing as responsible government. Look how Ministries have been formed. Did any one hear in any colony or in the British Parliament of any person being taken from the Magistrate's Bench and made a Minister of the Crown in a responsible Government? The honorable member speaks plainly, and I shall speak plainly upon this occasion. I do not wish to make any personal attack. Did any one ever see in any Parliament members taken from the Opposition to join the Ministry? Was not the present Premier elected in opposition to the Fox-Vogel Government? He was elected on that ground; he came into this House, and the Vogel Ministry afterwards took him in as a Minister of the Crown with the Minister for Justice. Is that responsible government? Look at the way in which my honorable friend the member for Waikato was taken into the Ministry. I ask, is that responsible government? He opposed the Government on what may be termed the two Government questions, the most vital constitutional questions—and yet, Sir, he becomes a member of their Government! Is that constitutional government? They talk about responsible government. I say that there has been no responsible Government whatever since 1870. The whole aim of the Parliament seems to be to get as much for your district as you can. And what have we had now? I say that Parliament, instead of being governed by party, is being demoralized by the Public Works scheme, and there has been no such thing as party government in this House. And then, because the honorable member for the Thames protests against the course the Government have taken, he is met with the statement, "Oh, we are Responsible Advisers; you cannot say anything against us." One has only to look at the method of inaugurating the Public Works scheme to see whether or not there has been responsible government; but I do not wish to go into that now, as I do not wish to detain the House beyond the half-hour, the usual time of adjournment. I then come to the remarks of the honorable member for Olive. I am sure the Opposition must be very grateful to him for the care he has been taking of them. It is very kind of him to tell us what to do and how to act. He desires, no doubt, to see a strong Opposition, and that is the reason he takes so much interest in us. I can understand that he spoke with a little feeling. He is one of those who had to leave those benches because of the action of the honorable member for the Thames. It is not a very pleasant thing to admit having done a wrong, to resign his position, and become a private member. All these things are very discouraging even to the honorable member for Olive. I can only add, in reference to the honorable member for Olive, that when the Opposition require his services we shall have no hesitation in waiting as a deputation on him in his office, and inviting him to come among us and see if he cannot guide us in the right path. As he is so fond of speaking to the Opposition, perhaps he will be kind enough to give a little advice to the Ministry, and tell them there is such a thing in managing the business of this House as consulting even the prejudices—to use no better word—as consulting even the prejudices of your opponents, and that, in attempting to treat the Opposition as non-existent, they will find that they have made a mistake, and that they cannot go on very well as they please. If the honorable gentleman would give them that advice, and if they acted upon it for a week, they would find that things would go on more smoothly. No doubt the Opposition will take even his counsel as to how they should best act, but until we ask his advice he need not give it: we do not require his advice at present. I do not wish to boast of the members of the Opposition, but I think we have got as able advisers among ourselves as the honorable member for Olive. When we find that we have not, then we shall send for him, not till then. Perhaps, until that time occurs, there is no use in his being so much interested in what the Opposition do. The honorable member was silly enough to dare me to do anything: he hinted that his word was law, and that anybody who said anything against him would be nowhere in Hawke's Bay. I can only tell him that, so far as I know the feelings of the Opposition, if we desired to change our leader we would not select one from the Ministerial party; we can get a leader from amongst ourselves. I believe the Opposition are prepared to follow their present leader, believing that he is one who is fighting for what is right, and also feeling this, which the honorable member for Olive forgets, that if the Opposition were fighting for office they could have been in office. We have been fighting for something else. Is it not well known that, if at the beginning of the session the Opposition had said to members opposing the Ministry, "Abolition is at an end—we shall join in turning out the Ministry," the Ministry would have been out in a week? There was no reason why the Opposition should have remained in a minority except that they fought for a principle, and for what they believed to be right, and not for office. It is better that the Opposition, if dwindling in numbers, should fight for a principle, than that they should have daily an accretion for the lower object of obtaining office. I think the remarks made by the honorable member in reference to the honorable member for the Thames were rather out of taste. As to a matter of taste, each person must of course be his own judge. I think it would have been better for the honorable gentleman not to have dragged in that the ex-Governor So-and-so did so and so in the past. If he had just addressed himself really to the matter which came before the House, it would have been more instructive and interesting. But, Sir, I will not allude further to the honorable gentleman. If I chose to refer further to the honorable gentleman, I could say as much about him, or perhaps more, than he said about the honorable member for the Thames; but I do not desire to do so. The question before the House is that the papers be printed. I think the Opposition has taught the Government a useful lesson, that when introducing debatable matter they cannot expect but to have what they have had this afternoon—two or three hours taken up with the discussion.

Motion agreed to.

TAUPIRI BURIAL-GROUND.

Mr. NAHE asked the Government, If the Government will give effect to the report of the Native Affairs Committee on the petition of Major Te Wheoro? He understood from the Native Minister that the Government intended to consider this question. He had heard by telegram from Major Te Wheoro that two new houses had been erected on that sacred place.

Mr. RICHARDSON replied that the Government wished in every way to consult the views of the Natives in this matter, and, as far as it was practical to comply with the recommendation contained in the report of the Native Affairs Committee, they would do so.

TELEGRAPH STATION AT UPPER MOUTERE.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE asked the Postmaster-General, Whether the Government will give effect to the prayer of the petition of the settlers of the Upper Moutere, in reference to opening a telegraph station in that settlement?

Mr. WHITAKER said he had made inquiry as to the probable cost of erecting a station at this place. He found that the erection of the telegraph station would cost £350, and £150 more would be required to keep it up. He thought that under the circumstances the honorable gentleman would agree with him that the Government would hardly be justified in erecting this station.

C. PHILLIPS.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Mr. HAMLIN moved, That this House will, on Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole to consider of a respectful address to His Excellency the Governor, praying him to place on the supplementary estimates a sum of £300, in accordance with the report of the Public Petitions Committee in the case of Mr. Coleman

Phillips. He would not detain the House with lengthened remarks, as he knew honorable members were anxious to hear the Financial Statement. This was the only occasion on which he could hope to bring the motion forward with any chance of success, and he had therefore tabled it. The matter had been before the Petitions Committee for some days, was thoroughly gone into, and at length the Committee came to the decision that Mr. Phillips should be allowed £300 in place of the compensation of £2,000, which had been promised to him by the late Premier. There was little doubt that Mr. Phillips was the originator of the Polynesian scheme; and having drawn the attention of the late Premier to it, he was requested by the then Governor, Sir James Ferguson, and by Sir Julius Vogel, to visit Wellington to lay the matter before the Government. He would read a few extracts from the papers laid before the Assembly in 1874, which would show the House that the promise was made by the late Prime Minister to Mr. Phillips. In his letters on the South Sea Islands scheme, Sir Julius Vogel said,—

"The plan which I am about to develop arose in my mind in this way:—

"Mr. Coleman Phillips, who had aided in arranging for the establishment of a bank in Fiji, addressed to me a communication, in which he suggested the establishment of a company, which, like the East India Company, should endeavour, politically and commercially, to gain ascendancy in the Pacific Islands. I was much struck with the idea; but when Mr. Phillips asked me if I would advise him to go Home to endeavour to float the company, I felt that he would have great difficulty in raising the capital. It then occurred to me, from the New Zealand point of view, from which I felt bound to look at it, that Mr. Phillips's project, supposing it matured, might or might not be worked in a manner calculated to be of much benefit to New Zealand."

He then goes on to say,—

"I may add, I consider that Mr. Phillips's share in the project entitles him to substantial compensation."

Further on, in a memorandum addressed to His Excellency the Governor, he says,—

"Your Excellency is aware that I have felt much interest in a proposal made by Mr. Phillips, that a trading company should be formed in England with the view of absorbing by its commercial power a large share of political control in the islands. The object proposed by Mr. Phillips, excepting that of a chartered labour traffic, I approved; and your Excellency, I believe, communicated the substance of Mr. Phillips's ideas to the Secretary of State."

After that, His Excellency the Governor, writing from Government House, Wellington, 11th March, 1874, addressed Lord Kimberley upon the subject in these terms:—

"This scheme was at first devised by a private individual, who contemplated an attempt to form a company in England and Germany. He communicated it to the Premier, the Hon. Mr. Vogel, C.M.G., who deemed it to be one which New Zealand should not only encourage, but adopt and control, in consideration of the advantages which would accrue to her through a reciprocal trade with the islands, and possibly by becoming, at a future time, the centre of their government."

It would appear from these extracts that Sir Julius Vogel always recognized Mr. Phillips's claim, and it would be seen from the following letters what his private opinions of the matter were. On the 3rd November, 1873, Mr. Phillips wrote to Sir Julius Vogel as follows:—

"Desirous of obtaining the influence of the Bank of New Zealand, in London, I submitted the plan to Mr. Murdoch. He has favourably considered it, and will give me letters of introduction. He strongly advised me to print off a prospectus for distribution amongst a certain few in New Zealand, and to allow them to recommend it to their friends in England. He would prefer to indorse a stated plan than to give an open letter of introduction. Would you kindly give me your opinion?"

Then came the following answer, to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the House:—

"Wellington, 6th November, 1873.

"DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your note, and think you had better delay doing anything till you see me.

"I have thought much over your project, and have a suggestion to make which I think you will like. In meanwhile I would wait and not tell your plans to others; the quieter you are about them the better.—I have, &c.,

"JULIUS VOGEL.

"I am sure to be in Auckland in the course of a couple of months, probably sooner, and the delay will do no harm. Let me know what you decide on.

"J. V."

These were a few of the facts which were brought out before the Public Petitions Committee. It was admitted by Sir Julius Vogel, in the evidence he gave before the Committee, that Mr. Phillips was entitled to compensation for the expense he had been put to, and the Committee recommended that he should receive £300. The case was such a strong one that it needed little recommendation, and he would therefore not detain the House with any further remarks.

Major ATKINSON said that the Government would not oppose the motion for going into Committee on Thursday, but they would reserve to themselves the right to consider the question on its merits.

Motion agreed to.

SIR J. VOGEL'S MISSIONS TO ENGLAND.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Sir G. GREY moved, For the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the cost to the colony of the two missions of Sir J. Vogel to England. Such Committee to consist of Mr. Andrew, Hon. Major Atkinson, Mr. Lusk, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Rolleston, Mr. Rees, and the mover; with power to call for persons, papers, and accounts, and to report thereon within four weeks; five to be a quorum.

Major ATKINSON said he was loth to take up the time of the House when honorable members were anxiously waiting to hear the statement of the Government with regard to the finances; but to force forward the proposal of the honorable gentleman would mean either that they should waste a considerable amount of time, or agree to a motion which would result in the appointment of a Committee for a useless purpose. If the honorable gentleman would move for a return, he would obtain the whole of the information asked for; and he would undertake that it should be supplied as speedily as possible. He was not prepared for the motion, and certainly he was not prepared to assent to it. It would, he thought, suit the convenience of the House, if the honorable gentleman would, at any rate, postpone his motion till next day.

Mr. SHEEHAN hoped the honorable member for the Thames would accept the suggestion of the Premier. There was no desire to delay the delivery of the Financial Statement, and it would perhaps be better that the motion should be postponed, on condition that an opportunity should be given to discuss it next day.

Sir G. GREY did not expect any opposition, or he would not have proceeded with the motion. His impression was that the Ministry would have been delighted to support such a proposal. He felt sure that the honorable member for Timaru or the honorable member for Parnell would have thanked him for bringing forward a motion of the kind had they been in office. He would, however, agree to postpone it, on condition that he should be at full liberty to bring it forward next day.

Motion, by leave, made an Order of the day for next day.

ABOLITION.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Mr. REES moved, That copies of all telegrams, correspondence, and despatches between His Excellency the Governor and the Superintendents of Auckland and Otago, during the last four weeks, relating to the abolition of the provinces, and between His Excellency the Governor and the Secretary of State for the Colonies in reference thereto, be laid on the table of this House. They had had some of these documents placed before the House, but there were others which had not been produced, and he now asked that they should be laid on the table for the information of honorable members.

Mr. ROLLESTON would like to ask Mr. Speaker's ruling as to whether it was not usual to address His Excellency, in order to obtain documents of that kind from him.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honorable gentleman was quite right.

Mr. REES understood that they were in possession of the correspondence.

Major ATKINSON, on behalf of the Government, would undertake to lay the documents referred to on the table; that was to say, he would ask His Excellency's permission to do so.

Mr. REES asked leave to withdraw his amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

Clause IV.—Customs.

Customs, £41,595 3s. 6d.

Major ATKINSON.—Mr. O'Rourke: I desire, with the permission of the Committee, to take this opportunity of stating briefly the financial position of the colony, and of submitting for the consideration of the Committee the proposals of the Government for the current financial year.

The Financial Statement of my honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer, and the tables accompanying that statement, give such full information as to the position of the Public Accounts, that I shall not have to trouble the Committee with much detail upon the present occasion; my object being to give a short and comprehensive statement of our financial proposals.

I will first consider the position of our Loans and Public Works Account, and then of our revenue and expenditure.

Honorable members will observe that in this sum I have not included certain advances, amounting to £256,845 3s. 4d., repayable by the provinces. These advances are not an available asset, nor can any large part of them be recovered without taking revenue which it is now proposed to devote to local uses. I do not, however, propose to abandon these claims: they will be charged as a liability against each province; but honorable members will, I think, agree that they should be omitted as an asset from this account.

It will be seen that I have included in my available balance the proceeds of the £1,000,000 debentures recently disposed of in London. These debentures, as is shown by papers already in the possession of the House, bear interest at 5 per cent, and have been sold at, and a little above, par. I have also included the £800,000 of Imperial Guaranteed Debentures at their nominal value. I do not intend, at present, to sell these securities, but shall obtain advances upon them as heretofore, as occasion may require.

Of the available balance of £1,658,146 17s. 8d.,

LOANS.

PUBLIC WORKS ACCOUNT.

Honorable members are aware that by last year's legislation the unexpended balances of the Immigration and Public Works Loan and the General Purposes Loan were combined in one account, called the Public Works Account.

In Table G, to the Financial Statement of last year, honorable members will find that the balance to credit of the Immigration and Public Works Loan was £2,187,088 11s. 8d., and to the General Purposes Loan £67,062 8s. 4d., which together make an available total of £2,254,151 with which we began the year 1875-76. The transactions for the year are set forth in the Table B (1), attached to the Financial Statement of Sir Julius Vogel, which shows as the result a balance of £136,605 5s. 9d. at credit of the account. I accordingly begin my statement of Ways and Means for Public Works with that amount £136,605 5s. 9d.

I add to this sum the Ways and Means partly or entirely realized, but not yet brought to account. They are as follow:—

a large amount is required for works already under contract; and we propose to ask for appropriations to the extent of about £2,000,000, most of which will be required within the year. We would gladly ask for a less amount, and my honorable colleague the Minister for Public Works will endeavour to restrain expenditure as far as is compatible with prudence; but considering the urgency and importance of the works proposed to be executed, we do not think it wise to ask for less than the sum I have mentioned. Hence, it will be seen that additional Ways and Means, to the amount, in round numbers, of £350,000, will be required to carry on our public works and immigration during the current year.

DEFENCE LOAN.

A reference to the Table G, attached to the statement of my predecessor, will show that the Defence Loan Account was in debit on the 30th June in the sum of £125,918 10s. 2d. The sale of the £250,000 bonds recently disposed of in London will now place that account in credit, and, after repayment of the sum of £50,000 advanced by the Bank of New Zealand, will leave a balance of £74,081 9s. 10d. available for expenditure. It is proposed to apply the sum of £30,000 out of this balance to the Defence services of the year.

CONSOLIDATED FUND.

EXPENDITURE.

In accordance with my promise, the Government have carefully revised the estimates, with a view to retrenchment, but find it impossible suddenly to make reductions to any great amount. We have, however, reduced the proposed expenditure for the Colonial Departments by the sum of £34,370, full particulars of which I shall give in Committee. The Government will, during the recess, carefully consider the organization of all the departments, with the intention of reducing the expenditure as far as is compatible with an efficient service.

Provision has been here made for continuing such of the provincial services, and for the employment of such of the officers of the Provincial Governments, as it has been thought necessary to retain; but to avoid the possibility of embarrassment, power has been taken in the Financial Arrangements Bill to continue other services should it be found desirable to do so. The Government believe that a very large saving will be ultimately made by the amalgamation of the General and Provincial services.

As it is impossible to pass a complete Education Bill this session, and as it is now only necessary to provide for the six months ending on the 30th June next, it has been determined to leave the charge for education upon the Land Fund, the fees where now payable to the Provincial Governments going in aid of that fund. I hope honorable members will approve of this arrangement. The Government desire to see education, so far as it is not maintained by endowments, provided for from the Consolidated Revenue; but, looking at all the circumstances of the colony, they have come, with regret, to the conclusion that the cost of education for the present year must be a charge upon the Land Fund.

I may here state that it is intended to provide out of the Consolidated Fund for the whole cost of the administration of the gold fields, and the sum has accordingly been included in the estimated expenditure for Law and Justice. The gold fields revenue is thus released from all liability, and will be divided amongst the several counties in which it is collected.

It will be observed that only six instead of nine months' subsidies are asked for Municipalities and Road Boards. But, as it would be manifestly unfair that these bodies should suffer by the alteration, I propose to ask for authority to charge the other three months' subsidies against the revenue receivable on account of the provinces to the 31st December next.

REVENUE.

I now come to the consideration of the Consolidated Revenue. I shall take as my starting point the balance of £121,234 13s. 2d. with which the Treasury closed its accounts on the 30th June last. I add to this sum the assets of the year 1875-76 unrealized at that date, amounting to £19,228 15s. 2d., and deduct therefrom liabilities to the amount of £90,410 12s. 2d. then outstanding, which gives us a surplus of £50,052 16s. 2d. with which to begin the year.

But before proceeding further, I desire to say that we adhere to the policy of our predecessors with regard to taking over the railways, general and provincial, and charging 2 per cent. against the District Land Fund, for the total expenditure upon the lines within each district.

We have, then, an available balance of £50,052 16s. 2d. with which to commence the financial year 1876-77, and I estimate the revenue of the year as follows:—

Revenue, 1876-77.		£
Customs Duties, Rents, Seizures, &c. ...	1,240,000
Bonded Stores ...	5,500
Fees, Marine Act, Light Dues, &c. ...	17,350
Pilotage Rates, Harbour Dues, &c. (6 months)	6,667
Stamp Duties ...	115,000
Postal ...	96,000
Telegraphic ...	67,000
Judicial ...	38,000
Fees—Registration of Land ...	12,500
Registration of Deeds ...	15,500
Registration of Births ...	5,500
Crown Grants ...	6,000
Fees and Fines, Sheep Inspection (6 months)...	5,000
Fees—Miscellaneous ...	2,500
Railways—(Colonial, 12 months; Prov. 6 months)	345,000
Incidental Receipts ...	40,000
Miscellaneous Revenue—Provincial (6 months)	13,333
	£2,088,850
Transfer from State Forest Account ...	10,000
Recoveries for Interest on Railways (6 months)	50,000

With one exception, I have accepted the sums set down by the late Treasurer as my estimate of the revenue of the present year. From the Customs revenue I have thought it prudent to deduct £20,000, owing to the fall in the price of wool. I hope, however, considering the improved prospects of the gold fields, that this item of revenue will yet reach the original estimate. I have added to the receipts a sum of £10,000, which I propose to restore to the revenue out of the £15,000 transferred last year to the "State Forests Account." The estimate of receipts for services taken over from the provinces are for six months only, as those receipts will remain provincial revenue until the 31st December next.

As I have said, the balance with which we begin the year is £50,052 16s. 2d. The total revenue of the year is £2,086,850. The transfer of £10,000 from the State Forests Account, and the recoveries for interest at 2 per cent. on the railway expenditure, £50,000, will bring up the receipts of the year to £2,096,850, to which I add the balance of £50,052 16s. 2d., and make up a sum of £2,146,902 16s. 2d. Deducting therefrom the estimated expenditure, amounting to £2,087,948 17s. 8d., we obtain £58,953 18s. 6d. as estimated surplus, from which, however, we shall have to provide for additional expenditure, to be submitted in the supplementary estimates.

The smallness of this surplus will occasion no surprise, when it is remembered that for a long time past the colony has been paying, out of revenue, interest on railway works in course of construction; and, at the present time, although we have raised and have in course of expenditure upon railways about £7,000,000, we can only recover interest from the Land Fund on moneys expended on completed lines, and that only from the 1st of July next after their completion. Under the existing law, interest can only be charged upon £3,500,000 out of the £7,000,000; or, in other words, we are paying out of Consolidated Revenue about £180,000 a year for interest, which, according to the original scheme of Public Works, should be a charge upon the Land Fund.

The time is, however, fast approaching when the whole of our railway expenditure will become reproductive, and the Consolidated Revenue will thereupon be relieved of a considerable portion of the annual burden of interest now cast upon it. So soon as this result shall have been accomplished, the Consolidated Revenue will be in a position to bear those charges for educational and charitable services which the Government reluctantly propose to place for the present on the Land Fund.

LAND FUND.

I now come to the consideration of the Land Fund, against which it is proposed to charge interest and sinking fund on provincial loans and liabilities, surveys, and waste lands administration, half subsidies to counties and Road Boards; and, for the six months ending 30th June next, education and museums, and one-half the maintenance of hospitals and charitable institutions. I append tables showing the estimated receipts and charges in each province for six months. The result is not very satisfactory, showing as it does deficiencies in most of the provinces, amounting altogether to about £145,000, which will have to be made good from Consolidated Revenue. It is a noteworthy fact that Canterbury, which has always maintained a uniform and high price for land, will now have a surplus of about £75,000 for the six months.

To make good the deficiencies to which I have referred, there will be the surplus of the Consolidated Revenue, and for the balance it will be necessary to issue Treasury bills, as contemplated in the Abolition Act of last session. This is not, to my mind, a satisfactory method of finance; but, much as I may dislike the mode by which I propose that the exigency shall be met, I am encouraged by the conviction that the necessity is but temporary, and that the expedient adopted is justified by the peculiar circumstances of the case.

It is but right that the Land Fund, where able, should bear its legitimate burden; and although in many cases it is at present unequal to the charge, it is reasonable to expect that, under an amended land law, the fund will materially improve. I hope, also, for the reasons I have given, that the Consolidated Revenue will shortly be in a position to relieve the fund of the temporary charges cast upon it.

In providing for the impending changes, the Government has to face the difficulties arising from the fact that for some time past the expenditure of many of the provinces has been considerably in excess of their ordinary income, and that the colonial expenditure has been greatly augmented by the demands of the provinces.

It will be the endeavour of the Government to remedy those errors in finance which have been the natural outcome of our partnership with the provinces. The remedy must, however, be applied gradually, and the cure will no doubt take time. We have not only to redeem the errors of the past, but to mark out a wiser course for the future. Our unproductive expenditure must be kept strictly within our ordinary income, and the several sources of our revenue must each be made to bear its own legitimate burden. The Consolidated Fund should be liable for the cost of those services which minister to the "peace, order, and good government" of the community; and the Land Fund should be responsible for those charges which provide for the acquisition, settlement, and development of our real estate.

PROPOSALS.

I wish, Mr. O'Rorke, I could inform the Committee that it was unnecessary to ask for further borrowing power this year, but that, I regret to say, is practically impossible. It would be so manifestly unwise to stop at this juncture the important works now approaching completion, that I do not hesitate to ask for further funds to continue them.

Our proposals are, to ask authority to raise £1,000,000 for the following purposes:—£350,000 additional Ways and Means required for public works to July next; £250,000 to provide for probable contract and other liabilities of the provinces requiring to be met between December and June next, the actual amount of which I have no means at present of ascertaining, and which I hope I may have over-estimated; and £400,000 for such expenditure as the House may direct between the close of the present year and the date at which funds for the continuance of our public works can be provided. I do not intend, as was proposed by the late Government, to borrow moneys to make good the large sum, amounting to over £500,000, due by the provinces to the colonial revenue and to the Public Works Account, but shall hold that indebtedness as a direct liability of the provinces concerned to the colony. We have reason to believe that all the funds we shall require can be obtained without having recourse to the open market. If our expectations on this point are realized, we shall not attempt to place the loan before next session, unless it should be found advisable, for other reasons, to adopt that course.

I shall next session submit to the consideration of the House a scheme based upon carefully-prepared professional estimates, showing definitely and in detail what works are required to complete our railway system, and the cost of such completion; and I shall then ask the House to consider the arrangements necessary for completing the scheme. I shall propose to spread over a series of years the raising and expenditure of the moneys required, and thus to keep the annual charge for interest on the debt within the compass of our growing income.

In conclusion, Mr. O'Rorke, there is much on which I congratulate the country. In the social and moral condition of our population we have reason for contentment. Notwithstanding the serious fall in the price of wool, our material prosperity is steadily advancing, and I am convinced that our commercial operations were never conducted on a sounder basis. We have passed the most trying period of the year without difficulty, employment being plentiful throughout the winter, and at good wages. The gold fields, not only on the West Coast, but in Otago and Auckland also, show the most satisfactory signs of an increasing productiveness. No one can now reasonably doubt the success of the Immigration and Public Works scheme; but in order to reap the full benefit of that scheme, now within our reach, we must exercise a moderate self-restraint in our future operations.

I trust the Committee will approve of the proposals which I have now submitted; for while the Government are deeply impressed with the necessity of steadily continuing our public works and immigration, they are not the less convinced of the necessity of a prudent and careful finance; and I hope that our endeavours to reconcile these objects will have the support of the House and of the country.

* Includes a proportionate distribution of £2,334, grant in aid of higher educational establishments.

Marine, £31,570 18s. 9d.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said there were some items in this department which might be agreed to, but there were other items upon which discussion might take place. He would like to know when they could go into the general question of finance. Of course, honorable members could not discuss finance until they had the honorable gentleman's figures before them.

Mr. REYNOLDS said it had been the practice for the estimates in the Customs Department to be classified under the Civil Service Act. It was usual to give the officers a small additional allowance, and he hoped the Commissioner of Customs would take the matter into consideration, and place a sum on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STOUT said it was only fair that the reductions which had been made should be specified. It was perfectly impossible to understand a vote given in a lump sum. They had salaries put down as yearly salaries. If the honorable member meant to reduce all these salaries by one-half, then the reduction would be more than stated. Where the salaries were an increase from the amount voted by the Provincial Governments, that ought to be shown on the estimates. He thought the expense for the weather reports and storm signals could be done away with altogether. It would be quite sufficient for each telegraph station to forward telegrams with regard to the state of the weather, as was now done and published in the newspapers every day. This department was not at all wanted. In fact, its reports were generally wrong instead of right, and the item might be very well struck out, as the department was altogether useless.

Mr. MANDERS thought the Weather Department was a most useful one, and if it were possible he would feel inclined to move that the amount should be increased. He trusted that no circumstances would prevent the Commissioner of Customs encouraging that department as much as possible to continue its work, which was not only useful in the colony itself, but to the neighbouring colonies. He desired to call attention to the item "Expenses under 'The Naval Training School Act, 1874,' £3,372," which showed a reduction of nearly £1,000 on the previous year's vote. That, to his mind, was taking a wrong step; the Commissioner of Customs had no better department under his control than this, which would educate the youth of the colony to become seamen. Looking to the large extent of seaboard of the colony and the large number of ships employed in trading along it, he thought the House should consider the items under this head more carefully than they had hitherto done. He knew lads in the interior of the country who were most anxious to apprentice themselves and become good seamen. If the colony could afford to pay £5,000 for the "Stella" and £24,000 for the "Hinemoa," surely it might expend some more in instructing its youth in becoming seamen. He was surprised to hear that the "Southern Cross," the vessel obtained for this purpose, he believed, by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, was unfitted for the purpose.

Mr. READER WOOD quite agreed with the honorable member for Dunedin, and disagreed with the honorable member who had just spoken with regard to this Weather Department. It had become a perfect farce and ridicule in every direction. Telegrams were sent that you must look out for storms when beautifully fine weather ensued; and when you were told that that there was going to be fine weather, there were sure to be storms. During the last week there had been the only really fine weather in Wellington for the last four months; yet telegrams were sent one day that tremendous gales were to be expected from the north-east and the next day from the south-west, that no vessel was to leave port on the East Coast, and that all vessels in harbour on the West Coast were to remain, because storms of an awful nature were coming from all directions. Whether the department was badly managed and the people in charge of it were incompetent, or whether, as he firmly believed, the weather was so local in different parts of the colony that it was impossible to say one day what the next day would be, he did not know; but certain it was that everything this department did was a waste of time. He would move that the item be reduced to so much as would be necessary to pay the expenses of the department only for four months of the present financial year.

Mr. REYNOLDS said, if the honorable member for Dunedin would only devote his attention to this department, he would not propose such a reduction or offer such remarks as he had made with regard to it. The honorable member for Parnell was also mistaken in what he said about these telegrams relating to Wellington. The warnings issued during last week were not given to Wellington, but to various other parts of the colony, and indicated what sort of weather was to be expected in the different places. About 78 per cent. of these forecasts were correct. He felt perfectly certain that if the Committee were to strike off this item it would give great dissatisfaction. The department had been the means of greatly reducing the risk of vessels calling at Oamaru, Timaru, and all open roadsteads. It was yet in its infancy, and in the course of a few years would be appreciated even more than it was now.

Mr. BARFF thought the Committee ought to have more information upon the items upon which honorable members were asked to vote, and particularly upon that one which was now under discussion. It would be very interesting to have a return of the number of forecasts made, and the proportion that were correct. He would be very sorry by his vote to increase the danger to shipping on the New Zealand coast; at the same time he felt very strongly that this department was useless. He would like further to know what the meaning of the item "Salaries of thirty-one reporting officers at out-stations, £452" was—whether those officers were connected with the Customs Department or the Harbour Department, and why there was an increase over last year. He would also ask whether, in the vote for Lighthouses, there was a sum proposed for a lighthouse at Hokitika.

Mr. G. McLEAN said there was not an item proposed for a lighthouse at Hokitika, because we had no lighthouse there yet. The Government had received a protest against the erection of a lighthouse there, and did not intend to proceed with the work at present, at all events until further inquiry could be made; having no lighthouse erected there yet, there was no need to have a keeper's salary on the estimates. With regard to the Weather Department, he thought it would be very inadvisable to strike the item off. From what he had heard from seafaring men, he believed these forecasts were most useful in open roadsteads, and he would ask the Committee not to strike the item off, because he believed in time this would prove a most useful department. If the honorable member for Dunedin would look through the estimates, he would see that they were reduced in the instances he referred to by one-half, so as to provide for six months' salaries only.

Mr. MACFARLANE had had a good deal of experience of this Weather Department, and had come to the conclusion that it was worse than useless. Having been connected so much with steam-boats and insurance in Auckland, he could say that not one telegram out of six sent to that place was correct. It was quite likely that in such places as Oamaru and Timaru telegraphed reports indicating the weather might be of value. But if a south-west gale were coming up it could be reported from the telegraph office at Dunedin, and if a north-east gale were coming on it could be reported from Wellington. As far as Auckland was concerned the reports were useless, as the gales prevalent in the other parts of the colony did not reach them. If the department were to be retained, it would be much better to place it in the hands of the harbour-masters, who could give more correct information, and in whose hands it would cost nothing. The department was a perfect farce; and there was another office of a similar character—namely, that of Secretary of Customs, who was also called Officer in Charge of the Marine Department. This gentleman had prepared a report which cost £1,500, and this was the production of twelve months' work.

Mr. G. McLEAN was sorry to hear the honorable gentleman speak in that strain of the Secretary of Customs, who was a very old and efficient officer. He had been absent on leave during the last twelve months, and, instead of spending the whole of his time in pleasure, had collected a great amount of information which would be exceedingly useful to the colony.

Mr. BARFF pointed out that his questions had not been answered. The first was as to the salaries of the thirty-one reporting officers at out-stations. He wished to know whether they were to be Custom officers or harbour-masters. The next question he put was as to the keepers of new lighthouses. He was surprised to hear that the salary of the lighthouse-keeper at Hokitika was not included, and he hoped the Government would state why they had changed their opinion in regard to the lighthouse at that place.

Mr. MACFARLANE did not say that the Secretary of Customs was not a good officer; but if he could absent himself from his duties for twelve months, surely that was a very good proof that he was not wanted.

Mr. HUNTER said that those who had any knowledge of the Secretary of Customs would admit that he was one of the most devoted, trustworthy, and reliable public servants in the colony. He differed entirely from the honorable member for Waitemata as to the value of the Weather Department. Speaking of its value as affecting vessels trading out of Wellington, he could bear testimony to the fact that it had been of immense service. He hoped the expenses of the department would be increased rather than reduced, and that the suggestion of the Chief Officer, that daily communication should be held with the Australian colonies, would be adopted. The cost would not be more than $450 or £500 per annum, and that would be money well expended. He would remind the honorable member for Waitemata that many valuable vessels and many lives had been lost on the coast—losses which would possibly have been averted had the department been in existence in the earlier days of the colony.

Mr. HODGKINSON said the predictions of the department might not have been verified in all cases, but New Zealand was no exception in this respect. The Weather Departments in England and North America had been of great service; and although the cost of the department here was £1,500, the saving of a single ship would counterbalance that.

Mr. SHEEHAN quite agreed with what had fallen from the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Hunter) with regard to the Secretary of Customs, and should support the vote for the Weather Department. The late Commissioner of Customs did some useful things during his term of office, and the establishment of this department and of the training ship were amongst them. The natural outlet for a large proportion of the youthful population of this colony ought to be the seafaring service, and every effort ought to be made to maintain the efficiency of the training ship, with the object of converting the city Arabs into useful members of society.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said he did not see the use of keeping up the Weather Department, because it all depended upon chances and probabilities.

Mr. READER WOOD said that if that was the case the department was very dear at £1,520 a year. If the Weather Office were properly conducted it would not depend on chances and probabilities, but on practical experiments. As far as he was aware, the officers in charge of the Weather Department here were not able to forecast—they could tell what the weather was yesterday, but they could not tell what it would be to-morrow. The honorable member for Port Chalmers stated that 75 per cent. of the predictions proved correct. But what of that? The Commissioner of Customs defended the department of the Secretary of Customs, but he did so because that office did his work—in fact all matters were referred to him. The House was told that the Secretary of Customs had done such and such things for the colony; and yet only a short time previously he was told that the late Prime Minister had done the very same things, and probably to-morrow they would be told that somebody else had done them. A few months ago three Civil servants were sent round the colony to report upon it, and when he (Mr. Wood) came to Wellington he expected to see a report which it would be a pleasure and a delight for him to read; but what did the Premier, who sent those gentlemen round, say of their report? He as good as said that they were three big fools, and that the report they sent in was useless and not worth the paper it was written on. When any member proposed a reduction in the salaries of the Civil servants, he was told that they were the ablest men in the world. In the lobbies Ministers said, when they were asked why they did not get their Under Secretaries to do certain work, that the Under Secretaries were of no use; but inside the House Ministers said they could not be done without. Why did not Ministers come down and tell the House that, to keep up their departments and pay the salaries of their officers, they had to issue Treasury bills? Then honorable gentlemen could see what salaries they were paying, and what services were rendered by those who were drawing the salaries. They would not be doing their duty if they allowed a single item of £500 to pass unless it was absolutely necessary. If the honorable gentleman had come down that night, and, while making his Financial Statement, had said that he would reduce every salary of over £200 a year by one-third, he would have supported him. If the officials did not like this, they could have gone. The Government should have done as the Duke of Wellington once did under similar circumstances. He reduced the salaries of the Civil servants, and when he was told they would leave the Government service, he threatened to fill their places with pay-sergeants; but not one of them did leave. The maudlin sentimentality and bad finance which they heard that night was not only a disgrace to the honorable gentleman who uttered it, but a greater disgrace to the honorable gentlemen who heard it, and who were bound to support it.

Mr. MOORHOUSE had no doubt that, if the honorable gentleman who had last spoken were in office, he would be found standing by such estimates as were necessary for carrying on the business of the country. He could not conceive how the honorable member for Waitemata had got the idea that the office of Secretary of Customs was an unnecessary one. He understood that it was the intention of the honorable members for Parnell and Waitemata to move that this vote be struck out, but he could not see how that could be done. It would really be deplorable if there was not an able man like Mr. Seed to carry on the business of the department. During the last twenty years he had heard the honorable member for Parnell express opinions very different from each other. The country could not get on without a Secretary of Customs; and it was a matter for congratulation that such an able officer as the present Secretary filled the office. He did not believe in this cheap cry, this roaring out against the Civil Service, which was adopted in such a barefaced and inconsiderate manner by public men who had never done anything but make mischief in the country. The Civil Service was composed of men of refinement of mind and manner, and of integrity and industry, and, considering the class they represented socially, the wages they received was not at all excessive. How would the honorable member for Parnell, whose abilities would probably entitle him to be rated as a clerk at £250 a year, with his refinement, his excellent taste, and his tendency for good society, manage to conduct his household and bring up his family on £5 a week? Every Civil servant ought to be a gentleman, from the lowest clerk in the service to the Premier. The Civil Service ought not to be put into the degrading position of being looked upon by all uneducated people in the colony as a helpless lot of paltry dependents upon the charity of the nation. They ought to be regarded in their true light—as the sergeants of the army, as the backbone of the public service; and they ought to be paid in proportion to their deserts.

Mr. SWANSON said one would think, from the Civil servants being described as unfortunate and being commiserated, that they were pressed into the service instead of the contrary being the case. Whenever there was a vacancy in the service, there was a great struggle of applicants; and if a Civil servant wanted money, the inducement he offered was that he had a Government situation. With regard to the item under consideration, he knew nothing of the gentleman at the head of the Weather Department; but his opinion was that the situation was made for somebody who had got friends to make the place for him. It was absurd to send weather indications to windward, and the only good that could be done was to send them to leeward. He hoped the return of the working of the system would be made by the department. Let the office make out a return of its prophecies, and people outside say if the weather had justified them. He was convinced there was no necessity for this officer, and that the gentleman who gave the clerical assistance performed all the real work of the department.

Mr. REYNOLDS said the Government did not proceed with this department without making full inquiries. On the 5th July, 1875, he sent a circular to the different stations requesting reports to be furnished as to the accuracy or otherwise of the warnings, and had received, on the whole, satisfactory answers. (The honorable gentleman read the letters referred to.) These reports showed that the Government had not extended the expense of this department without first ascertaining from the harbour-masters that the storm warnings had been advantageous. Experience had proved that most of the warnings were correct; and if the department were abolished, it would cause very great dissatisfaction to persons interested in shipping, especially in regard to open roadsteads. The department had only been in existence two years, and the reports he had read were a year old. He had not been able to look up the reports for this year; the objections raised came upon him quite unexpectedly.

Mr. STOUT never liked to attack any individual officer, because they were not present to defend themselves, and, if an officer was said to have acted wrongfully, he ought, under the Civil Service Act, to have an opportunity of obtaining an inquiry into his conduct. That was a very different thing from a question as to the salary of an officer for the use of a department. Probably the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Moorhouse), as an old Civil servant, felt a sort of esprit de corps, and was thereby induced to defend the service. As to the weather reports, he might say he had spoken to several nautical men who knew the coast well, and they said that having the state of the weather at each port telegraphed every morning was of great service, because from that they could forecast for themselves what the weather would be. They could do that better than any gentleman sitting in Wellington, simply summing up the results from other places and sending out opinions which often were of no value at all. It appeared to him that if a strong northerly wind was blowing at Napier it would soon be felt at Wellington; and when a south-west gale was reported from the Bluff, it might be assumed that it would soon reach Dunedin, and travel along the coast. If the harbour-masters, and perhaps telegraphists where there were no harbour-masters, were simply to telegraph the state of the barometer along with the direction and strength of the wind every morning, every shipmaster who had been any time upon the coast of New Zealand could tell what the weather was likely to be as well as a captain sitting in any port in the colony. The department was utterly useless. He would move that the amount be reduced by one-half, and that would allow the Government time to wind-up the department. The harbour-master in Wellington could do all that the department did now, and it was not necessary to have an officer in charge, with a clerk. He found that the reprinted estimates showed increases and not decreases; and what was wanted was a reduction of officers rather than a reduction of salaries. Really, the only way to get at a reduction in the Government expenditure was to limit the functions of the Government, and allow the people to do things for themselves without going to the Government.

Major ATKINSON trusted that the item would not be reduced. The department afforded the means of collecting very useful information. If only 50 per cent. of the warnings were correct, the money was well spent, in order to ascertain the laws that governed the winds in this colony. There was no doubt that this, in many instances, could only be learned by the study of years, and the sooner the work was commenced the sooner would the knowledge be obtained. He was much struck by a circumstance which lately occurred showing the necessity for this department: An immigrant ship, bound for Taranaki, ought to have landed her immigrants there, but the captain came on to Wellington. When approaching Taranaki he was in the midst of what was almost a hurricane, but it was calm at Taranaki. Since then it had been ascertained that many storms travelled along that coast in a most extraordinary manner, making strange curves. The Committee could not do better than continue a department such as it was known had led to very great results in the old country. In America, weather reports were published every morning in many of the papers, and they afforded an immense advantage to agriculturists as well as to nautical men.

Mr. MONTGOMERY understood that the sum of £450 was for instruments that had been ordered. That expenditure would not be incurred again, and the total annual cost would only be about £1,000. If the department resulted in the saving of but one little vessel it would be worth far more than its cost. He trusted the vote would not be struck out.

Mr. W. WOOD said there was no doubt a very important principle involved in this question. He desired to know whether every effort had been used, by carefully studying the reports and recording the results, to ascertain the laws that ruled the storms in the colony. If that had been done, the money had been well expended.

Mr. BARFF was informed that some representation had been made to the Government regarding the erection of a lighthouse at Hokitika. He would like to know whether the Commissioner of Customs would lay the protest received upon the table, or allow himself and his colleague to see it. He was convinced that the so-called protest was a tissue of misstatements, made probably on the authority of one or two interested individuals.

Mr. ROWE said the statement of the Commissioner of Customs was the strongest argument that any member could use in favour of the reduction of the estimates. He stated that the Secretary of Customs had so organized his department, and so carried out the work in connection with it, that, although the revenue had considerably increased, he was able to do the work with a less amount of labour. The impression throughout the country was that all the departments of the Government might be so organized, and that reductions should take place with regard to them. It was altogether out of place for the honorable member for Christchurch to discuss the question of the Civil Service in connection with this vote. There was no disposition to reduce the salaries of the Civil servants, or to make any attack upon them. There was an impression that, if one-third of the Civil servants were dispensed with, the work could be conducted as efficiently and as well as at present. He believed the Government were of the same opinion. A number of members had come to this House determined to reduce the cost of the Civil Service. It was easy to say that Ministers were responsible; but honorable members were also responsible. The Civil Service had been for years past costing a great deal more than it ought to do; and there was a necessity for cutting off one-third of them. The cost of the Civil Service might be reduced at least £20,000.

Mr. KENNEDY thought the remarks made by the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Barff) with reference to the Hokitika lighthouse might have some reference to the objection he had made to the erection of the lighthouse. He understood that lighthouses were usually erected at the instance of master mariners, who reported the necessity for erecting them. He was not aware that any application had been made for the erection of a lighthouse in that part of the country. There was no necessity for it for the port of Greymouth; and if erected, the shipping resorting to that port would be taxed for the light. He did not express his own opinion only, but the opinion of more than a dozen master mariners trading to the West Coast, that the lighthouse was altogether unnecessary. However, his objection to the erection of the lighthouse in question was on behalf of the shipping of the port of Greymouth, with which he was connected; and he was reliably informed that the erection of such a light, instead of being a benefit to shipping, would be positively injurious; for lighthouses being usually erected on headlands, and the proposed site being rather a bight, there was therefore some danger that shipmasters approaching the shore might not be able to get off again.

Mr. STOUT observed an item, "Lighthouse tender 'Stella,' working expenses, £2,000." He did not observe any vote taken for the "Hinemoa" steamer.

Mr. G. McLEAN said the item was included in the item "Miscellaneous." The "Stella" steamer was to be used in visiting the various lighthouses, and keeping them furnished with supplies.

Mr. STOUT did not know whether the Commissioner of Customs had received the report of the Harbour-master at Otago with regard to lighthouses. That officer advocated the plan of having small inexpensive lights, such as were at Oamaru, along the coasts. They would be suitable for shipping, and would be comparatively inexpensive. If this plan were adopted, there would be a saving to the colony of several thousands a year.

Mr. REYNOLDS did not think any one would grudge the cost of the lighthouse tender. The steamer would be continually employed for the next two or three years.

Mr. MACFARLANE said that the lighthouse charges were exorbitant. The charges in the Gulf of Hauraki were so exorbitant that they would have the effect of preventing steamers from trading there. The telegraphing could be more usefully done by the harbour-masters, and without any cost to the country. He did not think the department was at all wanted.

Mr. BARFF hoped the Commissioner of Customs would lay on the table that special protest. As representative of a constituency which was largely interested in the matter, he would like to know why the Government had broken faith with the district in regard to erecting a lighthouse at Hokitika.

Mr. G. McLEAN said the Government had not broken faith in the matter. They did not say they would not erect the lighthouse, but, after the protest which had been made to them, they must make some inquiries into the subject.

Question put, "That the item 'Expenses of weather reports and storm signals, £1,517,' be reduced by £758 10s.;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Mr. SHEEHAN would ask the Commissioner of Customs to inform the Committee, in round numbers, of the amount of Customs revenue for the last quarter. He was aware that the time was very short since the quarter terminated; but still he thought the honorable gentleman might be able to give some approximate information which would be very useful, especially in passing those items which related to the Customs Department.

Mr. MANDERS also thought it very desirable that such information should be given; and, as there was a Secretary of Customs, there would no doubt be no difficulty in doing so. As there had been some discussion in respect to the strength of the Civil Service, and also in reference to the sums of money paid to the members of that service, he might say that he did not think the Committee should make any particular reductions.

If once a discussion arose as to whether this secretary or clerk, or other officer should have his salary reduced, a great deal of time would be wasted without any good result. Of course it would be quite correct to take that course; but it would be better to refer the estimates back to the Government, and tell them that there must be a reduction in the number of the Civil servants, and also in all salaries over £200 a year. He would like to see that course taken, especially after the Financial Statement which they had just heard. He was perfectly prepared to vote, and he thought a majority of the House would vote, that reductions should be made in the direction he indicated. He believed himself in having well-paid Civil servants, but he thought the Government were the proper people to deal with the matter. A resolution should be passed saying there must be a reduction, and then let the Government get the best servants they could select.

Mr. REES thought something should be done in the direction of reducing the whole of the estimates. He noticed by the Financial Statement that the whole of the Land Fund would be swallowed up, the whole of the Consolidated Revenue, and then the colony would be £60,000 to the bad at the end of the year. Some of the estimated receipts could never be realized. For instance, the honorable gentleman had put down £46,000 as "Incidental Receipts"—a sum which could never be realized. What the Government ought to consider, was whether they could not make some considerable reduction on the estimates generally; because he was convinced that even the £150,000 worth of Treasury bills would not be sufficient to make both ends meet. He would like to know when this Treasury-bills system was going to end. They would have to be paid for some time, and really, if the system were continued, the country would be in a perilous position in the course of a year or two. He would suggest that all salaries over £300 might be cut down, and a beginning made with Ministers themselves. The salaries of members of the Government should be reduced to what they were two or three years ago, and that principle should be applied to all the highly-paid officials rather than to the poorly-paid ones. He hoped the Government would report progress, and see whether they could not make some sweeping reductions in the manner suggested.

Major ATKINSON agreed that it was the duty of the Government to make the ordinary income cover the ordinary expenditure. He could not conceal that the present circumstances of the country were extraordinary; but they could not go suddenly from one extreme to the other without doing great injury to the public service and to a large number of honest men. He would be glad to do it, if it were possible without doing injustice to individuals. The Government were fully alive, as the honorable gentleman had pointed out, to the necessity of making both ends meet.

Mr. SWANSON was at a loss to understand what injury would be done by dispensing with the services of any officials who were not required. The fact of their being honest had nothing to do with that. As to making reductions, the Ministry could set a very good example by reducing their own salaries first. That was the course adopted by the Superintendent and Executive of Auckland when the necessity arose. Then there was another means of retrenchment. The Ministerial residences should be sold, and whatever was considered as sufficient for house rent, say £150 or £200, allowed to each Minister. If a Minister wanted to go in for "hospitality," a much perverted term, let him do it at his own expense. This would be a very good plan of assisting to make both ends meet.

Sir G. GREY said the Premier had just made the most extraordinary admission he had ever heard. He told the House that the estimates could be largely reduced, and that the only reason he did not do so was the possibility of doing injustice to honest men. The two things were absolutely incompatible. However, he should pass that by, and move that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again, because it was very unusual to make a financial statement and press on the estimates on the same evening. There was no doubt in his mind that the estimates could be reduced by at least £100,000 instead of £34,000, as proposed by these new estimates. The principal executive officer of New Zealand should be reduced to the same sum as that paid to the second officer of the Government of the United States, namely, £3,000. The Premier should not receive more than £1,000 or £1,200, and the other Ministers would be well paid if they got £1,000. Men capable of filling the office could be got for £800 a year at the present moment; but they would be bound to make a sacrifice, which men who loved their country should make under the circumstances. It was only on the previous day that he had heard that the gardeners at the Ministerial residences were paid the same as those at the Governor's residence. Such a thing elsewhere was entirely unknown; and if these things were to be permitted, the expenses of the country might be enormously increased. He intended to bring in a Bill for the express purpose of altering the Bill which fixed the salaries of the Governor and the Ministers. He thought that the Government ought to agree to report progress, and allow honorable members an opportunity of considering the Financial Statement which had been made, and of discussing it on some future day, and deciding how the reductions were to be carried out. An appeal to do this had been made to the Government by the honorable member for Akaroa, but they had treated it with contempt. Honorable members had understood that the statement was to be made on Friday, and that they were to have an opportunity of considering it on Saturday and discussing it on Monday. By extraordinary adroitness they got out of making the statement on Friday, and by equal adroitness they got out of making it until the evening sitting that day, their object being to deprive honorable members of the opportunity of considering it during the adjournment. Yet they did all this in the most innocent manner. He felt that, in justice to honorable members, they should have till next day to consider the Financial Statement. He would therefore move, That progress be reported, and leave asked to sit again.

Mr. REYNOLDS said he would have no objection to progress being reported after the item under consideration was passed.

Major ATKINSON hoped the Committee would pass this vote. If this were done, he would be willing to support the motion for reporting progress.

Mr. MONTGOMERY had no objection to the passing of this item; but he hoped nothing more would be proceeded with until honorable members had had an opportunity of examining the financial position of the country.

Motion for reporting progress negatived.

Item, £31,570 18s. 9d., agreed to.

Progress reported, and leave given to sit again.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS BILL.

Major ATKINSON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to make financial arrangements to give effect to the Abolition of Provinces Act. There were several matters in it which would no doubt be keenly discussed; but as they had all been raised in the Financial Statement, and as they were really matters of finance, he thought he would be consulting the wishes of the House by not entering upon them on the present occasion. They were sufficiently explained in the Bill and in Ministerial statements. Therefore it seemed to him more convenient that they should take the whole debate on all these financial statements at one time; and he would move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MURRAY thought the whole finance of the country depended upon this Bill, and that the House should have received a fuller explanation than the Premier had given.

Mr. ANDREW agreed cordially with the Government that a Bill of this sort was necessary, but dissented from some of the clauses of the Bill.

Mr. SHEEHAN understood that the proposal of the Premier was to take the second reading of the Bill as a formal matter, and that honorable members would have an opportunity of debating it next day on the question for going into Committee of Supply, when the general financial discussion was to come on. He saw no objection to that course, and hoped the House would agree to it.

Bill read a second time.

NEW ZEALAND LOAN BILL.

Major ATKINSON said this was a Bill to give effect to a part of the Abolition policy; but in this case, also, he believed it to be the wish of the House that he should not go fully into the question. The Bill, as it stood, provided for the borrowing of two millions; but, as the House was aware, the Government proposed to reduce that amount to one million. This seemed to him to be a question that had better be discussed, with the other financial matters, on going into Committee of Supply. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. REID was sorry to hear the member say it was the intention of the Government to ask only for one million, as he thought it would be far better that they should take to raise two millions. The House knew; well that one million could not overtake the required to be completed, and the other which would be falling due. Even if it not be necessary to exercise the power to the two millions, it would be better that should be taken to raise them. It would affect the credit of the colony in the market, and the Government would be in position to raise two millions, all of which would be required. He hoped, when the Bill was in Committee, the Premier would see his way to exercise the power to two millions.

Mr. REYNOLDS quite agreed with the honorable member. He believed it was a mistake to limit the amount to be borrowed to one million. It would have been far better to have raised two millions, and then, if the Government did require the money, they need not raise it. It must be apparent, however, that a large sum could be raised on more favourable terms than small ones.

Mr. ROLLESTON hoped the days of general borrowing were going by, and that when the Government came down with borrowing proposals they would, as had been indicated by the Premier that night, specify the objects to which the money was to be applied, and in this manner give the lender an assurance that its expenditure would be reproductive. He thought they had had quite enough of this system of general borrowing, and stating afterwards that it was to be expended upon objects which had not been predetermined, and the prudence of which had not been previously discussed by the House. He hoped the Government would adhere to their proposal of reducing the borrowing power at any rate on the present occasion. He thought there was a good deal to be said in favour of putting the larger sum in the market, if it were necessary, at one time, and not to be going with dribbles into the market. But he believed the lender at Home would accept the present proceeding as an instalment of a more prudent state of finance than had yet obtained in the colony.

Mr. STEVENS thought the Government were acting very wisely in confining the authority they proposed to take from the House to one million, instead of placing it at two millions. He thought so, because he was aware that the state of the colony's indebtedness, whether it exercised the larger or smaller power of borrowing, would be known in London as well as it was here. Under those circumstances, it appeared to him much better to limit the borrowing to one million. He thought it must be obvious that no such opportunity as that referred to by the honorable member for Taieri, of raising money on such exceedingly favourable terms as would justify the borrowing of the larger sum, was likely to occur. The rate of money in London for some time past had been exceptionally low, but the borrowing operations of the colony had not been correspondingly favourable; and it must be admitted on all hands that the floating of the last loan was such as they had no right to expect again, if they were to go suddenly into the market with any larger sum. For his part, he hailed with very great satisfaction the change of plan on the part of the Government, and he hoped it would receive the support of the House.

Mr. MONTGOMERY thought the change from the original intention with regard to this loan was a very prudent and proper one. He had listened to what the honorable member for Avon said about the specific objects for which the loan was to be appropriated being stated. That, no doubt, could be brought down at a future time. He wished to throw out a suggestion, and if it were not adopted by the Government he would move a resolution to the effect, that a portion of this money should be used for the erection of school buildings in certain portions of the colony where they were required. He believed that school buildings were very much wanted in the Province of Auckland; and he thought there was no better way in which public money could be expended than in providing the necessary buildings in which to give education to the rising generation, and he hoped that would be one of the objects to which this loan would be devoted. From what he could gather from honorable members from Auckland, and also from Westland, he did not think that £50,000 would be too much to spend on the erection of school buildings in those places. That was altogether apart from the maintenance of schools. He understood that in some of the school-houses in Auckland the children were penned up more like sheep in a fold than the pupils of an educational establishment. If the finances of the country could be shown to be in a sound condition, the people in London would be ready to advance any reasonable amount that might be required; but at present he ventured to say that two millions would be difficult to raise; and if they went into the market with such a loan, it would materially affect the credit of the colony. He had no objection to the second reading of the Bill, and would support it; but he wished to see the various objects and the exact amounts brought down by the Government before it was passed through.

Bill read a second time.

The House adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 10th October, 1876.

First Readings—Third Reading—Waimea Water-race—"Mataau"—Government Representatives in the Council—Piako Swamp—State Forests Bill—Ohinemuri Agricultural Leases Bill—Oamaru Tramways Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

The Wellington Debts Bill, the Attorney-General's Bill.

THIRD READING.

The Napier Athenaeum Bill.

WAIMEA WATER-RACE.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, Whether, in view of the rapidly-increasing population at Kumara, the fact that the supply of water for that gold field is very limited in extent, and that the principal source of supply has been reserved by the Government for the Waimea Water-race, the Government will take immediate steps for the completion of the head works of such race, so as to admit of the full quantity of water the race has been constructed for, and is capable of carrying, being brought in for the above purposes? He desired merely to say that, by the last official returns he had received from that district, he found there was a population of something like 4,000 miners now upon this new gold field. One of the great requirements of this gold field was a proper supply of water, and the sources of supply were very limited indeed. One of the principal sources of supply was that which was supposed to fill the Waimea Water-race, upon which a large sum had been expended, but the head works of which had not been completed. So long as the Government reserved the water from this source, so long would any private person be prevented from making use of it. It seemed to him to be a very undesirable thing that, after spending £90,000 on the water-race, the proper use of it should be prevented from the want of head works, more especially as this large supply of water was now required for the new gold field. At the present moment, the quantity of water coming down the Waimea Water-race was fifteen or twenty heads, whereas its full capacity was forty to sixty heads. He therefore desired to ask the Government whether they would be prepared to carry out this scheme to completion, without which the race would be useless to the extent of two-thirds. It was proposed that these works should be handed over to the county, but he would point out that to hand over to the county the completion of such an important work, which formed part of the colonial system of public works, would have the effect of absorbing the whole revenue of the county. He therefore trusted the Government would be able to give an assurance that they would not leave an important work like this in an incomplete state when it was so much required on the gold fields.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that, since this matter had been brought under the notice of the Government by his honorable friend, careful consideration had been given to the subject; and it had been determined, in view of the new circumstances which had arisen in the neighbourhood of this water-race, and of the importance of providing water for the new gold field, to ask for authority to complete the head works. That would be done with the understanding that if a large expenditure—as was certain—would be involved in the completion of those works, the water-race itself should be retained in the hands of the General Government; and that it should not, for the present at least, be handed over to the county, as other works of the same kind were proposed to be handed over.

"MATAU."

The Hon. Captain FRASER asked the Government, Whether there is any truth in the report, as stated in the New Zealand Times of the 9th instant, that great blame is attached to the Wellington Customs authorities for permitting the s.s. "Matau" to leave port with too many passengers, and lumbered with deck cargo?

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said he had not been able to refer to the particular article in the Times to which this question referred, in order to ascertain by whom this great blame was attached to the authorities of the Wellington Customs. His honorable friend had not said by whom the blame had been cast on the authorities. He held in his hands a memorandum by the Secretary of Customs, which he would read to the Council. It was as follows:—

"The agents of the 'Matau,' desirous of meeting the demand for passages to the new rush at the Kumara, on the West Coast, cleared out the fore-hold of that vessel, and covered the hatch-way with a booby hatch with flaps such as are used on board of immigrant ships; the steerage accommodation having been thus extended, the 'Matau' was allowed to carry thirty passengers in addition to the number on her certificate, but not more than would be allowed under the Proclamation of the 16th May, 1862, regulating the carriage of passengers between New Zealand and Australia. Her deck cargo consisted of twenty cases of kerosene and three iron tanks, one of which was filled with water for the use of the extra passengers."

That was all the deck cargo, and it was not a very formidable one under the circumstances.

GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES IN THE COUNCIL.

* The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that, in view of the discussions they had had on the subject, it was hardly necessary to say much more upon the obvious necessity for having a better representation of the Government in that Council. But he might observe that, with seven Ministers in this country—which was an unreasonable number as compared with the mother country—the smallest consideration to that Council would be that the Government should be represented, not by one, but by at least three. In England there were six members of the Cabinet in the House of Lords and six in the House of Commons. It was true that in the House of Commons there were Under Secretaries; but the Government was represented by 2 per cent. of the House of Commons, while here it was represented by 7½ per cent., and in that Council they had but one member of the Cabinet. He desired, at the same time to say that no one member could have better discharged the duties of two or three than the honorable gentleman who had so long led the debates in that Chamber. But as they appeared to be indorsing the system of such large Cabinets, he thought it was very unduly should separate without placing on belief that they should have a large of Cabinet Ministers in the Upper that they should not throw on one man a burden as he had had to support for sessions past. He would not be content that on record, but hoped the Government give a distinct assurance that in another they would find a second member of the Council. It was to be regretted some years it had been the practice to have a new member to the Council as a when a new Government came into office. That could have but one effect, and that was to discourage honorable gentlemen in the Council from preparing themselves for taking part in the government of the country, and then to take little or no part in the general parties of the country. But that was a wide question, and it had nothing particular to do with his object in moving the motion in his name. The greatest reason, he thought, was that the work was too much for any one to do. A second reason was that it was unfair that they should have so large a Cabinet out greater representation being secured to that branch of the Legislature. He hoped the honorable gentleman representing the Government would inform them that it was the intention of the Government to appoint another member of the Government in the Council, or appoint another member to the Council, who would be in the Cabinet, to represent them in future sessions. He did not wish it to be understood that he expected immediate action to follow his motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That it is desirable that the Government of the colony should be represented in this Council by at least two responsible Ministers."—(Hon. Colonel Whitmore.)

The Hon. Captain FRASER intended to support the motion for two reasons—firstly, for a political reason, and, secondly, for a humane reason. He supported it for a political reason, because it would give greater scope to the power of debate in the Council; and he supported it for a humane reason, because there was great talking power in the Council, and it was not proper to subject one man to that power. There should be two honorable gentlemen on the Government benches—one to be on duty while the other slept.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said there was no one who could be more painfully conscious than he was himself of the necessity which existed for additional Ministerial assistance in the Council. He need hardly remind honorable gentlemen that it was not very long since the disposition of the Government to afford this additional assistance was evinced. Honorable gentleman would understand that, for the remainder of this session, it would be impossible to make arrangements for having another Minister in the Council; but he ventured to express a hope that, before another session commenced, or when it did commence, the Government would be represented in the Council by two members. He would not discuss the question with the honorable gentleman whether or not there was an unreasonable number of Ministers at present. All he would say was, that from his personal knowledge Ministers were not idle, and that in future there was a prospect of so large an addition of official work being imposed on the several departments that the probability was there would rather be a necessity for an increase than a reduction in the number of Ministers.

* The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in reply wished to allude to the remark of the Colonial Secretary that not long ago there was a disposition shown to fall in with the views of the Council. The only disposition of that kind which had been shown was when nine Ministers were appointed, and it was arranged that the Council might have two. He thought that was far from showing a disposition to pay a compliment to the Council. It was a very small bait to induce them not to complain of the very great liberty which was taken with the Constitution. He could see no disposition to show the least courtesy to the Council in the action taken on that occasion. There was some such disposition shown when the Hon. Mr. Hall was asked, at a very great sacrifice to himself, to act for the Government. He placed himself in a very anomalous and disagreeable position for the Government, and in doing so he had placed the Council under some obligation. But that was a personal obligation which members owed to him, and not to the Government. With reference to the honorable gentleman's statement that Ministers were not idle, he granted that the honorable gentleman was not idle; but he would ask, how many Ministers remained in Wellington when they were not obliged to be present to attend to their duties in Parliament? He thought that if the work could go on in the absence of Ministers, it was evident that there were too many of them. He thought Ministers ought to be employed in supervising business in both Chambers of the Legislature. If in England it was necessary to have half the Cabinet in the House of Lords, he did not see why there should not be more Ministers in the Council.

Motion agreed to.

PIAKO SWAMP.

The adjourned debate was resumed on the question, That the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin have leave to lay upon the table of the Council a plan showing the extent, figure, and position of the Waikato-Piako Swamp grant of 87,000 acres.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL was sorry the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin was not in his place, as he (Mr. Hall) was ready to give the Council the information for which the debate was adjourned. In compliance with the suggestion which was made when this subject was last under discussion, the map had been referred to the Survey Office, for the purpose of its being identified, and to ascertain its correctness or otherwise. He held in his hand a memorandum from the draftsman in the Survey Office on the subject, which, with the permission of the Council, he would read, and then he would make no objection to the map being laid on the table. The map was stated to be a plan showing the extent, figure, and position of the Waikato-Piako Swamp grant of 87,000 acres. The memorandum was as follows:—

"The attached map is a portion of sheet No. 8 of the lithograph of Mr. Heale's map, showing the triangulation conducted by him in the Provinces of Auckland and Hawke's Bay.

"The coloured matter on this map does not show the figure or extent of the Waikato-Piako Swamp grant; nor are the correct boundaries of the 86,502 acres granted to the New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency Company shown in any manner upon it.

"GEO. FANNIN,

"Draftsman, Crown Lands Office."

Perhaps the most convenient course would be for him to lay the memorandum on the table, that it might be seen with the map itself, so as to prevent any misunderstanding.

* The Hon. Mr. STOKES, after the explanation that had been offered by the Hon. Mr. Hall, ventured to think it would not be of the slightest use to lay the map on the table, inasmuch as it contained no information whatever in reference to the subject in question—the Piako Swamp. It appeared to be an anonymous and incorrect map, and would only encumber the table if it was laid upon it, without giving any information.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE thought that when they consented to documents being laid on the table of the Council there ought to be some distinct reason for the action they adopted—some distinct benefit to be derived from adopting such a course of procedure. He did not see that any benefit whatever would arise in this case. On the contrary, their records would be unduly lumbered; and unless they got some further information from the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin, he would be inclined to vote against the motion. He might likewise be allowed to say they should be extremely careful how they extended this practice, into which they were gradually drifting, of permitting honorable members to lay upon the table of the Council documents of various characters. It was well known that no evil could arise in this case, although no good could result; but he could well understand that cases might arise in which much evil might result from the adoption of this course, and he thought it would be well for them, in future, carefully to guard this privilege, and not throw it indiscriminately open, unless there were good reasons to lead them to believe it was desirable that documents should be laid on the table of the Council by private members.

Motion negatived.

STATE FORESTS BILL.

* The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he had been asked by the honorable gentleman who introduced it in another place to take charge of it in the Council. He thought, however, there was very little to be said on this subject. The Forests Act, he believed, was a little in advance of the age, and was one of those useful measures which should demand their attention when the country was fully settled, and when a very great necessity arose to turn every possible item to account. It could not be said at the present moment that that time had arrived; and, on the other hand, what had arrived was a great difficulty to make both ends meet in this country. It was admitted by the Government that there would be a certain amount of deficit this year, which must be covered by Treasury bills. Let them hope it would be very small. He felt confident every effort would be made to keep down expenditure as much as possible. But, at all events, at a time when they were avowedly not at all in a position to launch out into improvements which might or might not be hereafter productive, they should reduce expenditure on tentative undertakings as much as possible. For that reason he hoped the Council would agree to read this Bill a second time, and practically to defer until a future time, when the colony would be in a better position to undertake it, a scheme which was ingenious, and possibly promising, but which they were not in a position to take in hand. There were some clauses in the Act which it might be desirable to enact in some other Bills, and containing provisions which he would be sorry to see entirely wiped out. But that was a matter which devolved upon the Government, and which it was advisable should rest with them. In the meantime, the Council would be doing good by wiping this Act off the Statutes. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

* The Hon. Colonel BRETT would oppose the Bill, as he considered it would be placing the Government in a very false and unenviable position. It was well known that the Forests Act was introduced two years ago, and met with the approval of both Houses of Parliament. The Government then took action in the matter, and communicated with the Government in India, and obtained its sanction to an engagement with one of its most intelligent and able men in the particular department of State forests. This gentleman—Captain Campbell Walker—came to New Zealand on the understanding that he was to remain here at least one year, at a salary of £800, and that at the expiration of that time any further engagement was to be optional with both parties. He believed that was the agreement made. There had been a long correspondence on the subject between the late Premier and the Indian Government, and he thought it would be an act of the greatest discourtesy, and also a breach of faith, to break the contract which had been entered into. What would the Indian Government or any other Government say to be treated in that way? Captain Walker had studied this particular subject of forest-planting and conservation for many years. He had had a great deal of experience in France and Germany, and had been all through the forests of India, which extended all along the west coast, and in Burmah; and his experience had been so great that the colony would derive the greatest advantage from it. But, just as Captain Walker was about to make his report, there was this proposal to summarily dispense with his services. If this officer were discharged before he furnished his report, the £800 would simply go away, and the colony would derive from it whatever. On the other services of Captain Walker were another year, they would have a value which would be worthy their consideration. No doubt he was of the greatest advantage to the colony. They were all aware that the New Zealand forests were being cut down in a most lavish and wilful manner, and this was permitted to continue, in the time there would be no forests at all. In knowledge, this gentleman had almost valuable information to the Government. He had taken the greatest pains to draw out regulations for the establishment of State forests. He was now travelling in the North collecting information, and in a short time would visit the South, and he (Colonel Brett) hoped that during Captain Walker's visit the colony he would be able to give them all the large towns, and afford a great valuable information which would be of great advantage hereafter. He spoke of personal acquaintance with this gentleman, who was an officer in his own regiment, in which he was regarded with great respect and esteem, and looked upon as a very smart and intelligent man. There had been an attempt in this town to stir up a feeling against Captain Walker on the part of a most scurrilous paper, which pretended to be an organ of the voice of the inhabitants of Wellington. He looked down with disdain upon penny-a-liners of the newspapers of Wellington. They were a disgrace to the whole colony. No man should be allowed to give vent to their unmanly and cowardly feelings towards a gentleman who was respected and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. The large body of the members of the Parliament who he was sorry to say, caused this Bill to be passed in another place; and he said that when the members got a gentleman to serve them, they ought to treat him as a gentleman. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that afternoon, three months.

The Hon. the SPEAKER suggested that it was not desirable to connect the conduct of members of the House of Representatives in a courteous manner with anything which might come before the Council in debate.

* The Hon. Captain FRASER hoped he would not be offending in that way if he said he believed this matter was brought forward in consequence of Captain Campbell Walker having twisted his moustaches a particular way. There was no more valid reason for this Bill than that certain people did not like the manner in which the Conservator of Forests twisted his moustaches. If he had twisted them any other way, probably the Council would never have heard anything about this measure. He had seen a great deal of Captain Walker during the short time he was in Otago—much more than he had seen of him since, because his (Captain Walker's) time had been so much occupied since he had been in Wellington. He was sure they could not have got a better Curator of Forests than Captain

Walker if they had searched throughout the whole world. He was a man very well known indeed, and had published a great number of works. He (Captain Fraser) took him to the Botanical Gardens in Dunedin, and told him he would be very much shocked at what he saw there. He knew that for several years the Curator of the Gardens had been kept there at great expense, and had made a complete mess of it. Captain Walker seemed very much shocked at what he saw there, and particularly with the Coniferae, which had cost a great deal of money. The plants, which had for a long time past been distributed, had been refused by the people in the country. Unlike other colonies, they did not keep their plants for special purposes, such as for domains and for police stations, but offered them to farmers and any one who liked to take them. In consequence, however, of the manner in which the plants had been treated in infancy, the people rejected them because they would not grow. Before taking Captain Walker to the Gardens, he had, a few days previously, told the Curator of his intention; and consequently he transplanted, for the first time in his life, some of the Coniferae. They found the plants with the roots, about two feet long, curled up in the shape of the letter S. That was the manner in which the planting had been conducted at the Dunedin Botanical Gardens. As to this Bill, he thought there was a great deal in the original Act which should be retained. He had seen in his part of the country splendid forests purposely destroyed to make way for sheep. For no better reason than to make a path for sheep, he had seen magnificent forests destroyed—utterly destroying at the same time the beauty of the country. He had seen that upon the Hawea. As soon as the people who had a saw-mill there found they could make better wages elsewhere, and as soon as they left, the whole forest by accident—he would not say what was the cause—caught fire, and property to the value of thousands of pounds was destroyed. He asked the Superintendent to appoint his (Captain Fraser's) son as ranger or curator, or whatever he might please to call it, so as to protect the forest; but that was not done. In the same way the forests had been destroyed all over Otago. He thought they would be doing a very unwise act if they passed this Bill, which had been brought in for no better reason than that Captain Walker twisted his moustaches in a certain way.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that one of the attributes of the Council, and amongst its very highest, in his opinion, was its power of checking hasty legislation; and no more striking instance of hasty and unconsidered legislation could be presented to the Council than the Bill which had now been proposed by his honorable and gallant friend for its second reading. It was two years only since, after long consideration in both Houses of the Assembly, the Forests Act was passed. It was not possible for the Government to take any action under that Act sooner than the beginning of the present year, when it succeeded in obtaining for a year the services of a gentleman admitted on all hands, he believed, to be the most capable of giving information and instruction on the subject of forestry whose services it was possible to obtain. It was only within a very few months that he had been able to apply himself to the duties which he undertook, and at least it might be urged that, before proceeding to declare that the New Zealand Forests Act should be repealed, it would be proper to wait the result of the inquiries which Captain Walker was now engaged in making. It would be better to have his report upon the forests of New Zealand before the Assembly, and his suggestions for the management of the forests, before reversing the legislation of the last two years upon grounds such as were stated by the honorable and gallant gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill. No expenditure other than that which attended the mission of Captain Walker had been incurred by the Government on account of the forests. There was nothing in the relations between Captain Walker and the Government which would at all bind the colony for a longer time than the year for which he had obtained leave, and before the close of which he proposed to make his report. It was competent for Captain Walker on the one hand, at the close of his year's engagement, to say he declined any longer to remain in the service of the Government, and it was on the other hand competent for the Government at that time to terminate their engagement with Captain Walker. It was mutually open on both sides. So that there was no obligation upon the colony, after the preliminary inquiry had been made, to continue further expenditure on account of these forests if the report showed that such an expenditure was no longer a desirable one to make. In a statement which was made by the Colonial Treasurer in another place, it was proposed, as honorable members are aware, to withdraw the £10,000 that was appropriated under the Act of last year for the purposes of the Forests Act, and to take it again into the Consolidated Revenue, so that really there was no expenditure, except what was known, going on on this subject; and until the Assembly had had an opportunity in another year of making themselves acquainted with and studying the result of Captain Walker's investigations, no further expenditure or liabilities would be incurred. There had been no change in the circumstances which induced the Council to pass the Forests Act; there was no change in the view of the evils which the destruction of forests entailed upon the country; there was no change in the view of the advantage which might be obtained by the proper utilization and management of the forests of the country; and there were, from intelligence which he was sorry to say he had not, owing to his illness, been able to study with sufficient attention in order to place it before the Council, evidences of the success of the operations carried on in a very modest and quiet way in South Australia, which were quite sufficient to show that it was worth while for any colony to take some trouble to conserve and increase its forests. He did not desire at all to bind the colony to this Forests Act. What he asked was that the Council would not now declare that all that had been done in the past was a mistake, but that it would allow the Act to remain in operation at least for another year by negating the second reading of this Bill; and let them, with the light Captain Walker would be able to throw upon the whole question, then calmly and dispassionately consider whether or not it would be for the benefit and the interest of the colony that the course that gentleman recommended them to pursue should or not be adopted. He hoped the amendment of his honorable friend Colonel Brett would be carried, and the Bill ordered to be read a second time that day three months.

*The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said, whether this Bill was read a second time or not, the fact would remain that the coming into that branch of the Legislature of this Bill, carried as it had been through the House of Representatives, was an evidence that one of their political bubbles had burst—that the New Zealand Forests scheme was no more. He did not regret the collapse of this measure. It was satisfactory to know that its collapse did not entail upon the colony any large pecuniary loss. He wished that he could flatter himself that other bubbles that had yet to burst would be attended with as little injury. This Act was introduced to the notice of the Legislature with a great flourish of trumpets. It was instructive now to turn back and see what was said upon the occasion of the introduction of the measure to the notice of Parliament. Parliament was seriously told that this scheme was one to enable the colony, without any other outlay than that provided in the Bill, to provide means for paying off its national debt. That looked very absurd of course, but nevertheless it was the fact. The Hon. the Premier, Sir Julius Vogel, introduced the Bill into the other branch of the Legislature in a speech which occupied fifteen pages of Hansard, and he entered into some calculations to show how, through a system of forest-planting, the colony might pay off its national debt in thirty-five years; and he wound up his observations with some few remarks, which at this time it might be well that the Council should not altogether overlook. Sir Julius Vogel said,—

"I am sure that it would be a pleasing thing for us to be able to say to those who come after us, 'We have borrowed money by which to cover the country with railways; we have taken care not to injure its climate; and we now hand to you, in these forests, a magnificent property which will more than pay the liabilities we have devolved upon you.'"

And again he said, "As far as can be done by the Bill, we put upon State forests the charge of repaying the public debt of the colony incurred for the construction of railways." And yet again he said,—

"I confess, too, I should feel pride if this Parliament, which has done so much to develop the policy of constructing public works, be not allowed to pass away without being able to point to the fact that it had not only made provision for public works, but had also provided means of paying for them—that it was handing down to the future not alone the debt represented by public works, but a magnificent property of more value than the railways themselves."

After those magnificent expectations set forth, a Bill repealing that measure had been introduced, and, in spite of the opposition of the Government, who were naturally opposed to the repeal of an Act to which they had been introduced, it passed through the House of Representatives. Honorable members might well ask how that his scheme had broken down so signally was in consequence of their legislating for effect to schemes, instead of legislating for effect to well-matured measures. The honorable gentleman who introduced the New Zealand Forests scheme had no practical knowledge of the subject he took up. He simply took it up as he took up any other subject; and time he managed to impress the Legislature with the public with the idea that the scheme he was introducing was to be the salvation of the colony. Had that legislation been the result of mature deliberation, the House would not now be considering the advisability of passing a repealing Act. He (Mr. Waterhouse) voted against the Forests Bill when it was brought down, and would vote for the repealing Bill now; but, at the same time, he agreed with the Hon. Colonial Secretary that it might be desirable to postpone the formal repeal of this measure for twelve months, because, if they kept the measure on the Statute Book, the subject would come before them again, and, when it did so, it might be in connection with some good scheme for the conservation of forests. At present there was no intention on the part of the Government of an intention to bring forward such a measure as he had referred to. It was quite clear that there should be some legislation on the subject, and it should be of the same character as that which existed in Europe with reference to the felling of timber. It should be provided that timber should only be cut down in certain seasons, and that it should not be sold to the public until a sufficient length of time had elapsed for properly seasoning it. By legislating in that way, they would be taking a great step towards the preservation of our forests. Everybody knew that seasoned timber would last two or three times as long as unseasoned timber, and in this city he could point out pretentious and substantial-looking erections which were fast going to ruin because they were painted while the timber was still green, thereby interfering with the regular process of seasoning. If the timber were cut down only at certain seasons of the year, and if people were forbidden to sell timber until it had been cut down for a certain time, a very great deal of good would be done. The example set by the Colony of South Australia might be followed. His honorable friend the Colonial Secretary appeared to be under some misapprehension with regard to what had been done in that colony. Nothing had been done but to set aside certain blocks of land as forest reserves, and to plough 1,000 acres of land with the view of planting timber this year. He believed that about 140,000 acres of land, in blocks of 20,000 acres each, had been set aside as forest reserves. The lease of one of those blocks, situated about 140 or 150 miles north of Adelaide, was recently submitted to auction, and brought something like 3s. per acre, the lessee being bound at the same time to fence in the whole of the land. Steps had been taken for planting that block in the coming season; and, as funds accrued from the rental of those reserves, still more extensive steps would be taken in the same direction. He thought the Parliament of New Zealand might legislate in the same direction with advantage. There were treeless plains, especially in the Southern Island, which, in the interests of the colony, should be planted out as far as possible. He thought it desirable that in their land laws they should provide that a certain percentage of the land revenues should be devoted to planting out tracts of land in such localities. He repeated that it might not be desirable at the present time to take the Forests Bill off the Statute Book.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL would not have spoken had not the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse referred to the scheme embodied in the New Zealand Forests Act as a political bubble. He would admit that the great expectations shadowed forth in the extracts from the late Premier's speech, which had been read by the honorable gentleman, were visionary. He did not think that the financial results there predicted were likely to be realized, but still he contended that the idea which was embodied in the New Zealand Forests Act did not deserve to be called a "bubble." He thought the idea was a good one, and well worthy the attention of the Legislature. Sir Julius Vogel had devoted a great deal of time to the subject, and had collected a large amount of valuable information with regard to it; and though, as he had already said, he did not believe that gentleman's expectations would be realized, yet he felt that the colony was under a great obligation to him for the trouble he had taken. He would not trouble the Council with any lengthened remarks now, because they were practically not going to deal with the question. This was not the first time the subject had come before the Legislature, and he hoped it would yet occupy a good deal of attention. He had, while travelling lately, been struck by the remarkable difference between those countries in which forestry had engaged the attention of the Government, and those in which nothing had been done in the direction of conserving the forests. Travelling in Europe, one could tell, as he passed from State to State, whether the several Governments took care of their forests or not. In the State where no steps were taken to preserve the forests, the country was arid, there was an absence of timber on the hills, the streams were scanty, and the mountains presented a bare and miserable appearance; but in the State where attention was paid to the forests, there was abundance of timber, the land was well watered, and, altogether, the country presented a more fruitful and fertile appearance. He thought that they were seriously neglecting their duty in that respect in New Zealand; and, to his own knowledge, there were parts of the colony which had greatly deteriorated in value, simply because attention had not been given to the conservation of the forests. They should do so, even if they made a financial sacrifice: if they did not do so, those who came after them would have very good cause for complaint. Therefore, if it were only in the light of a protest against putting this subject on one side, he would vote with his honorable and gallant friend Colonel Brett. He would be glad to see the Council raise its voice against the abandonment of such an important subject; and would have great pleasure in supporting the amendment of the honorable gentleman, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said he had voted against the New Zealand Forests Bill when it was first introduced, because he looked upon it as a sham. He quite agreed that they should have accurate information as to the state of the forests in the country, and that they should take steps to secure the preservation of their forests; but he did not consider it necessary to create a new and very expensive department for that purpose. As far as a report on the forests of the colony was concerned, he thought it would have been far better to have obtained one from some person who had an acquaintance with the colony and the different kinds of timber, &c., than to import a gentleman from another country at a very large expense. He knew of one gentleman in this town who, he undertook to say, would before this have produced a more valuable report than Captain Campbell Walker could. He had not the pleasure of Captain Walker's acquaintance, but he had no doubt he was a competent and efficient officer; but still he had had no experience of New Zealand or its forests. If somebody who understood the country had been sent with that gentleman, the cost of the report would doubtless have been money well spent. The fact was that Captain Walker had been placed in a false position. He had been brought away from his own country in order to make certain investigations, and he actually required an interpreter in order that he might do his work. He thought it would be much better not always to fly to the expedient of creating a new department, but to utilize the talent already at hand. He agreed with the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse that this Forests Bill could do no particular harm in remaining on the Statute Book for another year, but at the same time he considered that it was not the duty of the Government to keep a moribund Act on the Statute Book—especially an Act which must come to grief in another year, as he was sure would be the case with this; nor did he think they were paying a very high compliment to the Government, if they assumed that the maintenance of this Bill on the Statute Book was necessary in order to make sure that they would give attention to the matter during the recess, and bring in a practical measure next session. He thought it would be better to bury the Bill and the expectations of Sir Julius Vogel, as read by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, together. They should not believe in the dream that the State Forests Act of 1874 would extricate posterity from the national debt of the colony.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said that if the State Forests Act were repealed, he was afraid that Captain Campbell Walker would have an action against the Government. The Hon. the Colonial Secretary was slightly mistaken in his views on this matter. The engagement was certainly only for one year; but there was this understanding—a written understanding—that if the Government chose they could keep him on for three years; and if this measure were repealed, Parliament would take that power away from the Government, and Captain Campbell Walker would have fair grounds for action against the Government. He was told, upon the very best authority, that this was the case—that Captain Walker would have a good claim for compensation if the Bill were carried. Therefore he hoped that the Bill would be thrown out, if it was merely for the purpose of preventing him from having any claim for compensation in the future.

* The Hon. Mr. ACLAND would vote against this Bill; but he hoped that the Government would consider whether it would not be well to bring down a Bill next session that would have the effect of conserving the forests that already existed in the colony. The Act which this Bill proposed to repeal applied mainly to the forests which had been proposed to be made, and not to those which were already in existence.

* The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE had hoped the Council would have been able to discuss this Bill without introducing the name of the gentleman who had come out from India to start the planting of forests in this colony. There could be no doubt that anything that could be said in his favour was well deserved. He did not think that any more competent gentleman could have been found for the position. In England, Captain Walker's opinion was considered of some importance, and in Vienna he was considered to be so competent to give an opinion on certain subjects that he was chosen one of the judges at the Exhibition. He (Colonel Whitmore) was not prejudiced against Captain Campbell Walker, but he certainly was prejudiced against the Bill. He thought it was the Hon. Mr. Mantell who said that some person who understood forestry in New Zealand should have been sent elsewhere to learn something, and then be brought back to make a report on the forests of New Zealand instead of Captain Walker.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL rose to explain that what he said was that they could have found a person capable of producing a better report.

* The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE had understood the honorable gentleman to say that it would have been better to send a gentleman who understood New Zealand to study elsewhere, and then come back to New Zealand and report on the forests of the colony. What he wanted to point out was, that this was precisely what the Government of India did in the case of Captain Campbell Walker. There were a great many persons in New Zealand who had devoted a considerable amount of time to the subject, and who would have been willing to give their services in the same way as Captain Walker. With reference to the creation of a department to plant new forests in New Zealand, was that they were not yet in a position to undertake such a thing. The which existed already were sufficient the attention of the Government; and of launching into such a scheme as the Premier had appointed some person to p existing forests, it would have been mu. He thought that, if they passed some which would protect the existing fore being wasted, they would be doing as mu circumstances of the colony would allow do at present. The Hon. the Colonial S had said that the usefulness of this br the Legislature was to prevent hasty legi Now, the original Bill, when introduced hurriedly, had been passed in another pl almost two to one. It was necessary the C should give the repeal Bill very careful co tion. It seemed to be the universal wis this costly department should not be creat that a Bill should be passed which would ha effect of wiping it off the Statute Book. H lieved that to be the view of the greater p the people of this country, and he was eq sure they could not carry out the provisio this Act with the means at their disposal. the Financial Statement made by the Colo Treasurer the previous evening, he noticed that £10,000 voted for the Forests Department l already, before this Bill was passed, been tal away. Such were the necessities of the coun that everything not urgently required they m do without. It was their duty to set their fac against such a proposal as that contained in tl original Act, which no one pretended they cou carry out at the present time, and which migh authorize a great deal of useless expenditure For these reasons he asked the Council to sup port the Bill. He had been asked to take charge of it a day or two ago, without having had an opportunity of studying the subject very deeply; but on financial grounds alone, he felt bound not to refuse to undertake the duty. He had nothing to do with the Bill further than undertaking to introduce it into the Council, but he was just as much in favour of it as if it was his own Bill. He thought it was their duty to support this, and every other measure that had the character of diminishing expenditure, unless it was clearly shown that it would imperil the efficiency of the public service. They were bound to take an economical view of all questions, and to pass all legislation which would curtail expenditure.

OHINEMURI AGRICULTURAL LEASES BILL.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it had passed the House of Representatives, where it was introduced by his Honor the Superintendent of Auckland. Its object was to validate certain agricultural leases which were issued by his Honor the Superintendent as the delegate of His Excellency the Governor. Honorable gentlemen would no doubt have noted the very portentous preamble, in which it appeared to him a great many words have been wasted. The facts might be put into a nutshell. He had taken charge of the Bill, because it was a matter of considerable importance indeed to the public, and also of considerable importance to about 135 persons who had obtained leases or promises of leases for land in the district. Honorable gentlemen no doubt had all heard of Ohinemuri, and of the great expectations that were hoped to be realized from the opening of the gold field—expectations which had been greatly exalted and exaggerated owing to the difficulties and delays which obstructed the desire of the miners to be put in possession of the country. In February, 1875, after many negotiations and the expenditure of a great deal of money, the Natives of Ohinemuri were induced to cede a block of land, described in the schedule of this Bill, for gold mining purposes. He was present with the Native Minister on the occasion when that agreement was made; and, while he was still there, news arrived at Ohinemuri of the death of Mr. John Williamson, who was then exercising the delegated authority of the Governor under the Gold Fields Act. There being no local authority there, the Governor was pleased to delegate his authority to him (Dr. Pollen), who was on the spot. On the 6th March, Ohinemuri was proclaimed a gold field, and all the necessary regulations for bringing the Act into force were issued. The gold field was proclaimed under "The Gold Fields Act, 1866," notwithstanding that the Gold Mining Districts Act was in operation in the districts close to Ohinemuri. The gold field was believed to be of an alluvial character, and it was thought better, in the interests of the present and future inhabitants, to proclaim the gold field under the Act of 1866 rather than under the Gold Mining Districts Act. The fifth part of the Act of 1866 prescribed the mode in which agricultural leases should be granted upon land set apart for that purpose in gold-mining districts, and it provided that no portions of that section should be brought into operation except by Proclamation of the Governor, and that no such Proclamation was to be issued except upon the request of the Superintendent and Provincial Council of any province. In the May following the proclamation of this gold field, the Provincial Council of Auckland was in session. Excepting the production of a little official scandal, the opening of the Ohinemuri Gold Field had not any satisfactory results. The expectations formed of it in the first instance were by no means realized by the experience of the first two or three months' operations on the field. Whether or not the attention of the Provincial Government was not sufficiently directed to the steps which were necessary to be taken to bring the agricultural clauses into operation in the province, he could not say; but the fact was, that no application was made by the Superintendent or Provincial Council to have that portion of the Act of 1866 brought into operation in the Province of Auckland; and consequently, when it became necessary afterwards to issue agricultural leases, there was no lawful authority to issue them. There was some correspondence of the usual recriminatory character in which the Government had from time to time been unfortunately involved with his Honor the Superintendent of Auckland; and finally a proposal was made that the Government would undertake to bring in a Bill to validate any leases which his Honor might issue, with the advice and consent of his Executive Council, on the Ohinemuri Gold Field. This was in June, 1875; but the last session of the General Assembly was allowed to pass without any proposition being made on the part of the Auckland Provincial Government to have those leases validated. On the 15th July, his Honor the Superintendent issued regulations for granting agricultural leases within the Ohinemuri Gold Field under the terms of clause 5 of the deed for the acquisition of that block procured from the Natives in February, 1875, which regulations were meant to be brought before the General Assembly of New Zealand. Those regulations did not purport to be made in conformity with the provisions of the Act of 1866 at all. As a matter of fact, they went entirely beyond the limitations imposed by that Act, and in short had no lawful sanction of any kind. The Gold Fields Act provided that those agricultural leases should not have a longer currency than seven years. Those leases issued by his Honor the Superintendent of Auckland, on his own authority, were for a period of twenty-one years. This Bill proposed to validate those leases, and it proposed also to apply the fifth part of "The Gold Fields Act, 1866," to the Gold Mining Districts Act which was now in operation over the Ohinemuri Gold Fields, and which made no provision for the issue of agricultural leases. The consequence of this arrangement, if it were carried out, would be that there would be on that gold field two systems of leasing, one for twenty-one years and another for seven years, which would be a very inconvenient arrangement indeed. It would therefore be necessary to make considerable alterations in this Bill, and he would ask the Council to allow it to be read a second time now, simply for the purpose of affirming the principle that, a very large number of people having been induced to take up those leases, it would be necessary to make some legal provision for securing to them the tenure of their holdings. If the Council would allow it to be read a second time, he would not ask for its committal for some days, and he would submit it to the Law Officers to give it proper shape, and to bring it into conformity as far as possible with the Act of 1866.

OAMARU TRAMWAYS BILL.

*The Hon. Mr. BONAR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he was happy to see that members seemed to take great interest in it. It was an important matter relating to a very rising township, and one which had always been viewed with favour by the House. The Bill was promoted by the Borough Council of the Town of Oamaru, its object being the construction of a tramway to connect the main line of railway between Dunedin and Oamaru with the shipping port of the latter place, passing through part of the town. This work would be a great public convenience to a very large section of the community. That fact seemed to have raised a feeling of opposition to the Bill in another portion of the community, as was evidenced that day by a petition presented to the Council against the Bill, and signed by, he thought, 150 inhabitants of Oamaru. He thought it only right he should inform the Council that a petition in favour of the Bill, signed by 350 inhabitants, had been presented to the other branch of the Legislature, where the Bill had been considered by a Committee, and favourably reported on. Therefore, so far as the petitioners' numbers went, those in favour of the tramway had a very considerable majority. Under ordinary circumstances this was a matter which would not require to come before Parliament at all. It might be in the recollection of honorable members that in the year 1872 an Act was passed, called the Tramways Act, and under that Act application was made in the course of last year, by some persons who were willing to construct this tramway; to the Superintendent, in whom the reserves at that time were vested, asking his permission to allow this tramway to be constructed over the reserve, which he thought he was correct in stating was set apart for public purposes. This permission was granted by the Superintendent, but subject to a report by a Select Committee of the Provincial Council. But before that Committee reported, another Bill was passed by this Legislature, called the Oamaru Town Hall and Gasworks Sites Act, which passed through the Council, dealing with the purposes of this reserve, and setting apart the reserve in question for public recreation; and hence the necessity for coming to Parliament now to ask permission to construct the tramway through a certain portion of this reserve. He hoped the Council would recollect that, previous to this, the Superintendent, in whom the reserve was vested, had been obtained for laying out the reserve. He apprehended the motives of that work were not a very important change then being made, but would have heard more about it when it was before them last session. The fact that through which this tramway was proposed to run was laid out on the plan in his hand, really affected in no material way the land which had been set apart for recreation purposes. In fact, the main portion of the land through which this tramway was proposed to run was that which it was intended to set apart for gasworks. Objection was taken to its being erected in the centre of the town, but that reason alone he thought the permission was not granted. If the works had not been objectionable in themselves, he did not think material objection would have been taken by the House to granting this piece of land for that purpose, and therefore he could not see why great objection should be made to allowing the construction of this tramway, which would be a great public convenience. Probably, when the matter came to be thoroughly investigated, no doubt it would be, by the Waste Lands Committee, they would be able to get evidence on point; but, so far as he was informed at present, the ground was practically unused for the purpose of public recreation. Additional care seemed to be taken that no advantage should be taken of the public in any way by undue haste. Before any steps could be taken, advertisements would have to be published, stating that it was the intention of the Corporation to construct a tramway, and, if within fourteen days of that time one-half of the ratepayers of Oamaru lodged a memorial with the Corporation against its construction, it was not proposed that the tramway should be constructed. Further provision was made that, if the work was constructed by any private individuals, there should be full power for the Minister for Public Works to arrange for the free traffic of all Government trucks, engines, and rolling stock of any kind whatever, over the line of tramway. The public interests were in every way protected in the Bill. If permission was not given to allow the tramway to pass over this small section of the reserve, the only other alternative line would be along one of the principal streets, which would necessitate the construction of a turntable in the streets, with a branch line to the railway. This, he thought, would be found to be a much greater inconvenience than allowing a line of tramway to run over a piece of unoccupied ground. It would also be the means of saving the expense at present incurred by many people residing there in the carriage of goods, and probably that would account for some of the opposition raised against this Bill. The construction of this tramway would also have the effect of relieving the streets of Oamaru of a great amount of heavy traffic—a result which must commend itself as being a matter of importance to the Corporation and ratepayers of the town. He trusted the Council would see its way to give effect to the wishes not only of the Corporation, but of such a large section of the inhabitants as had already intimated their desire that the Bill should pass. He need not tell the Council that Oamaru was a rising place, and that the harbour works there had proved of immense benefit. The population, he believed, had nearly trebled during a very few years, and it promised to become a town of very considerable importance. He was sure there was an absolute necessity for connecting the jetty and the harbour works which were now in course of construction, with the main line of railway; and he thought that should at once commend itself to the Council as a most desirable object to accomplish.

* The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said that whilst his honorable friend was speaking, the thought passed through his mind, What an admirable lawyer was spoiled by making him a merchant! He had not heard a better plea made in a bad cause for a long time. What were the facts of this case? The reserve in question was set apart for the recreation of the people of Oamaru. It was in the centre of the town, and, almost ever since the township was occupied, efforts had been made to deprive the people of their right to this reserve, or, at any rate, to encroach upon it. That was the case last year. The very land in question was applied for as a site for gasworks, to poison the people in the neighbourhood. The Council took that Bill into consideration, and with its usual deliberation saw that it was undesirable, and threw it out; and he hoped they would take a similar course in the present instance. He looked upon it as a circumstance of some importance that the Superintendent had not the power—or, at any rate, had ceased to have the power—of dealing with this reserve. If he could give it up for such a purpose, he thought that power was better in other hands. By a reference to the map, it would be seen that the reserve in question had been cut up in an extraordinary manner. First of all, a new water-race had been cut through it, without filling up the old one, and the consequence was that there were two water-races there. Then, again, a site for a school was taken. He did not oppose that, because he thought the object was a good one, and the piece of land required was not large. Then, again, the railway line was taken through the land, and so much subtracted from it. The value of the reserve had thus been lessened as a recreation ground. Part of this reserve was laid out as a cricket ground, and was used for that purpose. The same portion was also used as a playground for the children. In a very short time the land referred to in this Bill would be wanted for gardens, as the Corporation of Oamaru had obtained the services of one of the best gardeners in the district for the purpose of laying out these reserves and beautifying the town. He could not see, therefore, what plea could be urged in favour of taking the land for the tramway. Besides, it was not necessary for the purpose of constructing the tramway. He was intimately acquainted with the contour of the place, and he could say, as a fact, that if the parties concerned pleased to make a slight detour, by very slightly increasing the length of the tramway, they could accommodate a great many more people and have an equally good line. He thought that what he had said was sufficient to convince the Council that it was not desirable that this recreation ground should be further cut up. It was highly undesirable that a piece of land such as this, which would be the very lungs of the town in future, should be taken for any other purpose than that for which it was originally granted. He therefore moved, That the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

* The Hon. Captain FRASER had great pleasure in seconding the amendment. This Bill was like a lady's letter—there was a great deal of useless matter in it, but the whole secret was in the postscript. The last clause contained the whole meaning of the Bill. The tramway was put forward because it bore a popular name. The object of the Bill was not to make a tramway, but to enable certain individuals to further their own interests. Two firms were going to make this line from two mills, making a curve line along the street to a siding in the railway. The Hon. Mr. Bonar said something about wagoners who at present carried the traffic between the harbour works and the railway. This Bill would deprive those people and their families of the means of livelihood. The Council had laid down the principle that no recreation reserves were to be tampered with or alienated. This Bill was a perfect sham; and the intention was not to make a tramway, but to make a curve line from the mills to carry flour to a siding in the railway, taking it across the recreation reserve right through the cricket ground, and interfering with the playground of the school children. He hoped the Council would throw the Bill out, and recognize the principle they had laid down all along. The Government was very much to blame for something they did last year. They gave away the Oamaru Esplanade to the Harbour Board, cutting the people off from a reserve which was intended for them; and the only land left to them was this small piece of ground. In other parts of the world—in Manchester and other cities—people had thrown down houses to provide parks for the people; but here they were going to allow the only recreation ground the Oamaru people possessed to be taken by grasping commercial people. He hoped the Council would not permit this act of aggression on the people. He stood up there for the rights of the people—on behalf of the women and children who would be deprived of air if this Bill was to be carried.

* The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL would not like the debate to close without making a few remarks, as he believed the Hon. Mr. Holmes and himself were the only members personally acquainted with this land. As far as he was aware, this Bill had been promoted by a very few individuals for their own personal benefit; but he knew that it would be exceedingly disadvantageous to the people of Oamaru if their only recreation ground was allowed to be divided as was proposed by this Bill. The whole recreation ground of Oamaru amounted to 8½ acres. The population of Oamaru was about 6,000; and if the harbour progressed and the exports increased, there was no doubt the population of the town would become very large. Therefore he thought they should be very careful how they allowed this very small recreation ground to be injured in the way proposed by this Bill. If in London it was proposed to make a tramway through Hyde Park, there would be a howl almost throughout the whole of England; and it was now proposed to do exactly the same thing here. It was only called a tramway, but there was a proposal in the Bill to enter into an arrangement with the Minister for Public Works to run trains upon it. This was to be a railway going up the main street of the town, and subdividing it in the most extraordinary manner. There was no provision even for gates; and there was actually to be no crossing in the main street. There was no doubt whatever that this ought to have been brought in as a private Bill. It had nothing whatever to do with a large section of the people, and it was only for the benefit of a few storekeepers at a particular end of the town. He hoped the Council would support the Hon. Mr. Holmes's amendment.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he was inclined to support the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Holmes. He had seen the reserve in question, and he thought it was for the interest of the inhabitants, not only at present but in future, that it should not be encroached upon. He had seen a number of persons amusing themselves at various games on this reserve, and he was glad to see that the inhabitants of Oamaru had a reserve of that kind in the very heart of the town. With regard to this Bill, there appeared to be a great difference of opinion among the people resident there. They had a petition to-day from 150 inhabitants against this Bill; and the representatives of Oamaru were themselves divided in opinion on the subject. Under these circumstances, he thought no injury could arise from postponing the consideration of this Bill for another session, until there was, on the part of the inhabitants of Oamaru, a more decided expression of opinion. He had always voted in favour of maintaining the integrity of reserves, and he would vote in that direction on this occasion by supporting the amendment.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that when, nearly twenty-five years ago, he recommended the Governor to make certain reserves in the Middle Island, he thought this reserve in Oamaru was the one which brought the greatest ridicule upon him. He now learned, on good authority, that there was a town there of 6,000 inhabitants. He was sorry to hear that part of the original reserve had long since been sacrificed—had been sold for some reason or another; and now it would appear that the only reserve remaining was this reserve of eight acres. As it was allowed that there was a difference of opinion amongst the inhabitants of Oamaru, and also among their representatives, with regard to this Bill, he was fully disposed to adopt the same course as the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse. He thought no great harm would be done by allowing the question of the diversion of this reserve to stand over for another session.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR did not think he would have so formidable a task when he undertook to introduce this Bill. He was sorry it did not find favour with the Council, but he trusted they would afford the same consideration to this Bill as they did to all others affecting the waste lands, and would allow it to be fully investigated by the Waste Lands Committee. The principal objection taken to the Bill was an objection which, under ordinary circumstances, he felt very strongly in dealing with reserves—namely, that any reserve set apart for recreation purposes should not be alienated. But he would ask the Council to consider the special circumstances of this case. Before this ground had been set apart for recreation purposes, an application had been granted for the construction of this tramway through the land. He thought that ought to be allowed to weigh in the minds of honorable members. It was not like a recreation reserve set apart for a long time, and used by the public.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES thought the honorable member was misleading the Council. The land in question was set apart, he thought, by the Hon. Mr. Mantell, upwards of twenty years ago. It could not possibly be set apart twenty years ago for a tramway, as such a thing was then unknown in New Zealand.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR would be sorry to mislead the Council, but he believed he was correctly informed when he said that this land was set apart for public purposes, and not for recreation purposes, till the Act of 1875 was passed. On reference to the debate which took place on the Gasworks Site Bill last session, he found that the chief objection was one taken by the Hon. Mr. Holmes, and the whole effect of that objection was that offensive works were proposed to be erected in the immediate neighbourhood of the school, and in the centre of the town. Objection was not taken to the alienation of this land as having been previously set apart for public recreation. It was a matter of great public convenience that this work should be carried out, and he did not think the remarks of the Hon. Captain Fraser could be borne out. That honorable gentleman stated that this work was proposed to be carried out in the interests of two particular mills. He (Mr. Bonar) could not think so poorly of the ratepayers and burgesses of Oamaru as to believe that they would elect men to represent them in the Borough Council who would promote a measure such as this for the benefit of one or two individuals. As he had said before, this Bill was brought forward at the request of the Municipal Council of Oamaru, and it was stamped with their approval and sanction. They objected to private individuals constructing this tramway through the town, and said it should be part of a general system; and therefore they requested that this Bill might be brought in in its present form. He would pass over the comments of his honorable and gallant friend in reference to the wagoners and their children. He thought they had heard the same argument urged very strongly in the old country when railways were first introduced; and it was found to be wholly groundless. With reference to what fell from the Hon. Mr. Campbell as to there being no provision in the Bill respecting gates and crossings, he thought the honorable gentleman must have overlooked section 5, which expressly provided for such matters. The Corporation would have had power to deal with the streets. All that this Bill asked for was power to take the tramway through the reserve, and power could be taken to have gates erected where necessary. He was informed that the ground which it was proposed to use for this tramway would not be readily used for purposes of public amusement, at all events at present.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY said he understood the tramway was to run down to the breakwater through part of the recreation ground. There appeared to be four sections of private land between the breakwater and the recreation ground, and he wanted to know from the honorable member whether the tramway would injure or benefit the owners of those sections. If so, it would certainly be a private Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR said that all the Bill asked for was the privilege of taking the tramway through the reserve. He presumed arrangements had been concluded by the Corporation; and all the Bill asked was simply authority to construct the tramway through a portion of the reserve made last year.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be read a second time that day six months.

The Council adjourned at five minutes past nine o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 10th October, 1876.

Northern Wairoa Telegraph—Judges' Salaries—Hokitika Streets—Waimea Water-race—Sir J. Vogel's Mission to England—T. Joyce—Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

NORTHERN WAIROA TELEGRAPH.

Sir R. DOUGLAS asked,—(1.) If it is the intention of the Government to extend the telegraph to some point on the Northern Wairoa? (2.) If, when doing so, the Government will cause the line to be taken through Hakaru, Mangaturoto, and Paparoa? (3.) If, when the above work is carried out, a telegraph station will be erected at Hakaru? In asking this question, he would like to make a few remarks explaining the reason why he put it. It appeared that much misapprehension existed as to the intention of the Government in making this Northern Wairoa telegraph. He had been asked, by the settlers in the districts mentioned in the question, to make inquiries of the Government as to whether they were inclined to carry the telegraph through the portions of the country which had become populated.

Mr. WHITAKER had to inform the honorable gentleman that there was no money available for carrying the telegraph in the way in which he proposed. To do so would involve an expenditure of £4,400. He could not promise that anything would be done by the Government in the matter between this and the next session, and it would have to stand over until that time.

JUDGES' SALARIES.

Mr. HARPER asked the Minister of Justice, Whether the Government intend to amend "The Civil List Act, 1873," for the purpose of increasing the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court? In putting this question, he wished to state that he thought the Judges of the Supreme Court in New Zealand had been overlooked by the House when voting salaries. He found, by referring to a return, that the last time an increase in the salaries of the Judges was made was in the year 1862. Since that time the population of the country had considerably increased, and the work which the Judges had to perform had increased proportionately. So long a time had elapsed since an increase had been made in the salaries of the Judges, that he thought it was time to ask the Government to do something towards raising their respective salaries. He found that the salaries of other officials, such as the Comptroller and Auditor, had been increased in the year 1873 or 1874, but no increase had been made in the salaries of the Judges since 1862; and the fact should not be overlooked that the Judges of the Supreme Court in Australia were paid much higher than the Judges of the Supreme Court of New Zealand; and in some colonies, such as South Australia, Tasmania, and Queensland, the duties which the Judges of the Supreme Court had to perform were far less than the duties which the Judges of the Supreme Court of New Zealand had to discharge. For these reasons, and also looking to the high professional standing of the Judges, he thought that they had fair claims for an increase of their salaries.

Mr. BOWEN said the Government regretted they were at present unable to enter into any arrangement for the increase of salaries.

HOKITIKA STREETS.

Mr. BUTTON asked the Government, If a Bill should be introduced this session to enable the Corporation of Hokitika to close part of Hamilton Street, Weld Street, and Stafford Street, in the Town of Hokitika, and to enable the present occupants of the parts proposed to be closed to purchase the land so occupied by them, whether the Government would support such a Bill? In asking this question, he wished to remark that he knew perfectly well that at this period of the session, unless the Government were prepared to support a Bill of this kind, it was utterly useless to expect that it would be passed through the House. He thought the parties who were interested in this matter had some claims for consideration. In the early days of Hokitika, when the sections were all laid out without reference to these particular streets, certain persons, who now occupied valuable business sites at the ends of the streets, took up their sections just in the same way as other people did, but they were prevented from acquiring the freehold of these streets. The streets proposed to be closed were close to the beach, and were not likely to be much required, and the closing of them was recommended by the Borough Council. Under the Municipal Corporations Act which had been passed through the House, there was power given to the Borough Council to close any street, or to alter any street, but there was no power for them to deal with the land that had been occupied by these streets. Under the Public Works Bill that was before the House, there was a provision that when counties or other bodies of a similar nature closed up roads or streets, they had the power of disposing of the land. There was no such provision with regard to Borough Councils; they had the power to alter a road or close it, but no power to deal with the land. Under the Highways and Watercourses Act, which was proposed to be repealed by the Public Works Bill, nobody could have this power; but under the Public Works Bill the Governor in Council would have the power of disposing of the land. He asked the question in order to ascertain if the Government would introduce a measure of the kind alluded to. There was no doubt that these persons had some claim to consideration. The rest of the inhabitants of the town were allowed to have their freehold sections, while the persons referred to unfortunately occupied sections which were afterwards required for a street, not actually for the sake of street communication, because the street had never been made through the property. It appeared on the map as having been surveyed, and the occupants of the land were unable to acquire the freehold. The Government might be prepared to allow them to continue to occupy, and, if they were removed, to give them a certain amount of compensation. That would be some way of compromising the matter. He believed the House would be prepared to consider their claims, and he should like to know what the Government intended to do in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER was unwilling to interrupt the honorable member; but if such a measure were introduced, it would have to be dealt with as a private Bill.

Mr. BUTTON supposed it would be too late in the session to introduce such a measure.

Major ATKINSON was afraid it was too late in the session to introduce a Bill on this subject. The Government would be very glad to assist the honorable gentleman as far as possible, but he feared there was no possibility this session of such a Bill being passed.

WAIMEA WATER-RACE.

Mr. BUTTON asked the Government, If it is their intention to proceed immediately with the completion of the Waimea Race? He would like to remark that now that the new gold field at the Kumara had attracted so much attention, and required so much water to make it successful, it became very important that this Waimea Race should have something done to it. It was all the more important, because lately an application was made by a private company for a second right to water, subject to the Government's claim, the company desiring to bring water on to the Kumara diggings. The Government had not only maintained their own right, but had prevented all interference with the head supply. There were close upon 5,000 people on the Kumara diggings, and water was very scarce there. The water could be easily diverted to the Kumara, and would be the means of keeping a large number of persons employed on the diggings.

Mr. RICHARDSON replied that, when the Public Works Statement of the late Government was brought down, it was not the intention to complete the large and expensive works on the Waimea Race; but since that time the diggings to which the honorable member alluded had assumed proportions which rendered it necessary for the Government to take the matter again into serious consideration. The Government had so reconsidered the matter, and when in the course of a day or two he brought the Public Works Appropriation Act forward, he intended to make a proposition to enable the Government to complete this race. The Government would do so mainly because the water supply upon which the new diggings had to rely was monopolized by the Waimea Water-race. He might add that, when the proposition was made, it would be accompanied by a proposal that the water-race should not be handed over to the county in which it was situated.

SIR J. VOGEL'S MISSIONS TO ENGLAND.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Sir G. GREY moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the cost to the colony of the two missions of Sir Julius Vogel to England; such Committee to consist of Mr. Andrew, Major Atkinson, Mr. Luak, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Rolleston, Mr. Rees, and the mover; with power to call for persons, papers, and accounts, and to report within four weeks; five to be a quorum.

Major ATKINSON would be prepared to agree to the inquiry if the matter were referred to the Public Accounts Committee, a Committee which was well known to the House, and which was appointed to inquire into all financial matters.

Sir G. GREY thought the matter was one which required the attention of a special Committee. He did not think it properly fell under the notice of the Public Accounts Committee.

Motion, "That the words proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question," negatived.

On the motion, That the words of the amendment be inserted in lieu thereof, Major ATKINSON moved as an amendment, That it be referred to the Public Accounts Committee to inquire into the cost of the two missions of Sir Julius Vogel to England.

Sir G. GREY trusted that his motion would be carried. If the Public Accounts Committee had thought it necessary to inquire into the subject, they would have done so long ago. He submitted that this was a question which, in the present state of the colony, was of very great importance, and was worthy of very considerable attention. He thought it was extremely wrong, when he proposed that a subject of this kind should be specially inquired into, that his motion, which was given so long ago as the 7th September, and which he had not had an opportunity of bringing forward before the previous day—an opportunity which he could not very well avail himself of owing to the hurried way in which the business was carried on—should have been traversed by the Government without their giving him any notice of their intention. What could be the object of the Government in taking such a course? There must be some design in it. There could be no objection to the Committee he had named; but, if there were, other names might be substituted, or other names might be added. At the present moment, the country was plunged into such a state of financial difficulty through extravagant expenditure that serious inquiry should be made with regard to that expenditure; otherwise he would not have moved this motion. He believed the inquiry would show the nature of the extravagance that had been committed, and open the eyes of the people of the colony in regard to the difficulty into which it had been led, and in which it was now involved. It was a very wrong thing to try to stop fair inquiry of the kind he asked for, and it was still his duty to press the motion he had moved.

Mr. BOWEN said this was strictly a matter of account, and should therefore be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. It would be a very unusual course to refer a question of this kind to a special Committee. The Government certainly thought they were meeting the honorable gentleman in the spirit in which he wished the inquiry to be made, by proposing that the matter should be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. As a matter of fact, all the information the honorable gentleman wished to obtain could have been supplied in the shape of a return, had he moved for it.

Mr. HODGKINSON had not forgotten why the Government desired to have this matter referred to the Public Accounts Committee. There was very good reason for it. It would be recollected that there was a very serious discussion about the appointment of the Public Accounts Committee, and that, out of the fifteen gentlemen who composed it, twelve were Government supporters. It would be remembered, too, that when it was proposed to add the name of the honorable member for Auckland City East to that Committee, the Government offered violent opposition; and he contended that the Committee, as at present constituted, was a packed Committee, and not to be trusted in a matter of this kind. He should certainly support the motion of the honorable member for the Thames. He had not forgotten the extremely improper conduct of the Government and their supporters in regard to the appointment of that Committee three months ago, and he felt that there was no course open to him but to support the motion.

Mr. STEVENS thought the reference of the question to the Public Accounts Committee would answer every purpose, because the words of the resolution were so clear, and so narrowed down, that it was impossible that any party feeling could enter into its proceedings, whatever might be its constitution. The motion really meant that a Committee should be appointed to ascertain the cost of the mission of a certain gentleman on two occasions. It was impossible that there could be any falsification of facts by the Public Accounts Committee, and it would be admitted on all hands that they were as capable as any other Committee of ascertaining those facts. He trusted the honorable member for the Thames would allow the matter to go before that Committee.

Mr. W. WOOD considered that as the member for the Thames had been taken by surprise, and rather improperly so, in a matter to which he attached considerable importance, it was only fair that the debate should be adjourned. The Government should have given the honorable gentleman notice of their intention to propose such an amendment. They had had two months to consider the matter, and should now give the honorable member for the Thames time to consider their proposal. He would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was not competent for the honorable member to move such an amendment, as its effect would be to obliterate the motion for going into Committee of Supply.

Mr. REES was somewhat surprised that the Government should object to the appointment of a special Committee to consider the matter. Regarding for their own honor should have induced them to consent to the appointment of such a Committee; but it seemed that they did not care much for their honor. The motion of the honorable member for the Thames was a very simple one, and he could not understand why the Government should resist it. Why should the Premier be so very desirous to refer the question to the Public Accounts Committee? Three-fourths of that Committee consisted of Government supporters. Honorable members might say "No," but let them look at the names, and they would see whether it was so or not. He was quite surprised that the Government should decline to allow the matter to go before a Committee composed of three members of the Opposition, one member of the Government, one known supporter of the Government, and two or three who were independent of either party. What could be their object in refusing? Was it that they wanted to shield themselves from something that they knew to be wrong? Was it because they had formed a determination that the light of day should not be let in upon this question, or what was it?

Mr. BOWEN.—They desire to have the matter inquired into impartially.

Mr. REES.—Impartially! By a Committee composed of Government supporters, in the proportion of three to one, and in the style in which things were usually inquired into in that House—that kind of impartiality where, no matter what arguments were brought forward, no matter how the truth suffered, they were overwhelmed by Government supporters. Was that impartiality? He hoped the honorable gentleman's conduct would never be judged by such impartiality. He hoped when the tide turned, as it was turning now, the honorable gentleman would not have to encounter such impartiality. It would fare very hardly with the honorable gentleman if he did. He had heard some very strange things of the Government before he had the honor to occupy a seat in that House, but he was scarcely prepared for what he had seen since he had been there. Every member of the House was concerned in this motion, which asked that an inquiry should be made into the cost of the two missions undertaken and carried through by the late Premier, Sir Julius Vogel, in relation to the business of the country in England. Was there anything extraordinary about that? There was something extraordinary, no doubt, about the amount of the expenditure; and seeing that certain rumours had got abroad, and that certain statements had been made in that House, it was very necessary that a special Committee should be appointed to inquire into the subject. The course the Government had adopted was most astonishing. They all knew that there was an old adage to the effect that "Whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad;" and he thought the Government were rapidly approaching that condition. They felt that their destruction was impending, and, in their struggle to avert it, they were hurrying it on. Day by day they gave proof of that high sense of honor which a Ministry should evince in presence of the House and the country. If their conduct in this case was to be part of those proceedings which led them to send out untrue statements to the country, which prompted them to profess belief in things that never existed, and to endeavour to shelter themselves under Her Majesty's name and that of the Law Officers of the Crown without any authority whatever, he could understand it, but on no other supposition could he do so. If the Government thought the Committee named in the motion would not act impartially, they should have proposed others, and probably the honorable member for the Thames would not have objected; but, instead of doing that, they proposed to refer it to a Committee about whose appointment there was a great contest, and from which his own name was excluded. And in relation to that matter, he should like to know why his name was not to be allowed to be put on this Committee. He would ask every honorable member in the House whether he knew an instance in which he had acted unfairly, either individually or in any other way whatever. He might have strong opinions on party matters. Everybody knew he had. He held strong opinions in regard to what he considered political uprightness and political honesty; but he would ask every member of the Ministry whether in anything he had done or said he had acted unfairly. Why, then, should they refuse to allow this question to be considered by this Committee because his name was on it?

Mr. BOWEN.—It is not so.

Mr. REES would ask them why it should be proposed to refer it to a Committee which had never sat this session, and never would sit. The member for Nelson City (Mr. Curtis) was Chairman of that Committee, but he had never called the members of it together. How was that? Was it because the finances were in such a sound condition? Not at all. The Treasurer knew that the finances were in such a muddle that it would take a very considerable time to get them in order. He did not think it was proper or manly that the Government should refuse to refer the question to the Committee proposed. It was not right to the House or to the country. The Committee would take evidence, report upon it, submit the report to the House, and it would still be in the power of the House to deal with the matter. He trusted the House would consent to the appointment of the Committee. There were two members on it—the member for the Thames and himself—who were opposed politically to Sir Julius Vogel; but did any honorable member suppose they would take an unfair advantage of Sir Julius Vogel on that account? Did any honorable gentleman believe that they would disguise the truth in any sense whatever, because of their political views? Putting aside his own name, he would ask if the career of Sir George Grey was such as to lead any one to believe for a moment that he would attempt to do an unfair or cowardly act. Then, the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Andrew) was amongst those named. He presumed the Government were afraid of that honorable gentleman. He never supported them in the House! The honorable gentleman was known to go against them in every possible way! They knew that in one or two matters in which he could not succeed the honorable gentleman had opposed them, but in other matters he was a well-known supporter of the Government. Then there were the Hon. Major Atkinson, and Mr. Lusk, who, though a member of the Opposition, was as firm and impartial as any gentleman on the Committee. Then Mr. Stevens: he could not be accused of being in opposition to Sir Julius Vogel and the Ministry. Nor could Mr. Rolleston. The only other names were those of the honorable member for the Thames and his own; and he believed that if the honorable gentlemen on the Ministerial benches were on their trial upon anything at all in relation to which they had a good defence, they would as soon have his name and that of the honorable member for the Thames upon the jury as the name of any honorable member of the House, or any one in the country. Why was it that this Committee was not to be allowed? He could tell the House why it was necessary. Because Ministers knew, or believed, that these accounts would not bear the light. That was the sole reason. Because they believed these accounts would not be found to be consistent either with common prudence, or with common justice to the Ministry, to the House, or to the country. That was the sole reason. They desired to get a Committee which they knew would never meet; so that they might throw out this matter and decline to allow it to be made public, whereas in the interests of the colony it ought to be made public. If this were to be allowed now, the next gentleman who went Home to negotiate a loan, or upon a mission, might spend £7,000 or £8,000; and if an inquiry into his case were granted, he might ask why he should be put to the crucial test of an examination, when Sir Julius Vogel's expenses were not subjected to any examination whatever. He trusted the House would not allow this to happen. For the purpose of allowing any remarks honorable members might have to make, he would move the adjournment of the House. It seemed to him that the Ministry ought never to have questioned the appointment of the Committee; but as the Government had taken up such a position, the matter ought to be fully discussed, and, to allow honorable members an opportunity of expressing their opinions, he would move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BARFF had listened with great surprise to the statement made by the honorable member for Auckland City East, that the Public Accounts Committee had never met during the present session. He trusted that, before the conclusion of the debate, the House would hear that statement disproved if it was incorrect.

Mr. REES explained that he said he believed it had not met. He did not wish to say it had not met, for he was not a member of the Public Accounts Committee, and he was open to correction.

Mr. BARFF said it was a matter of very great importance to the House, and for this reason: The finances of the country had not been thoroughly discussed in this House or in the Committee during the present session, and no fair opportunity for discussing the finances had yet occurred. The honorable member would recollect a long discussion which took place upon the election of the Public Accounts Committee, and special reasons were given for and against the insertion of certain names. He did not altogether understand the arguments pro and con. upon that occasion. If the Premier, who moved that this matter should be referred to the Public Accounts Committee, knew that they had not met during the session, it simply amounted to this, that the question would be shelved. He did not wish the House to understand that he said or believed that any good would result from an inquiry of this kind. He did not believe that benefit to the extent of a single shilling would result from the inquiry as to the expenses of the late Premier on his visits to England. At the same time, if there was a doubt in the minds of any honorable members—there was none whatever in his own, and he wished to state that distinctly—as to whether those expenses were incurred fairly or not, it would, he thought, be far better for honorable members on the Government benches to allow the fullest opportunity for discussing the matter, so that the result might be laid before the country. He believed that, although the expenses of the late Premier might have been high, great excuse might be given for the amount expended; he did not believe that the money was badly laid out, and he did not at all join in the cry that had been raised by some members of the Opposition upon the subject. It would be very wise for the Government to allow the appointment of this Committee, so as to prevent any question arising as to unfairness in the inquiry. Honorable members would wish to lay before their constituents their action in this Assembly, and the line of conduct they took in endeavouring to elicit certain facts which might otherwise be said to have been withheld from them.

Sir G. GREY believed he could speak again upon the subject. He wished to point out that it would have been exceedingly becoming that he himself should have had an opportunity of investigating the accounts, and of making up his mind as to the kind of expenditure that had been carried on. To attempt to shut him out from an advantage of that kind was a very improper proceeding, and he would recall to the recollection of the House the circumstances that took place when the Public Accounts Committee was appointed. He endeavoured to get one friend put on that Committee, but he failed in that object; and he believed that such a thing was never before done as a Government deliberately insisting upon constituting a Committee in the manner in which that Committee was constituted. The House would remember that objections were raised by several gentlemen on his side, who contended that the proceedings were most unfair, and they pointed out that if a new Government took office they would stand in the most unjust position of having a financial Committee appointed almost entirely from their opponents. Now the very gentleman who took the leading part in appointing that Committee, Sir Julius Vogel—for he was the person who selected the members of it, and prevented other gentlemen from being put upon it—was to have his own personal expenditure inquired into by it. That was contrary to all principles of right and justice, and he was sure it would not be satisfactory to the country. There were reports in circulation, whether right or wrong he did not know—and he had heard from sources which could not but be well informed—that the expenses incurred in these two missions was of a most extravagant kind, unnecessarily extravagant, and of a nature to set a very bad example to the public service. In drawing up the proposition for the appointment of the Committee, he inserted the unusual words "and accounts." The usual words were "with power to call for persons and papers;" but he specially added the words "and accounts" in order that the accounts might be laid before the House in their details. He hoped that, in order that he might instruct himself as to the nature of the circumstances which gave rise to the financial condition in which they were involved, he should have been allowed to investigate the accounts, which he thought would have afforded him a key to the mysteries upon which he was not well informed, so that he might make up his mind as to the steps that should be taken to reduce the great extravagance that had prevailed. He had hoped that a report would have been made which would have prevented a repetition of that extravagance in the case of Sir Julius Vogel's present mission to England. He could only say that any information they had yet had as to the expenses to be incurred on that mission was of a most unsatisfactory character. In all proper Governments a certain sum for passage-money was fixed for public servants. They received that amount, and got neither more nor less. Nothing of that kind had yet been done here, and he had been in hopes that in the report of the Committee a rule of that kind might have been recommended, which might hereafter be adopted in the country. He thought, in other respects, that he and the public and the House had been unfairly used. He gave notice of motion on the 7th September, and when, on the previous evening, the matter came up and was postponed till to-day, he had no doubt that the motion, which was of an ordinary nature and of a plain kind, would have been at once acceded to. The gentlemen who had tried to traverse his action were not the real friends of Sir Julius Vogel, of Her Majesty's subjects in this colony, or of the public service. If Sir Julius Vogel stood in the same position as other honorable gentlemen who had gone to England did, he felt convinced that the inquiry he asked for would have been gladly conceded to him. He felt certain that if he had asked for an inquiry into the expenses of those gentlemen they would have thanked him as a friend, and any information elicited would have redounded to their lasting credit, as he knew to be the case. He still trusted that the Government would feel that the course they were pursuing was wrong, and would concede the Committee he had asked the House to sanction.

Mr. CURTIS said it appeared to him that the House was debating a subject of very small importance indeed. It could matter very little to what particular Committee an inquiry of this kind was relegated; for it was an inquiry of a positive character into certain facts. The Committee would simply inquire and report to the House the cost to the colony of the two missions of Sir Julius Vogel to England. It was a matter upon which there could be no controversy, and no political feeling could possibly be introduced. Therefore it was a matter of little importance whether it was referred to the Committee nominated by the honorable member for the Thames, or to the Public Accounts Committee. There was, however, one reason for referring the question of these accounts to the Public Accounts Committee, and that was that since that Committee had been formed it had been the custom of the House to refer questions of the kind to it for investigation. It was generally understood that the Committee was a tribunal of an impartial character, chosen to investigate questions of expenditure. The honorable member for Auckland City East had expressed surprise that the Committee had not hitherto met; but the honorable gentleman was mistaken upon that point. It had held one meeting, and he was informed it was not the custom to meet, as a general rule, unless to consider questions referred to it by the House. The Committee had this session met without having anything referred to it by the House. When the present Government came into power, the Prime Minister called the Committee together—that being his duty, as its appointment, though not proposed by that honorable gentleman, had been moved by his predecessor—with the object of consulting the Committee with respect to the publication of certain correspondence between the Government and the Crown Agents. The Government were doubtful whether some portions of it were not of a confidential character, and they thought it desirable to consult the Committee as to whether it would be for the public interest to publish that correspondence in extenso. The Committee were of opinion that there were some parts of that correspondence which must be considered to be of a confidential character, and which it would not be desirable to publish, and they thought that the Government might wisely exercise their discretion in publishing only such parts of that correspondence as it was necessary to lay before the House. If this question were submitted to the Public Accounts Committee, it would no doubt be inquired into, and the Committee would report the actual statement of facts to the House without any political feeling entering into the question in any way whatever.

Mr. STOUT regretted that considerable time should have been taken up in discussing this matter. This arose from the way in which the Government inaugurated debates. They inaugurated a debate on the Counties Bill, and they inaugurated a debate on a telegram, and now on the question of appointing a Committee the names of which they did not, he believed, quarrel with. What was the use of having a debate, lasting for about an hour, on a thing which they now admitted was of no moment? He could not understand that at all. If what was to be investigated was of no moment, why should they not agree to the motion? If the honorable member for the Thames, who moved for the Committee, was not allowed to be on the Committee, the result might be that the Public Accounts Committee might never meet or discuss the matter. He could not possibly conceive why the Government should raise such an obstruction to the public business.

Mr. STAFFORD said it was not very agreeable to honorable members of the House, either individually or collectively, to be placed under the necessity of scrutinizing the character of a Committee as to whether it would act fairly or not. For his own part, he should have had no objection whatever to have seen the proposition of the honorable member for the Thames acceded to, had it not been for the remarkable speech of the honorable member for Auckland City East. The honorable member emphatically declared that the Public Accounts Committee was not a fair tribunal; he called it a packed tribunal. The honorable member chose to use the word "packed," and he (Mr. Stafford) threw that word back in his teeth. It was most essentially a packed Committee which was proposed by the honorable member for the Thames. It was a Committee composed, with very few exceptions, of known political opponents and attackers of Sir Julius Vogel—persons known to be so, with very few exceptions; and therefore, if such a very improper expression—and he held it to be a very improper term to use—if such an improper phrase as “packed” could be used with reference to the Public Accounts Committee, à fortiori it was practically applicable to the Committee proposed by the honorable member for the Thames. The subject to which this Committee referred was one upon which there could be nothing more than a matter of examination. The object for which the Public Accounts Committee was appointed was not to advise as to a financial policy, or to decide a financial policy—to point out where the financial policy of the Government was wrong, and make some recommendation for some other policy as a substitute for it. The Committee had nothing whatever to do with such a matter. The Public Accounts Committee in this country was somewhat similar to the Committee in England, where it held a very important position with reference to the Imperial Parliament: it was simply a Committee to determine whether the will of the Parliament had been properly given effect to, whether moneys had been expended in accordance with the will of Parliament, and whether the accounts had been kept in the way in which the Parliament desired that they should be kept; and it was intended to be a check on the improper expenditure of the public money. The Committee had from time to time made most valuable suggestions as to the way of stating the public accounts. The question as to whether there should be a Controller or not was one of the questions brought before the Imperial Public Accounts Committee, and after a great deal of consideration and investigation they reported against it. The Imperial Board of Control was consequently done away with, and a system of audit established in its place. That was a specimen of the functions which the Public Accounts Committee had to perform. The Committee—as the Committee of the House of Commons—had to consider all matters referred to it in connection with the public accounts. It had nothing whatever to do with regard to indicating the financial policy of the Government; still less had it any right to say that the financial policy had worked injuriously. It had nothing whatever to do with that. That was a Ministerial question. It was a question for which the Colonial Treasurer and his colleagues were entirely responsible for initiating, and this House for adopting or rejecting. It would be most improper for this House to relegate to any Committee the question of determining what should or should not be the financial policy of the country. With reference to the Committee under consideration, he thought it might have been accepted as proposed. He thought it would have been more advantageous to Sir Julius Vogel if it had been so accepted, because he believed its report would be exactly the same as that of the Public Accounts Committee—namely, that so many pounds shillings and pence would be shown to have been expended exactly in the same direction by the one Committee or the other.

It certainly could not be shown that Sir Julius Vogel had been in any way favoured by the Public Accounts Committee. By the action taken by some honorable members it might be thought possible that everything would not be reported as it should be by the Public Accounts Committee. His only reason for opposing the motion of the honorable member for the Thames was the improper imputation which had been cast upon the honor of the Public Accounts Committee. For that reason, he should oppose the motion of the honorable member for the Thames.

T. JOYCE.

On the motion, That the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BUTTON moved, That this House will, on Friday, the 18th day of October, go into Committee of the whole, to consider an address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to place the sum of £398 on the estimates, to provide for the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Thomas Joyce. He moved the motion in this way, because he saw little chance of getting the matter under the notice of the House if he trusted to the ordinary course. He would not, however, take up the time of the House by offering any remarks upon the case.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that, if the Government were not prepared to express any opinion on the matter through the suddenness of the honorable gentleman's motion, it would perhaps be better to postpone it to give them an opportunity to make inquiry into the case, which was a very deserving one, and had been very fully investigated by the Public Petitions Committee.

Mr. BARFF said there had been plenty of time for honorable members to make themselves acquainted with the facts of the case, for, at the commencement of the session, a printed copy of the petition of Thomas Joyce, of Greymouth, with his signature, was placed in the pigeon-hole of each honorable member; and from what he knew of the case, he could only say that the injury done to Mr. Joyce was the grossest piece of injustice he had ever heard of. He knew nothing of the case before he came here, but he was firmly of opinion that the wrong done ought to be righted as speedily as possible. He did not wish to take up the time of the House by repeating the statements contained in the petition. He would only say that it contained matter which he hoped had been read by every member of the House. He would not say anything of the action of the Government officer concerned, because any honorable member who remarked on the conduct of Government officers was immediately told that they were the most efficient officers in the world; but any person who read the petition and the evidence, and came to the conclusion that great injustice had not been done to Mr. Joyce, could know nothing of the meaning of the English language.

Amendment negatived.

SUPPLY.

The House went in Committee of Supply.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

Legislative, £31,005 2s.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I do not offer any excuse for rising to address the Committee; and I will ask the attention of the House for a very little time. I will endeavour to be as brief as possible in my remarks. It is now four months since Parliament met, and three months since the Financial Statement was made, but we have had no discussion upon the finances of the colony. The tables usually appended to the Financial Statement were not so appended when the statement was delivered, and members could not understand the accounts until they had the tables before them. I wish to offer this observation: The accounts of the colony, or rather the abstract of accounts, presented to the House, are in such a form and so complicated that they are very difficult to understand, even by those who are well up in figures. I have endeavoured to arrive at a knowledge of the accounts. I will put my opinions before the Committee, and the Committee will take them for what they are worth; and I will endeavour by figures—not too many, but some—to show why I have arrived at the conclusions which I will state as I proceed. In the statement made last night the Colonial Treasurer said there was an available balance of £50,000 with which to commence this year. I take exception to that, because I think I shall be able to show, and no doubt many honorable members have arrived at the same conclusion, that, so far from there being an available balance, there is a very large deficit. In order to do that, I will turn to page 9 of the accounts furnished. The actual receipts and expenditure for the year ending 30th June, not including assets and liabilities, are there given. The ordinary revenue was £1,701,843 14s. 1d., which was very much less than the Treasurer last session estimated it would be. There was a falling off of £99,019 6s. 8d. in the Customs, and £10,590 in the Stamps. There were some small increases on some items; but there was a falling off to the extent of £13,467 in the estimated profit on Railways. In the item of Recoveries for interest on account of railways constructed, the amount obtained from the provinces was £48,000 less than estimated. Altogether, these are very serious deficiencies in the revenue; and, unless there be a corresponding reduction in the expenditure, it must be evident to honorable members that the balance which the honorable member anticipated will not show up at the end of the year. There is in the item of Incidental Receipts £51,000, which is not so much as the amount estimated by £15,677, and yet included in that sum is an amount of £27,500, interest paid by the Bank of New Zealand upon the proceeds of loan deposited with that Bank in London. I would say here that it was impossible to discover from the abstract of accounts that that money had been paid by the Bank of New Zealand, or that the incidental receipts were in part made up by that money. The honorable member for Auckland City East obtained that information from the Treasurer. The fact is now patent to us, but it was not known before. I have prepared a statement, and have put down recoveries and interest upon constructed railways. I may say that there is seven thousand pounds odd of that interest which is yet to be recovered, and which I will put as an asset when I come to the question of assets. The ordinary revenue, or rather the revenue taken altogether, not including receipts from redemption of debentures nor advances from Public Works Account, against which there are exact contras, nor amounts from issue of Treasury Bills, as shown by that statement in page 8, received into the Treasury, amounts to £1,806,450 19s. 2d., and is made up of these items:—

Receipts in reduction of expenditure	54,153	2	2
Recoveries for Interest on Constructed Railways	49,454	8	0
	£1,806,450	19	3

The expenditure, honorable gentlemen will see, amounted to £1,930,886 7s. 1d., and consisted of these items,—

Civil List	27,391	15	0
Charges of Colonial Debt ...	590,831	6	2

Brought forward	1,483,863	5	10
Moiety of Stamp Duty	57,207	9	0
Payments to Provinces (Capitation and Special Allowance)	272,861	19	9
Advances from Land Fund, Auckland	201	4	5

The Treasurer estimated last year that he would have to pay, before the 30th June, £742,807, and there was actually only paid, for reasons partly stated by Sir Julius Vogel, £590,000. I shall call attention to this again; meantime the figures show the total amount of expenditure of cash paid was £1,930,886, and the revenue was only £1,806,450, leaving a deficit between the receipts and expenditure, without including Treasury bills, of £124,435. I have endeavoured to ascertain what the liabilities and assets were for the year; I do not speak of the liabilities and assets of the previous year, but for the year ending 30th June last. By the accounts presented to this House by the Colonial Treasurer on the 15th August last, the liabilities were stated to be £59,614 12s. 10d.; there was also due to provinces under "Payment to Provinces Act, 1872," a sum of £3,963 0s. 3d. The honorable gentleman now makes the total amount £90,410 12s. 2d. The assets due from the Imperial Government on account of postage were stated to be £12,500. The interest from provinces on account of railways of the provinces was £7,681 14s. 3d., leaving a balance of £43,395 18s. 10d., of outstanding liabilities in excess of assets. Now I wish to call the attention of the Committee to a very important item—that is, the interest and sinking fund on the debt due by the colony. Some of these amounts were due upon the 1st of July, and some upon the 15th. The Treasurer, in making his statement last year, made provision for the payment of the amounts which would then become due. The amount due on the 1st July was £9,369, and the amount due on the 15th July was £123,384, making altogether £132,753, which the Treasurer estimated to pay last year, but which he did not pay. The reason that money was not paid was that the Public Revenues Act was passed last year, after the honorable gentleman made his statement. I would direct attention to the 8th section of that Act, which states,—

"For payment of the charges of the Public Debt, the order on the Bank shall be in the form in the Third Schedule hereto annexed, and the amount named therein shall be paid over to the agent or agents duly appointed to pay such charges, who shall be named in such order. All such charges shall be finally charged upon the Consolidated Fund upon the day upon which the same become due, and the order for the issue to meet the same shall bear the same date accordingly."

The next section I consider to be of very great importance—

"For payment of all other claims upon the Government of New Zealand in the United Kingdom, the order on the Bank shall be in the form in the fourth schedule hereto annexed, and the Bank shall transfer the amount named therein from the New Zealand Public Account to a separate branch of the same, called the 'Foreign Imprest Account,' and all sums so transferred shall be deemed to be imprested to the Agent-General."

So I take it that, in order to have these amounts in the Bank in London to meet the payments, if there were no proceeds of the loan there, they would require an imprest account, and therefore that amount would be charged to the Consolidated Revenue for the year just past. I am aware or I suppose that there might be an arrangement made by which the Agent-General could draw upon the colony here for the amount; but of course the colony would have to pay for that. What I wish to point out is, that by avoiding the payment of that money, the available balance is apparently £132,753 more than it should be. I think that is very important. There is another matter which is also of importance. The interest on the four million is, I understand, payable half-yearly, on the 1st February and the 1st August. The amount payable on the 1st of August last was £90,000, and the amount of accrued interest upon the 30th June would be £75,000; and yet provision is to be made in London for the payment of the interest when it becomes due. That amount should be provided by remittance from this some two months before the payment is actually required, but it is a fact that last year we only paid something like three-quarters interest on the public debt. Although that cannot occur this year, it must not be forgotten that there will be still that outstanding amount for which provision must be made either by the Agent drawing upon the colony, or by the colony finding the money here some two months before it is actually necessary to make the payment in London. To summarize, as I have shown, the expenditure in excess of revenue amounted to £125,435. The liabilities in excess of outstanding assets during that year would be £43,000. The liabilities on account of accrued interest and sinking fund are £207,000, altogether £376,584. If we deduct the £75,000 due on the 1st August, there will be a sum of about £300,000 of a deficiency in the amount estimated by the Treasurer. I know that this is made up. I know that the honorable gentlemen have issued £172,000 worth of Treasury bills; I know that they have not paid the interest and sinking fund which they estimated they would have to pay, and therefore there is £60,000 as a bank balance. I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to this fact, which the Treasurer himself will not deny: We are told that we have an available balance of £60,000, but that available balance is made up of promissory notes or Treasury bills, which have been renewed for another five years. There is a sum of £132,000 interest and sinking fund, which is not paid, and which the Treasurer last year said he would provide for. Now, Sir, the honorable gentleman states that he does not propose to abandon the claims upon the provinces for the amounts which have been advanced. There was a sum of £48,000 advanced to Auckland; £32,000 advanced to Westland under the Provincial Appropriations Extension Act. There was a sum of £36,000 advanced under the Public Works Advances Act; and I think the honorable gentleman must see that it is perfectly hopeless to expect ever to get these moneys back again. I must say that, however they may look on the accounts, the fact is we shall never get these amounts back again.

Major ATKINSON.—We have taken them out of the accounts.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I understand that. I am taking the tables published with the Financial Statement.

Major ATKINSON.—They are taken out of the accounts.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I understand the honorable gentleman to take them out; but he states that he does not propose to abandon them. He has not taken the £172,000 of Treasury bills out of the account. That is a liability which must be met some time, or must be added to the permanent debt. I think the honorable gentleman must see that. If, then, there is an available balance, it is made up out of proceeds of Treasury bills.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The honorable gentleman will be able to show that when he replies; but I put it as it appears in the accounts, and I have looked into them with some little care. It seems to me, whether rightly or wrongly—and I shall be glad if the honorable gentleman can show that I am wrong—that, so far from our having a balance in our favour from last year, if the interest and sinking fund were paid up to the 15th June we shall be £300,000 to the bad. The late Treasurer puts down the amount of assets available from the previous year at £63,000; but, as far as I can make out, the amount of assets from the previous year is only £52,000, made up in this way: Amount from railways open for traffic, £9,000; Railway Stores Account, £20,000—this was taken as an asset in previous year's statement; Imperial Government, on account of postage, £11,000; recoverable from Auckland under the Provincial Works Advances Act, £12,000. To that extent, these amounts, which the honorable gentleman put down as assets for the year 1874-75, have been received; but I do not see that the portion of the assets which he expected to begin the year with, and which was stated last year as £50,000 recoverable from the provinces in respect of the Provincial Works Advances Act, can be recovered. I understand he puts that down as a bad debt, or not likely to be recovered for some time at all events. The recoveries from previous years are, therefore, at the outside, £50,000 or £60,000. Having disposed of that matter, not in the manner I should like to dispose of it; but as I see it, I wish now to consider what the proposals of the honorable gentleman are for the present year. He estimates the Customs revenue at £1,240,000, or £14,234 in excess of what was obtained last year. But he was warned last year by many honorable members, myself amongst others, that the Customs revenue had reached its utmost limit. He thought, no doubt, he was making a very modest estimate when he put this year's revenue down at so much in excess of last year; but he was warned last year that the revenue had reached its limit, and he was told why. He was told that from 1866 to 1871 the population of the colony had increased by about 60,000 people, and that, notwithstanding that increase, the Customs revenue had fallen off by upwards of £100,000. It was stated that in 1866 there were 197,360 Europeans in the colony, and the Customs revenue was £343,230; that in 1871 there were 260,900 Europeans in the colony, and that the Customs revenue was £730,833. So that there was a falling-off of more than £100,000 in the revenue, notwithstanding the immense increase in population of between 60,000 and 70,000. It was also pointed out that an increase in population did not necessarily cause an increase in revenue; but that it was due to the increased purchasing power of the people, which enabled them to buy dutiable goods. The honorable gentleman stated last night that he had made a reduction upon his predecessor's estimate of the Customs revenue on account of the fall in the price of wool; but he nevertheless estimates an increase of £14,000 upon last year's revenue. Allow me to draw attention to the remarks of an able business man and a thorough financier in a neighbouring colony. They bear exactly upon this point, and I do not think I shall be taking up the time of the Committee unnecessarily if I fortify my opinion by that of a gentleman of much larger experience, and one who is as thoroughly able to form a sound opinion as any man in these colonies. I allude to Sir James McCulloch. He stated in his Budget speech, delivered in the Parliament of Victoria on the 25th of July last,—

"We expect to receive, through the Customs, £1,639,050, or £18,700 less than was obtained from that source last year. It may be asked, What reason is there for thinking that there will not be received through the Customs this year as much as was received last year, if not more? My answer is, that I think the present aspect of affairs in the colony is not as prosperous as was the aspect of affairs last year. Taking the interests of the colony as a whole, and considering the weather and the present state of the wool market, you cannot avoid the conclusion that the trade of the country may be seriously affected during the current year. There is no doubt whatever that the reduction in the value of wool will affect the amount of money to be received into the colony during the current year to the extent of a million or a million and a quarter. That is a very serious amount for a colony of between 800,000 and 900,000 people, because the diminution affects all classes. It may be said that principally it touches the squatting interest—those engaged in pastoral pursuits in this colony and in the neighbouring colony. But the

The Treasurer in Victoria made a reduction in his estimate of revenue, and stated that a fall of £1,000,000 in the price of wool must seriously affect the spending power of 800,000 people. But how will the fall of £1,000,000, or thereabouts, in the value of wool in New Zealand, affect the spending power of less than half that number of people? And yet the Treasurer estimates an increase on last year's revenue, instead of a decrease as Sir James McCulloch did. My belief—and I regret very much that I have arrived at the conclusion—is that, so far from our Customs revenue being so great as last year, it will be very considerably less. I think the honorable gentleman's estimate will in all probability exceed the actual revenue by £40,000. Whatever it may be, it is of course a matter of opinion now, as the honorable gentleman says; but he was wrong in his opinion last year to the extent of nearly £100,000, therefore the opinion of those who differ from him is as likely to be correct as his own. The estimate formed for the six months of the present year of profit upon railways constructed is £84,000. Last year he estimated the difference between the amount to be received and the amount to be expended at £20,000; but he was upwards of £13,000 in error in that estimate. I am aware that in this case also the estimate for the current year is only a matter of opinion: but as the honorable gentleman was wrong last year, I fear he is not more likely to be right this year. If you take £20,000 from that amount as well as the amount to be taken from the Customs revenue, I do not think it will be under-estimating the amount of revenue for the present year to say that it will be £60,000 less than the honorable gentleman estimates. I hope it may be shown that I am wrong, but I fear it is very probable that such will be the case. I had made out an estimate of the probable deficit which would arise from the necessity to find money to pay interest and sinking fund upon the debts of some of the provinces; but the honorable gentleman has, in a form which I think will rather astonish the country, made out figures on this point which I must take as correct, seeing that they stand out so distinctly that there can be no doubt about them. During the six months from the end of December to the end of June, there will be £146,595 to the debit of the provinces. To meet this debit balance, he proposes to issue Treasury bills. There are three credit balances—Taranaki, £18,000; Canterbury, £75,000; and Otago, £1,240. A portion of that Canterbury balance is made up of £40,000 to be received on the 1st May for pasturage rents, which are payable yearly, so that it is in excess if considered as a half-yearly estimate. So that, if we deduct the credit balance from the debit balance, there will actually be £57,113 18s. 7d., for which the Treasurer will have to issue Treasury bills after he absorbs the whole of the Land Fund from all the provinces. Without absorbing that Land Fund, he must issue for the half-year Treasury bills to the amount of £146,000; and I think we may fear that for the whole year there will be something like £300,000 to debit. I am aware that a portion of the £172,000 of Treasury bills has gone to pay a portion of the current expenses for the provinces to the 31st December; but, that being the amount for the half-year, I think it is not an over-estimate to say that at the end of the year they will be £250,000 in debt to the General Government. Now, Sir, the honorable gentleman intends to issue Treasury bills to the extent of £50,000 to meet the expenditure. Well, I have shown that, so far from there being a real surplus to go on with, it was made up of proceeds from Treasury bills.

Major ATKINSON.—No such thing.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The interest and sinking fund which should have been paid on the 15th June was not charged to last year; and the conclusion we must all come to is, that, if there be no Treasury bills, it will be impossible for the current revenue to meet the current expenses. That is not a happy state of things. There were £400,000 of Treasury bills outstanding two years ago. We have to add £172,000 for last year, and we propose to add £150,000 this year. We propose to borrow £250,000 to pay off provincial liabilities on account of works contracted for; and I will ask honorable members if that is a pleasant position to be landed in? I am aware that honorable members will say that we have a large railway property, that by-and-by it will be more productive than it is at present, and that there need be no fear for the future. I also think there need be no fear of our surviving our present difficulties and the perils looming in the future, if we look them fairly in the face; but if we go on increasing our debt by issuing Treasury bills to meet current expenditure, there will be great fear. Last year it was pointed out by the honorable member for Wairarapa, in reply to a statement I made about the indebtedness of this colony compared to that of Great Britain, that we had not taken into account the railways of Great Britain. Those railways, in round numbers, come to about £550,000,000, and if we put that down at 5 per cent., and add it to amount of interest on the National Debt, it would come to upwards of £50,000,000 a year; but if England had to pay that to a foreign creditor, I would like to know what would her position be? Now, we owe a debt of nearly £20,000,000 to the foreign creditor, and the interest payable annually on that amount goes out of the country; and it is estimated—other honorable members will show what the exact figures are—that the private indebtedness of this colony amounts to something like £10,000,000, interest upon which has also to be sent Home every year to the shareholders of the banks, private companies, and individuals who send money out to the colony for investment. That amounts to nearly £2,000,000, which has to be sent Home from the colony annually. The private indebtedness is an important item when we are considering the whole debt of the colony; and I ask the House and the country to consider whether, with such a large public and private debt hanging over our heads, it is not time that we should set our house in order, and prepare for the future—that we should cease to think that the miserable expedient of issuing Treasury bills is a safe or wise mode of meeting a great difficulty. Sir, when we look at foreign countries we may gather some idea of what may be in store for us. And here I wish to point out, before I go further, that we have no store, no accumulated savings of money amongst the great mass of the people. If any of us purchase 1,000 acres of land, we go to a bank or some other place to borrow money to fence and stock it. There is scarcely one of us who works within his means. I do not mean to say that borrowing is objectionable, provided we go to work wisely; but do not let us forget that the interest which we have to pay upon our colonial debt is paid to a foreign country. The war expenses of France, when she was invaded by Germany, including war indemnity, amounted to something like £370,000,000 in three years. Upon the conclusion of peace France was called upon to pay £200,000,000 war indemnity, and it was provided by loan, largely subscribed for by the French themselves, and the money paid from the savings and thrift of the people. If she had had to go into the money markets of foreign countries she would have found it impossible to get that money. Now let us take other countries that have exhausted their savings. Take the case of Spain: what are her bonds worth at the present moment? Then again, look at Egypt, which was at one time, and is now, a great grain-exporting country. What is the condition of her finances? They were in such a hopeless state of confusion that it was necessary to send a gentleman from England to examine into their condition. Take Turkey. She is in a state of bankruptcy, and from what course does this result proceed? From the fact that the people themselves are not in a position to assist the Government. That is the point to which I wish chiefly to direct attention. To a large extent we are in the hands of the foreign creditor, and we must decrease our expenses and increase our exports to keep ourselves in a safe condition. Having said this much, I merely wish now, Sir, to add that, if we apply ourselves resolutely to the very difficult task which we have before us, all will yet be well. Last year this difficulty was like a cloud upon the horizon—a cloud not bigger than a man's hand; but this year it has spread to the zenith, and if we are not careful, we shall be overwhelmed by the storm. I ask honorable members now to consider the position of the country, and to ask themselves whether the time has not come for making, not a cheese-paring, but a large reduction in the expenses of the country. I ask them not to put it off to another year, when we may find our Customs revenue, and, indeed, the whole of our receipts very much decreased, and the financial difficulty not apparent, but actually come upon us. It will be too late then to consider what we should do. I pointed out last year that the time would come, and come soon, when we should be compelled to put a tax on property. I know such a tax is unpopular. The late Colonial Treasurer (Sir Julius Vogel) said it was unpopular, and therefore inexpedient; but as sure as I stand here at this moment it will have to come. The honorable member for Olive took that view last year, and asked the Government whether they would, during the recess, devise a scheme of that sort; and this Government, or whatever Government comes after them, will have to do it. It is wise, now that we cannot make the two ends meet, to consider how they can be made to meet. I know that my views will be regarded as gloomy. I have been told that we are about to borrow, and that it is not wise, under these circumstances, to bring discredit upon the finances of the country; but I believe the best friends of the country are those who fearlessly speak the truth; and it is because I believe that it will require all the patience, all the energy, all the prudence, and all the hopefulness of our people to meet the difficulty that is coming upon us that I have felt it to be my duty to speak freely. I do not speak with any desire to make the financial position appear worse than it is. My character, I think, will protect me from the charge of knowingly saying anything that would damage the credit of the colony. I also have some little stake in the country, and I intend to live in it for the rest of my days. Sir, I wish to avert the calamity which may overtake us if we do not exercise ordinary prudence; and I hope and trust that the Committee will believe that I am actuated by these feelings, and not by any desire to make the finance of the honorable gentleman look worse than it really is. I commend to this Committee very great prudence and very great care in dealing with the estimates. I know well that honorable members cannot make reductions in this or that salary; but I am sure that the time has come now when we should say to Ministers, "So much we can afford to give you; we give you a lump sum for each department, and you must make that do." I think the time has come for that. I would not move a resolution in that direction because it might lead to a complication; but if Mr. Speaker had been in the chair I would have moved to this effect: "That it be an instruction to the Committee that the financial condition of the country imperatively demands that extensive reductions should be made in nearly all the departments of the public service." Sir, I have done, and I am sorry I could not take a more satisfactory view, a more hopeful view, of the finances of the country. I have given, I fear very imperfectly, what I believe to be the position of the finances of the country, and I trust that honorable members will consider this a far more serious question than any that has yet come before us.

Sir G. GREY.—I move, That you report progress, Sir, and ask leave to sit again. We are entitled to a reply to the speech which has just been delivered.

Major ATKINSON.—I certainly object to reporting progress. I have put my views before the country, and nothing the honorable member for Akaroa has said has shaken a single statement

I made. In due course, I will refer to the honorable member's remarks, but a Minister cannot be expected to get up to answer every honorable member who makes a speech. The honorable gentleman has not touched one of my figures or one of my facts; and I will undertake to prove that to the Committee at the proper time.

Mr. STOUT.—I think the Premier is right. He cannot be expected to answer every speech that is made. But is the honorable gentleman's party organisation in such a state that he has no one to put up to reply to the honorable member for Akaroa? There appears to be no one to speak upon finance except the Premier, and one would think there was no one competent on that side of the House to do so. I may say it was the same last year. I have noticed, that when a debate on finance comes on, three-fourths of the members of the House retire, as if they do not care a fig about the finances of the country. Some honorable members, to whom we have a right to look for some criticism upon finance, are content to say "Hear, hear," to the Premier, and never bother their heads with taking part in any debate that comes on. To decide whether the honorable member for Akaroa has touched the figures of the Premier or not would require some little study; but I think he has made this point, which all members who have taken the trouble to go over the accounts must be cognizant of—that is, that the colony has been, as stated by the honorable member for Dunedin City, Mr. Macandrew, lately, expending more money than its ordinary revenue. Of course, that difficulty is met out of loans and Treasury bills.

Major ATKINSON.—I stated so.

Mr. STOUT.—No doubt the Premier admitted it, but he did not go far enough. I think he ought to have proposed a remedy. There are two remedies that might be applied. The first is that the Government should dispense with a large amount of the additional services they are creating. The tendency has been to create new departments, such as the Forest Department, the Weather Department, and all kinds of departments; and this increase is still going on. We are going to have an Inspector of Prisons' Department; and we should have had other expenditure in reference to a central prison if the House had not stopped it. Then there will be a Lunatic Asylums Department, and others. If Parliament insists on new departments being created, honorable members cannot expect but that they will have to be paid for. One or both of the remedies must be adopted. The first is that all these extra departments must be swept away, and the functions of the Government limited; and the other remedy is, that all the higher salaries should be reduced. That should be done, considering the position the colony has got into. Of course it is well known that in mercantile and other circles salaries rise and fall according to the prosperity of the country; and the remedy I now see is, that all salaries over £200 or £250 a year should be proportionately reduced upon a sliding scale. But that must be done by the Government. It is hopeless to move a motion to that effect, for it would be made a vote of want of confidence by the Government. The only hope of any retrenchment rests with the Government coming down determined to make some stand such as I have indicated. It is utterly useless to discuss finance here; and we might keep up a debate for two or three weeks on it, but what would it amount to? It would amount to this: If any one tabled a motion with reference to expenditure, the Government would say, "Oh, abolition is threatened," and their supporters would rush into the lobbies to support them. All the Opposition can do is to point out the state the colony had got into, and point out two remedies—the two I have mentioned. The figures of the honorable member for Akaroa may be incorrect, in one or two respects; but the difference is only as to the method of taking the accounts. The only objection that can be made to this statement, with reference to Treasury bills and in relation to the debit balances against the provinces, is a mere matter of account. These balances are treated by the Colonial Treasurer as an asset, not an available asset at present. He charges them against the provinces; but the late Treasurer was going to raise a loan of three-quarters of a million in order to repay to the colony these advances to the provinces, and he intended, I presume, to charge interest to the provinces. The Premier now proposed to do this: to take these items and make them a charge against the provinces, and not to raise a loan to pay them off. I presume the charge against the provinces will amount to this: When the necessities of the colony required it, the Government would seize upon the Land Fund to repay those advances, when there was any Land Fund to seize upon. There have been advances to Otago under "The Provincial Public Works Advances Act, 1875;" and if the Land Fund of that province should be more than sufficient to pay the subsidies for counties and Road Boards, I have no doubt that the Treasury would say, "Here is an advance made to Otago. You must repay this out of the Land Fund." That is what is meant. Those provinces in which there is a possibility of having a surplus Land Fund would have their Land Fund taken; and those in which there was no possibility of a surplus Land Fund would have the advances standing in the Treasury books against them, and nothing more would be done. Everybody sees that is the position in which the matter would be left. I do not intend to take up the time of the Committee with any lengthy statement of finance, because it seems utterly useless to do so. It seems to me that the proposed charge upon Land Fund, and the estimated receipts, as now submitted to the House, show at once that the tabulated statements submitted by the Treasurer last year as to the effect abolition would have upon the provinces are utterly fallacious. Not one of them is at all reliable. For instance, Otago was to have, over and above its subsidies, something like £150,000 a year for public works.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. STOUT.—My memory may be inaccurate to a very slight extent. But, according to the tables published by the Treasurer, showing the financial results of the new scheme—

Major ATKINSON.—Based upon the provincial estimates of the Land Fund.

Mr. STOUT.—Was the honorable gentleman not told by the honorable member for Akaroa, by the honorable member for Taieri, and by myself, that his estimate of Land Fund was utterly fallacious?

Major ATKINSON.—It was taken from their own estimates.

Mr. STOUT.—I shall take Otago, for instance. The amount which it was said would be available for public works in the country districts was set down as £154,891. That amount was to be available for public works in the country districts of Otago. What do we see now? The statement submitted by the Treasurer shows that there will be left for six months a balance of £1,244, or about £2,500 for the year, out of the £154,891 that was to be available for public works in the country. This is a sample of the manner in which the electorates of this colony have been deluded by the finance of the Ministry. I do not quote all the provinces, but take the Province of Otago as an example, because I have near me the statistics bearing on the public works in that province. I find that the works to be constructed in country districts are to amount to £154,891. I find that that is all the province could expect, as stated by the Treasurer; and he said at the same time that there would be a gain to the province of something like £50,000 or £60,000 under this scheme compared with the past arrangement. I now hold in my hand the report of the Provincial Engineer; and I find that the total expended on roads, bridges, harbours, and waterworks amounts to £159,587, or something like £5,000 more than what the Treasurer said was to be expended under Abolition, not including also the large sum of money—I believe more than half this amount—expended on branch railways throughout different parts of the province. I will take another example—that of the Province of Auckland; and I find that under the proposed scheme, as stated by the Treasurer last year, he makes Auckland to be a gainer by £90,000. Not only so, but all that was to be issued to meet this extra £90,000 that Auckland was to get was £36,000 of Treasury bills. Well, under the present scheme Auckland has not got any £90,000, and the Treasury bills required to meet Auckland's liability will amount to £60,338. Take, again, the Province of Westland. Under the present scheme in Westland, there was to be expended on public works £34,433. Why, according to the statement of the Government now, Westland, instead of having anything to expend, would actually be in debt to the amount of £14,925. And so all through. One has only to take up the statement of last year, and read the one this year, and it is impossible almost to believe that they were made by the same honorable gentleman—they are so irreconcilable and diverse. I need not go into the Provincial Abolition Financial Arrangements Bill. It is well known to the House, if it is not known to the country, that all the promises made in connection with the Abolition Bill last session are to be broken; that all the pledges made about what was to be cast upon the Consolidated Revenue are to be treated as if they had never been made, and are not intended to be kept. Of course that is merely what the Abolitionists are to expect under this régime. I would now draw the Treasurer's attention to the position affecting these colonial grants. First, he says that, after all the paring down of the provincial public works, there will be required, to carry on the works to June next, a sum of £350,000 from loan. It must be observed that the fixing of that £350,000 assumes that the whole of the guaranteed debentures of £800,000 have been utilized to the fullest extent. Of course, the Treasurer says he does not intend to sell them; he intends to draw upon them—in fact, to mortgage or pawn them. But it will be seen, with reference to this £800,000, that it is hardly fair to say that they are only going to borrow £350,000. The real amount of borrowing—that is, the debentures that will require to be either sold or pledged—will be the £800,000 of the Imperial Guaranteed Debentures, and this new loan of £350,000. Then there will also be an amount—I think it is put down in the statement as something like £400,000—to carry on the works after June, and before authority can be got from this Assembly to raise a new loan. Now, with this statement before us, I would ask the Committee to consider what is proposed to be done. I am afraid, if we are to judge of the estimates made last year and the results, we shall find that the estimates made last year were utterly unreliable in many respects, and that is so even with the estimates made this year by the late Treasurer. He himself estimated the Customs revenue to amount to a certain sum, and it was stated in the Committee last night by the Commissioner of Customs that the receipts for the quarter had been something like £10,000 less than what was estimated.

An Hon. MEMBER.—£5,000.

Mr. STOUT.—At any rate it was not up to the estimate. If you take the average for the year, and divide the estimated Customs revenue by four, the amount received for the past quarter will not equal the estimate of the late Treasurer. I presume that cannot be denied. Very well, we have still this estimated surplus of £58,000, based upon the estimate of revenue—really about the same estimate of revenue, because there has only been £20,000 taken off at the rate of £5,000 a quarter; and I think even that will be found to be too little to take off. There is the estimated surplus of £58,000; and of that estimated surplus there is a sum of £10,000 to be taken from the State Forests Account. I presume it is known to the members of this House that the Bill proposing to repeal the State Forests Act has been thrown out in another place, and the £10,000 therefore will not be available.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, it is.

Mr. STOUT.—I do not see how the Treasurer can alter it except by Bill. The State Forests Act says there is to be a certain amount paid to a certain account. Of course the honorable gentleman may take the £10,000 out of the State Forests Account, and give that account Treasury bills for it. That is the only way he can manage it. The Government said the only objection that they had to the repeal of the State Forests Act was that some of the clauses should be retained, they being willing that the money clauses should be repealed. Yet we find the Colonial Secretary in another place voting against the repeal of the Act, and the £10,000 is here actually taken credit for. That is a most peculiar system of management. Is it a fact that there is one policy in this Chamber and another policy in the other Chamber, in dealing with matters of finance? I cannot conceive how the Colonial Secretary can take an opportunity of speaking against the repeal of an Act and voting against such repeal, while the Colonial Treasurer in this House is taking credit for £10,000 on the strength of the Act being repealed. That is £10,000 of the surplus gone, because there must be another Act; and I may presume the Legislative Council, having thrown out one Act with the aid of the Colonial Secretary, will not allow another Act to be passed. Then what have we stated now? We have not only £10,000 of the surplus gone, but we have got the supplementary estimates; and does any person mean to say that if there are any supplementary estimates they will not amount to £48,000? And this is even with all the paring down of the estimates that the Government have been able to do during all the time they have had to consider them. When we have to go into the money market, and when, besides, the Treasurer has to admit all through his statement that the Colonial Government has been expending more money than it can properly expend, in the midst of all this we have a promise made to-day by the Minister for Public Works that they are going to spend more money on the Waimea Water-race. I understand that that water-race has cost something like £50,000 or £60,000, and I believe before it is finished it will cost about £120,000—at least double the estimated cost. Before they can utilize the Waimea Water-race, it will cost something like £20,000 or £30,000 more. And we are going into all this expenditure for what? Why, it is in order to give substantial endowments to the counties; and it is in order to aid in what? In abolition. That is the only object that can be entertained by the Ministry in re-organizing the finances of the country. Now, one has only to look at the conduct of the Government during this session to see that they appear utterly unable to cope with the finances of the country. They bring down one Abolition Financial Arrangements Bill that is to make certain proposals. As soon as that Bill comes down, apparently the Ministry, or some of their supporters, get frightened at the effect of the policy, and another Abolition Financial Arrangements Bill is brought down. No doubt it may be so amended in Committee that the Government themselves will say that the pressure has been too great for them, as they have said since 1870. I have already stated what seems to me the only radical cure for this; and I say again, that there is no hope of a cure coming from mere resolutions of private members, or even from any statement coming from the Opposition. I do not intend to go into the other Financial Statement; but may be permitted only to remark, in reference to it, that I think credit must be given to the present Colonial Treasurer for the clearness, and, I think, fairness, in which he puts all his Financial Statements. But I can only say there seems to me to be no hope whatever of a good finance for this colony until a Ministry resolves to lay down a hard and fast line against this perpetual keeping of debit balances and Treasury bills. If there are to be loans raised for the colony, let them be raised for special works. If there are departments of the Government to be carried on, they all ought to be brought into the Consolidated Revenue Account. It was a most mischievous system to keep a lot of debit balances, credit balances, and Treasury bills—transferring from one account to another. I suppose, in regard to the State Forests Account, instead of having a real sum there will be a Treasury bill, and opposite the account there will be the entry, "Treasury bill, Dr. £10,000." Then that £10,000 is taken into the general finance. This system cannot go on for ever. What is the result of that plan? I undertake to say that next year there will have to be another £150,000 of Treasury bills at the lowest; and where is this going to end? It will go on until there must be a loan to extend the term of the Treasury bills—that is, a loan proposed to take up the Treasury bills. That is what it amounts to; and, if this system goes on, I believe in three or four years we shall need a loan of at least £1,000,000 to take up the Treasury bills outstanding, or else we shall have not only to part with the subsidies, but to make the Land Fund common property. That is the only remedy for it. I admit at once that to suddenly uproot any system, however vicious it may be, is not wise; but the Government ought to lay down a hard and fast line and say, "We will now begin to live within our income, and we will not give way to this system of short bills." If they had done that, and also come down to this House with the statement that they regarded the keeping of a good financial system for the colony as even of more moment than creating counties for the colony; and if they had said to their party, "We not only propose this reduction, but we also propose reducing those departments in every way possible; curtailing Government interference, and leaving it to the people to manage their own affairs, without so much Government supervision"—if they had done that, there might have been some hope of creating a good finance for the colony. But under the present system it is all very well for the Treasurer to speak about his hope of this being done and that being done: the Ministry must do it, and they must also be men pledged to do this. They ought to say to this House, "Except we can have this financial improvement or financial reform carried out, we shall leave it to other people to go in and carry out any scheme they please." So long as it is necessary for the existence of the Government that there shall be promised votes here and there as simply methods of indirect bribes, so long will good finance for New Zealand be impossible. I say, if the Ministry had not attempted to do so many things in one session they would have got on much better. If they had brought down, as I have said a dozen times during the session, ten or twenty Bills—and that was all the legislation that was necessary for this colony for a year—if they had brought down Bills dealing with the constitutional question from their own point of view and had brought down real reform in finance, they would have been entitled to credit on all sides of the House, and also entitled to credit from the country. But what have they done? They have frittered away the time of the Parliament in discussing useless Bills that could have stood over for ten years to come, as they were not at all required. They have left their constitutional measures over to the end of the session, and they have deferred the debate on finance until this late period of the session, and when the debate on finance comes on three-fourths of their supporters leave the House as if the financial position of the colony was a matter of no moment. It is absurd to tell us that this is the way to insure good government for this colony. I say there could be no petty Road Board, or what I may now term County Council, or any Provincial Council that would have allowed its finances to be managed as the colonial finance has been managed. Yet this Parliament assumes that it has all the virtue, all the good management, all the desire for economy, that exist in the colony; and that all those institutions that have managed their affairs so well in the past are to be swept away, and this Parliament is to do the work of the colony. One has only to take up even the estimates submitted last night to find that the higher salaries are, in some instances, being increased. I see that in Canterbury the salary of one officer is increased from £500 to £700, and it is proposed to increase the salary of an officer in Otago from £800, which it was last year, to £700. So you see that the salaries, instead of being reduced, are being increased. Yet the Government talk of financial pressure, of going to the money market, and of practising economy. I say what I have said before: that to discuss finance in this House would be of no value, because the House has been elected on a cry. The whole cry of the Ministry this session and that of their supporters has been that of Abolition. When any one attempted to get any matter discussed in this House the cry of Abolition has been raised, and calm and dispassionate criticism of any action of the Government has been prevented. And so it will be in relation to finance. I can only say that the Opposition must feel this: that to discuss finance or to talk about finance is really not much better than a waste of time. It rests with the Government and their supporters if the finances of the colony have been improperly carried on, and are likely to be so in the future.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—I am sure the Government must be thankful to the honorable gentleman for the lecture he has given them; but I doubt if they will profit by it. If his figures were reliable, the Government might have taken his statement to heart, but seeing that he rather misrepresents matters, I shall endeavour to place a correct statement before the Committee so as to show what the actual results will be to the Province of Otago—the province I may be said to represent in the Government. The honorable gentleman has taken the Colonial Treasurer's tables of last year, which were prepared from the estimates of the Provincial Government, the correctness of which is tested by the fact of the revenue having fallen short of those estimates over £100,000, but he does not read the statement at the head of the tables which show they were made up from Provincial Estimates. We will take the estimates of the Provincial Government of Otago. The estimated receipts of that Province, as shown from these tables, amounted to £262,610; while the actual receipts, including all sums contributed by the General Government, amounted to only £252,124, showing a deficiency of £102,486. This goes a long way to explain the difference alluded to by the honorable gentleman, and it is attributable to the incorrect estimate by the provincial authorities of their income. Let me show the honorable gentleman what are the actual results of the year. The figures I am going to quote are taken from the actual revenue and expenditure, as shown in Provincial Gazette of 16th June last, and I challenge any honorable member to dispute their accuracy. It is certainly true that Otago does not lose a halfpenny by abolition. The honorable gentleman goes to meetings and says that Otago is robbed of large sums of money. It is very easy to make a statement of that kind, but my honorable colleague challenged the honorable member for Dunedin to put down his figures and he has never done so. I am going to give the exact figures so far as they relate to the Province of Otago, so that honorable members will have an opportunity of disputing their accuracy if they think proper to do so.

Total revenue of year ended 31st March, 1876, as stated by Provincial Treasurer in Provincial Gazette of 16th June, 1876, page 348 ...	534,124	5	5

I also deduct the sum of ...	14,293	18	6
received from the General Government as subsidies to Road Boards; that sum having been paid over to the Road Boards as an instalment of the measure of Abolition—it would not have been paid under ordinary circumstances, and in order to reduce the provincial revenue to its proper terms, I deduct it from the account				86,397	15	0
				447,836	10	5

Capitation ...	2,161	12	9
Crown Lands ...	193,347	12	5

	437,836	10	5

I will now proceed to show how this revenue of £437,836 10s. 5d. is proposed to be dealt with under the Government proposals.

Capitation, £2,161 12s. 9d.: Payment of this sum would cease; and in the summary of Gain and Loss, to which I shall presently refer, this sum will be entered as a loss.

Road Board subsidies: Under the proposals of the Government the subsidies payable out of Consolidated Fund to Road Boards in the Province of Otago will amount to £19,830, and those to Municipalities to £15,214: in all, £35,044, which sum is entered in the summary as so much gain.

Crown Lands, £193,347 12s. 5d., will remain, as before, provincial revenue, but will be subject to certain charges, to which I shall refer in dealing with the expenditure side of the account.

Gold Fields Revenue, £37,696 0s. 6d., and Gold Duty, £12,647 8s. 11d., will be handed over to the counties and Road Boards.

Harbour and Jetty Dues, £1,406 8s. 11d., will be taken over by the colony. I accordingly set it down as a loss.

Assessments on Stock, £53,858 11s. 3d., will remain as heretofore in the Land Fund.

Dock Dues, £2,261 12s. 8d., will remain as at present.

Tolls on Roads, £10,045 6s., will be handed over to the counties.

Dog and Goat Tax, £1,877 9s. 6d., and Licenses, £6,403 8s. 6d., will be paid over to the boroughs and counties in which they are levied.

Education fees, rates, and rents, £5,786 10s. 9d., will be paid into the Land Fund, and devoted to educational purposes.

Railways, £104,807 1s. 9d.: The receipts from railways will be paid into the Consolidated Fund of the colony, and I have accordingly entered the amount in the Gain and Loss Statement as a loss.

Interest, £507 8s. 11d., will pass to the credit of the colony, and I set it down as a loss.

Incidental receipts, £6,020 17s. 7d.: This sum is made up of a variety of items, about one-half of which will be taken by the colony; the other half remain for expenditure in the province—say loss on this item, £3,010.

I have thus completed my examination of the Provincial Treasurer's statement of the revenue; and, so far, have shown, in respect to each item, the gain or loss which would have taken place had the proposals of the Government been in operation during the provincial financial year last past.

I will now show to what extent the province is affected as regards expenditure.

First, then, the interest and sinking fund on the provincial permanent debt is in future to be charged upon the Land Fund, instead of being paid as heretofore out of the capitation allowance granted by the Colonial Government. As the capitation grant will cease under the Abolition proposals, I set down this item, amounting to say £80,000, as a loss of that amount. Then the province is to be charged with 2 per cent. on the sum already expended in the construction of railways, less the province's share of the Middle Island Railway Fund, say 2 per cent. on £1,744,800, equal to £34,886 per annum; this sum I also enter as a loss. On the other hand, by the existing system, the Land Fund of the province is liable by law to a payment of 6 per cent. interest on the sum expended upon railways open for traffic. The sum so expended in respect of railways opened prior to 30th June, 1876, is £1,067,372 17s. 2d., and the interest chargeable thereon £64,042 7s. 6d. I have treated the sum of £34,886, payable under the Abolition proposals, as a loss, and, as the above-mentioned sum of £64,042 7s. 6d. will no longer be charged, I set it down as a gain of that amount.

I now come to the gain accruing to the province from its being relieved of the cost of those services which will in future be maintained out of the Consolidated Revenue; and I have accordingly taken out from the Provincial Treasurer's statement for the past year the actual sums expended on those services. They are as follow (and in order to facilitate reference and verification, I quote, opposite to each, the page of the Gazette on which the several items appear):—

There are, no doubt, other items of expenditure made last year by the province which will in future either be a saving, or will fall upon the colony, such as—and others. I am, however, content to take those I have already enumerated, amounting, as has been shown, to £180,521 11s. 4d.

The transfer of these services represents so much gain to the province, and I have summarized the amount accordingly.

The total gain or loss upon each item of revenue and expenditure will now stand thus:—

Gain.

	£229,607	18	9

There are yet other items of gain, however, which must not be overlooked: I refer to the departments and services which will shortly be abolished. A reference to the Provincial Treasurer's statement shows that the expenditure of the year ending 31st March, 1876, on these services was as follows:—

Total additional gain ... £14,669 2 7

This sum of $14,669 2s. 7d. represents actual gain to the province, although that gain is not accompanied by a corresponding loss to the colony. I add it accordingly to the balance of gain previously stated, and show a total gain upon the operations of the past year of £18,904 17s. 11d.

The Superintendent, at the meeting held in Dunedin, stated, as one of the iniquities we have been guilty of, the taking away of their railway revenues. I have already included this in my statement; but, in order to make it more clear, I will here specially set out the items in a way to be easily understood, and, in doing so, I will take the estimated receipts and expenditure of the present year, which the provincial authorities will readily admit is not likely to be exceeded for some time to come:—

Estimated receipts for twelve months...	£170,400
Estimated expenditure for do. ...	106,900

Leaving a balance of	£64,500
-----------------------------	---------

with which to pay interest on the following amounts expended on Otago railways to 30th June, 1876	£1,739,900
Liabilities in respect of the same	423,200

It may be urged that it would be unfair to calculate interest on the liabilities, and I will leave them out, although the money is raised, and the colony is paying interest thereon; and I may say that the sum of £110,000 has been paid out since the 30th June.

There is, however, the value of the provincial railways to be taken into account. I will therefore be content to calculate the interest on the sum actually expended on the 30th June last, $1,739,900, at 6 per cent. £104,894

Leaving a loss of	£39,894

which is now chargeable by law against the Land Fund; and next year the amount will be larger. By this plain statement, the people of Otago will see that, instead of profits to take away, the loss on the railways is a large one, and will know what reliance to place on the statements of the two honorable members for Dunedin in the future. They have continued repeating this imaginary loss of £180,000 to Otago by our proposals, until I really think they begin to believe it themselves. I wonder if the people they were addressing were at all struck by the difference in the statements of the two honorable gentlemen—the one stating the loss at £200,000, the other at £150,000, but neither daring to enter into particulars, although challenged to do so by the Colonial Treasurer. I will now refer to a statement made by my honorable friend the member for the Taieri, when comparing the Government proposals, or rather comparing the amount they spent last year in Otago with what they will have to spend under our proposals. No doubt that was so, and I am not going to complain of that statement. I only wish to ask him where they got the money. It is very easy to run into debt, and with that money say, "Look what we have accomplished." That is the case with Otago. Let me take the actual revenue for last year, after deducting the sums I have put down as coming from adventitious sources and from the General Government for subsidies to Road Boards, and deduct that from their actual expenditure, and the deficiency on last year's transactions would be £218,813 10s. 6d., or equal to the eleven counties we propose for Otago, in addition to their income, running into debt nearly £20,000 each. Will the honorable member tell me that, had these counties been in existence, they would have contracted such a debt; or, if they had, would they not have spent the money to as great advantage as the Provincial Government have done? This is one of the merits of the Government proposals, by giving the people local self-government you bring them face to face with their receipts and expenditure, and so put a check on extravagant expenditure of both Provincial and General Governments. Even take the Provincial Treasurer's own abstract without deducting these sums, and it will show an expenditure exceeding his receipts by £132,515 16s. 6d. The Colonial Government is accused of going to the bad at a great rate; but I think, if the honorable member for Dunedin were to look at home, he would see that he is going in that direction at a much greater rate. There is yet another statement made by the honorable member for Dunedin (Mr. Stout) at that meeting. Referring to the leases of the runs falling in, he is reported to have said, "You could have made such arrangements —"

Mr. STOUT.—I never mentioned the runs at all. I said nothing about them.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—I have in my hand the newspaper report of the honorable gentleman's speech.

Mr. STOUT.—I was not aware that the honorable gentleman perused my speeches.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—No doubt; or the honorable gentleman would have been a little more careful in what he said—he would not have gone to such an extravagant length as he did in his speech. However, he is reported to have said, "You could have made such arrangements that you could get four or five times the revenue you get now." Might I ask the honorable gentleman what is to hinder their doing that now?

Mr. STOUT.—The Government.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—The Government has nothing to do with it. Cannot the County Councils, which will benefit by the increase of rents, be trusted to bring pressure on the Waste Lands Board to dispose of the runs on the best terms, and open lands for settlement quite as well as the Provincial Council ever did? But what did the honorable gentleman wish the people he was addressing to understand? The honorable gentleman wanted them to believe that their revenues would come to the Colonial Treasury, while he knew perfectly well our proposals would do no such thing. By our proposals the counties will get every shilling over the expenditure that we have put down as necessary to charge against their land revenue. Our aim has not been to take the land revenue. Our aim has been to localize it, and I think I have shown that, as far as Otago is concerned, that province will not be a loser but a gainer. This, however, must not be lost sight of, that the Land Revenue in some of the provinces will be short, as we have shown; but, instead of following the present system of throwing out large lump sums on no principle whatever, we are going to act on principle. We ask Otago and Canterbury if they have any objection to help the other provinces, and they will say—and no doubt will say quite rightly—"If you will help yourselves we will help you." That is what our proposals will bring about. We intend to ask these provinces to put their hands in their own pockets, and in proportion as they contribute to their own support we will subsidize them out of colonial funds. That is the proper way to help them, and not by a vote of this Assembly to throw out a lump sum to one of these provinces and not to another. That is a system which must be put an end to. That is a system of finance we must stop, and set to work to put our house in order. The honorable gentleman has lectured us about bringing our finances into a proper state; but I tell him that there is no member of this House who is more alive to the necessity for doing that than the members of the Government, or more desirous to bring our expenditure within our means. But are we to jump from one extreme to another, and so paralyze the country? No, Sir. We should paralyze trade and everything else if we were suddenly to stop all these public works.

Mr. STOUT.—No.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—I say Yes. The honorable member says "No;" but I ask him if all this expenditure were suddenly stopped, and he saw grass growing on the unfinished lines of railways instead of trains running along them, would not that paralyze trade? What use would they be to the colony then? What revenue should we get from them with which to pay our interest? We want to continue the works with judicious expenditure, and to complete those portions of the railways without which the rest cannot pay or be of any use. That is the system in which Otago and Canterbury are prepared to assist the rest of the colony, and I am sure they will do so cheerfully when it is done on principle. It is said to us, "You must reduce your expenditure now." We are going to be in earnest in reducing our expenditure. As soon as this session closes we are going to take into consideration the whole of the departments, and see by what means we can save, and what departments we can put together. I am perfectly sure that, unless the Government take that step, the House cannot do so, and I venture to say that we shall be able to meet the Assembly next session with a very considerable reduction. The honorable gentleman referred to a very large reduction in the Customs revenue, and pointed out that we should have a very large deficiency in it. But what do the returns that we have actually got in show? They show a deficiency upon the quarter of about £5,000, which is equal to £20,000 for the year; but it is no criterion to take one quarter, and, with the large influx of population on the West Coast, I think the revenue will rather increase than decrease. We have to take that into account. I do not think it necessary for me to take up the time of the Committee further. I shall not now refer to the figures of the honorable member for Akaroa. We shall be able to see them in print, and it will be better to do so then. The honorable gentleman told us such a doleful tale that I should be very loth to believe in his figures, but I will allow them to appear in print before referring to them, and then see how they work out. I can, happily, take a more cheerful view of matters than he does, and I am not at all prepared to acknowledge that New Zealand finances are to be compared to those of Turkey and Egypt. I have greater faith in the ability of New Zealand to pay her debts and the interest on them, and, if necessary, to complete her railways by borrowing more money. I am sure these railways, when completed, will considerably relieve the Consolidated Revenue by receipts, and I am perfectly certain we shall see a better state of things in New Zealand than the doleful statements of the honorable member would lead us to imagine.

Mr. STOUT.—I only desire to make one or two remarks on the statement just delivered, but I must first point out that these Financial Statements—this is the third—coming from the Government benches rather tend to confuse one. No two of them agree. I wish, as briefly as possible, to point out two things. The honorable gentleman now says that the Provinces of Otago and Canterbury are not to lose anything; in fact none of the provinces are to lose anything by abolition—they are all to be gainers. Now, if they are all to be gainers, the money must come from somewhere, and of course we can only suppose that it is to come from the General Government; but if our finances are in such a crippled condition, how is it that we can give more to the provinces? That is a very peculiar thing to say, when we consider that the Colonial Treasurer, in the Supplementary Financial Statement delivered on the previous evening, told us that the bad state of the colonial finance was to be accounted for by the fact that the provinces had been getting more from the Government. Thus we have these two diametrically opposite statements: The Commissioner of Customs tells us that the provinces are to get more, and the Treasurer tells us that the main reason for abolition is that the provinces were getting too much in the past. I ask any one if it is possible to reconcile such conflicting statements. Of course it is impossible to do so; and really I think honorable gentlemen on the Government benches should be more careful in the statements they make, because statements such as these do not do credit to their reputations. Then, as to the runs. What has been done in regard to the Canterbury runs? They are not to be put up to auction; they are not to be allowed to fetch their proper value in the open market; but the Government are going to give to the pastoral lessees leases for all time to come, at an assessment which is to be fixed by Government officers. Will any honorable member say that that is a proper method of fixing the assessment? I think not; and I say that, so long as this Government has power to deal with the land question, the runs will not fetch what they would fetch in the open market.

Mr. REES.—I, in common with other honorable members, was delighted with the clear and lucid statement, not at all encumbered with useless figures, which the honorable gentleman has given to the Committee. It is evident from the warm applause it met with that every one understood it thoroughly. It is quite certain that the honorable member himself understood it. That was obvious. And yet it required to be reconciled a little. One thing the honorable gentleman said was, that the railways must be worked at a loss for a long time; but that did not seem to accord with the view he took at the end; for he said that, when they were working, they would go a long way toward easing the Consolidated Revenue. He spoke also about the railways running "on the lines." I do not know whether the honorable gentleman is aware that the Government railways, as a rule, run off the lines. I should like to have his ideas upon that point; because the honorable gentleman's ideas, taken in connection with his grammar, are very singular. If the trains do not run straighter than the honorable gentleman's nominatives when they get away from his verbs, it will be a very bad job for them. The honorable gentleman also said he would not take into consideration the sum of £154,000 6s. 8d. Now, I want to know why he was so particular about the 6s. 8d., because I observed that, whenever he finished with "6s. 8d.," he looked over at me as if he had made a great point. I sincerely trust, Sir, that the honorable gentleman did not intend to cast any reflection upon me because I happen to belong to the legal profession. I know that the honorable member for Waikouaiti is a witty man, but for all that it is difficult sometimes to understand what he means. I have no doubt that if he explains the matter to the Postmaster-General he will be able to understand the joke about the 6s. 8d. The honorable gentleman seemed also to mix himself up very much in his explanation of the various sums. I do not know whether he has ever read Sam Slick's two great speeches on the eradication of thistles and the 40s. franchise. When Sam Slick got up to address the American House of Representatives on these two subjects, he got them so much interwoven that he sat down very much puzzled himself, and that was his last appearance in the House of Representatives. I now see something of the design that is to be observed in remodelling the Ministry after the session. The Commissioner of Customs is to be the Colonial Treasurer. It is evident he has been working up to that, and the easy quietness and smiling assent that passed over the Premier's countenance while the honorable gentleman made his Financial Statement was something beautiful to behold. It is clear that the honorable gentleman is to be Treasurer, because he said he had taken a stand, and was going to put the House in order. That is a very good thing, and I was glad to hear it. It is wanted. It has been wanted for a long time; and I am sure, from the high intelligence, the lucid intellect, and the deep financial knowledge which the honorable gentleman has brought to bear upon this task, that something extraordinary will be placed before us next session. The honorable gentleman says that as soon as the House is prorogued he is going to try to reduce the expenditure, and see what departments can be put together. I remember that, when wooden pavements were first introduced in London, it was proposed to put a wooden pavement round St. Paul's. When Sydney Smith heard of the proposal, he said that if the Mayor and members of the Corporation would only put their heads together, they could easily put a pavement round St. Paul's. Now, if the honorable gentlemen on the Ministerial benches will only put their heads together, I will not say that they would make a wooden pavement, but they will certainly make a very remarkable financial statement. I have not the slightest doubt they will do something extraordinary by the time the House meets again.

Mr. BOWEN.—I presume this is a specimen of the financial debate to which we have looked forward, and this graceful badinage is the answer to the very carefully prepared figures placed before the House by my honorable friend the Commissioner of Customs. I say very carefully prepared, because they are figures I should like to see closely studied and answered, if honorable gentlemen opposite can answer them. The honorable member for Akaroa did attempt to deal carefully with the question from his own point of view; but it will be admitted, I think, that he took an unjustifiably gloomy view of the position of our finances, and looked on them as a problem out of which he might deduce the most grievous possible result. For instance, he pointed out that the Colonial Treasurer made up a surplus by issuing Treasury bills during the recess; and he gave the Committee to understand that these Treasury bills were issued in order to supply a deficiency in the ordinary revenue. But, Sir, had the honorable gentleman looked into the matter more carefully, or desired to state it fairly, he would have shown that these Treasury bills were issued under two Acts of the Assembly—"The Provincial Public Works Advances Act, 1874," and the Provincial Appropriations Extension Act of last year. Now, I do not think it is fair to speak of Treasury bills, issued under special Acts and for special purposes, as if they were issued merely to create an equilibrium in the colonial accounts. Then the honorable gentleman omitted to point out that one great difficulty in making both ends meet, as the honorable gentleman calls it, arises from the determination of the Government to throw the whole of the charge for interest on uncompleted works upon the current revenue of the country. The Colonial Treasurer pointed out in his statement that, out of the £7,000,000 spent on public works, £3,500,000 is at the present time non-productive—that is, sunk upon railways which are yet uncompleted, from which no return is obtained, and on account of which no charge can be made upon the land revenue. There is, therefore, a charge of £180,000 a year of interest at present borne by the ordinary revenue, which, if any public company had constructed the railways, would be paid out of the loans raised for their construction, because it is a rule with all public companies engaged in the construction of railways to pay the interest on the money spent out of the loan raised. The Government did not think it advisable to do that, and the whole of this charge is therefore shown against the ordinary revenue. That is one reason why the revenue appears in a more unsatisfactory position than it really is in. Then there was another point in the honorable gentleman's speech to which I should like to draw attention. He said the whole of the interest on our loans was paid to a foreign creditor, and in saying this he appeared to wish the Committee to believe—I do not suppose he meant it—that it was a mistake to borrow money at all, because it was necessary to send the interest out of the country to a foreign creditor. The question really is, whether the money which is borrowed is spent upon reproductive works or not, and whether they are works which it will really pay the country to make. That is the question at issue, the question for us to consider. The matter now before us is to consider whether the Committee approves of the Colonial Treasurer's statement that the Government wish to reduce the expenditure, but to reduce it in such a way as not to create a panic; to reduce it gradually and carefully, and to take time to see how the reductions can best be made; and, further, to borrow a sufficient sum of money to carry on gradually and prudently the works already initiated, and to obtain an estimate of what money will be required to continue the construction of public works in the future regularly and economically. That is, putting aside the figures, the financial policy that my honorable friend has brought down to this House; and it is for honorable members to decide whether the policy proposed is a judicious one. It certainly would not, I think, be deemed judicious on the part, say, of any private landlord who had undertaken to borrow money to drain his estate, if, when he had got through that money, and saw that he would still with prudence and care be able to complete his drainage scheme, he left half-finished and blocked-up drains encumbering his estate, and allowed all his previous expenditure to remain wasted and unproductive—to act, in fact, like a man who had taken a sudden panic, and had determined to go no further. I do not wish to weary the House with figures; for it appears to me that some honorable gentlemen do not like figures when they are given to them. I now merely wish to draw attention to what I conceive to be the salient points of the policy placed before the House by the Colonial Treasurer; and I hope that if the House does approve of that policy, it will support the Government, and allow them during the recess to make such reductions as they may be enabled to make in the ordinary expenditure of the country.

Mr. REES.—The honorable gentleman has spoken in a dignified manner, and with very great care. He asked us to receive the very careful figures of the honorable member for Waikouaiti, the Commissioner of Customs. The honorable gentleman does not seem to understand a joke. Why, any one could see that the honorable member for Waikouaiti was talking against time. The idea of the honorable member attempting, I will not say to make the Committee, but to prevail upon the Committee to believe anything else! One could see, from the smile upon the honorable member's face when he got up to speak and when he sat down, that he was talking against time. That evidently was the honorable member's intention, for otherwise he would not have thought of giving such figures to the House. The members of the Government and some of their supporters do not seem to understand sound figures at all. They do not seem to be able to understand figures that go upon good data, or, if they do, they do not pay the slightest attention to them. Ministers themselves are always bringing down figures, and no two of them agree upon their figures. The present Premier, when he brought down his statement last year, had to explain it with a whole lot of ludicrous columns in a second statement. This year his statement disagreed with that of the late Premier, and he now brings down a fresh statement, which disagrees with that of the late Premier. The honorable member for Waikouaiti now gets up with a set of totally new figures, differing from the statements already given to the Committee and to the House. So long as the honorable gentlemen hold their seats as Ministers and keep the thing going, they will be satisfied. Of course as long as the money lasts it will be all right, and they will get a majority of the House to support them, as they have had hitherto. It does not matter how monstrous their figures are, and whether they are susceptible of being reasonably interpreted or not, as long as the money lasts they will get a majority to support them in carrying on, many honorable members hoping to get for their own districts some of the money that is spent. Although the honorable member for Waikouaiti or any other member of the Ministry might get up and make a series of the most stupendous blunders—blunders bigger than they have yet made with their figures—they would go on in the same way until the end of these Treasury bills and borrowing comes, and then I am afraid the House and the country will want figures a little more exact. They will want to overhaul the state of affairs, to learn how they stand, and how they are to meet the difficulties in which they are plunged. The Minister of Justice referred to what the honorable member for Akaroa said about Treasury bills being a bridge over difficulties to make both ends meet. He was absolutely correct, and, whatever you may say or whatever terms you apply, that was the actual fact. This year we are going to borrow, upon the faith of Land Fund, £145,000 by means of Treasury bills, and we shall have to borrow as much besides. We shall have to raise about £300,000 upon Treasury bills this year. The end of this must come. If the honorable member for Waikouaiti, in his playful moments, should by chance hit upon a solution of the difficulty, he will, at any rate, be deemed worthy of public thanks. I will not say what sort of medal should be given to him or to other members of the Ministry, or of what substance it should be made. At any rate, a medal might be struck and presented to them if they hit upon any measure consistent with their own dignity, the dignity of the people and of the public service of the colony, that will make, in the common acceptation of the term, both ends meet.

Mr. MANDERS.—I think it is necessary, after what the honorable member for Dunedin (Mr. Stout) has said—that no Government supporter got up to support the Ministry or to speak in favour of their policy—that some one should do so. I am very glad that the remarks of the honorable member for Dunedin this evening have led to the explanations given by the Minister of Justice and by the Commissioner of Customs, for I think a great deal of light has thus been thrown on the position of affairs—a far stronger, clearer, and fairer light than we gathered from the figures given by the Premier last night. The assurance given by the Minister of Justice is that reductions shall take place during the recess, and we have also similar assurances from the Commissioner of Customs. I expressed to the Committee my opinion the other evening, that the estimates should be largely reduced, and now that we have received assurances to that effect in such a straightforward and satisfactory manner as those to which I have alluded, I think it is very desirable that the business of the country should proceed. I for one as a supporter of the Government shall, after the assurances so strongly and distinctly given to-night, be prepared to support them, believing that they will during the recess carry out the necessary reductions in the Civil Service that the country looks for. The honorable member for Auckland City East appears not to understand the figures given by the Commissioner of Customs, but I do not know whether there are any figures that the honorable member does understand. I find him challenging the statements of the late Colonial Treasurer, Sir Julius Vogel, and I find him challenging every Financial Statement. If any person brought up a balance-sheet founded upon the honorable gentleman's own figures, and said, "This is correct, it is compiled from figures supplied by the honorable member for Auckland City East," he would not approve of that statement. I do not think he could agree to any statement made in this House. Apparently he has not been able to do so up to the present time. I think we have been wasting time in trying to convince the honorable member, and we should not attempt anything further in that direction, but let the honorable member blunder on. Let him go back to his constituents and say, "The great colonial financiers in the Assembly would not listen to me, who went down to instruct them." I cannot but say that it is a waste of time, and that the Ministry are figuratively throwing pearls before an animal the name of which it is better not to mention. The honorable member said, that most of the Government supporters sat looking on in an idiotic manner, and not understanding the figures offered. He, for one, denied both assertions. He had listened attentively to the several statements, and quite comprehended the views they set forth. I think the criticisms of the honorable member for Dunedin, which were fairly listened to, provoked from the Ministerial benches assurances which, to me, at any rate, are satisfactory. I trust that the Committee will, upon those assurances, proceed to pass the estimates at once.

Mr. STEVENS.—As we have at last embarked in a financial discussion, perhaps a few remarks from me upon the finances of the country may be not altogether unacceptable. My remarks will not be very long, and I will endeavour to condense them as much as possible. The first point, Sir, that strikes me to remark upon is the very important improvement which was effected by the House last year in reference to the abolition of the Reserves Account, an account which, in my opinion—I having observed it for many years—was altogether based upon a delusion, and was productive of nothing but inconvenience, if not disaster. While upon this subject, I would like to allude to a matter which has been referred to by several honorable members during the session, and this evening by the honorable member for Akaroa. That is the payment of £123,800 for interest paid in the present financial year, but belonging to last year—that is, interest due on the 15th July. What I wish to point out with reference to this is, that honorable members need never trouble themselves any more upon that subject, so long as they see that one complete year's interest is paid in one complete year. That makes an end of that question. Of course, what I now say does not in the slightest exonerate the Colonial Treasurer from a charge which has been made a good deal of this session: that he over-estimated the Customs revenue last year. I am quite prepared to admit that is a very fair subject for criticism. If a Colonial Treasurer does over-estimate revenue he is liable to criticism, if not to censure; but my honorable friend has had, if he chose to take advantage of it, some very notable examples for his guidance in this respect. If I am not greatly mistaken, his two immediate predecessors committed the same offence with which he has been charged; and those crimes, if we can so term them, have been passed over with great leniency as compared with the charges which have been brought against the present Colonial Treasurer. I think that a reference to the finance of the last eight years will fully establish that fact. There was another thing in connection with the previous Financial Statement—that of Sir Julius Vogel—that gave me a great deal of satisfaction. It was the disappearance, however suddenly, of that financial phenomenon, the division of the Stamp duties into two portions—one being carried into the general ordinary revenue of the colony; and the other being taken, I suppose, to improve the appearance of the Public Works Account. I am not aware that in the course of my life I have seen anything more utterly absurd than that which happily is now no longer to appear in the finances of this colony. It is inconceivable to me that such a thing ever could have been done. I took an opportunity of protesting against it in 1870, and at last it has disappeared. At last, I understand, we are taking the Stamp duties entirely into the Consolidated Revenue on ordinary account, and we no longer divide that item of revenue into two portions, taking one into the ordinary revenue of the colony, and the other to improve the appearance of the Public Works Account. But it strikes me as a little remarkable that, in the first statement—that of the honorable gentleman who was lately at the head of the Government—no notice was taken of the extinction of that system, although it has subsisted ever since the year 1870. However, I am not going to say any more about it, except heartily to congratulate this Committee upon the non-appearance of any such division of the revenue from Stamp duties in the present Financial Statement. I am now going to say something on the subject of the Bank agreement. I know this is a very dry subject as well as a very intricate one, and I am not going to trouble the Committee with any lengthened remarks upon it, because it is a subject which it would take a great deal of time to go carefully into. I am not going to complain of the terms of business which are mentioned in that agreement. I am not going to say it would have been desirable to divide the public banking account of this colony amongst the banks. Whatever may be my own opinion on the subject, I am not going to advocate that at the present period of the session. But I abstain from discussing it, because I think the House has made up its mind on that question for a time at all events. At least the last House did so. It distinctly entertained the opinion, as I understood, that the facilities which were offered by the Bank of New Zealand for the conduct of the public banking business were such that it was altogether impossible that the Government could deal with associated banks upon equally favourable terms. It has appeared, I think, that the facilities offered by the Bank of New Zealand were very considerably greater than were capable of being afforded by any association of the banks operating in the colony. Whether that will continue to be the case, I cannot say. I am aware that it was the opinion generally of the honorable members of the last House; and I think it is the opinion of many honorable members in this House that having the Government account with associated banks would tend to create a species of monopoly, and that the Colonial Treasurer for the time being would lose that opportunity of benefiting from competition which he now is more or less able to secure. But the point to which I want to refer is this, and one portion of it, I think, has been referred to by the honorable member for Parnell in an early part of the session: During the negotiations with the Inspector of the Bank of New Zealand, the late Colonial Treasurer, if I remember rightly, received an intimation that the terms upon which moneys could be drawn out of the Bank in London would have to be modified by Act of Parliament; and that in the event of certain circumstances, such as a hostile Government being in power, and so on, the Bank might be seriously prejudiced. Now, I do not object at all to that, as I think the honorable member for Parnell previously objected. I do not for one moment object to the banker taking that course; but I strongly object to the gentleman who may be in charge of the financial affairs of the colony returning as an answer to such an application the statement that, to protect the banker from capricious action, the Government will be prepared to introduce next session a Bill which will have the effect desired. Now, I am not going to charge my honorable friends on that bench with doing this, because they claim to be—and I believe with more or less justice—a new Government; but I say, that if such things are done in the future, they may take my word for it that a feeling which is already existing in the country, of very considerable uneasiness on that very question of the undue intimacy of the Administration of the day, or of any Administration that may be in existence at any time in this colony, with the Government banker for the time being, will increase to a feeling of strong dissatisfaction, that will very likely prejudice the safety and existence of any Ministry that may sit on that bench and act in such a way. Therefore, if my honorable friends would take a word of advice from me, given altogether in a friendly spirit, I would urge them under no conceivable circumstances to put themselves in such a position of reproach as that would be, and which would certainly be taken advantage of by those who are hostile to their policy, and consequently hostile to mine. I propose to make a few remarks upon the proposals now before the House, and, in doing so, I should like to say that, in my opinion, this difficulty into which the country has got financially—and there is no doubt that it is a difficulty—is one which, if it has not been anticipated by the public at large, ought to have been anticipated. That it has been anticipated by some I know. It has been anticipated by myself amongst others, and it has appeared to me for a long time past to be absolutely inevitable. It has arisen from the transactions which took place in the expenditure of public money with undue haste, and which have landed us in this position: that we have got to pay a very large amount of interest upon works which are not at present productive, owing altogether to the extreme haste—I may say the altogether unpractical manner—in which the public at large clamoured for expenditure, and in which the Government of the day admitted those claims, and submitted to the agitation. Having said so much, I would beg to observe that the proposals of the Government in regard to the Land Fund are, of course, not capable of sustaining strict criticism from a financial point of view, and there is no doubt the Government must be as well aware of it as any one. In fact, the Colonial Treasurer makes no secret of it; he says it is a necessity. Well, I agree with him; it is a necessity. Of course, it is not good finance. It cannot be good finance to contemplate six of the provinces out of nine being defaulters on the annual account of their land revenue, upon which we are placing the charges proposed. Of course that is not satisfactory; but put any Colonial Treasurer you like on that bench, and ask him what he can do under the present circumstances; ask him by what means he would bring the revenue and expenditure upon an equilibrium—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Retrench.

Mr. STEVENS.—I quite agree with those who say "Retrench," but it must be remembered that four months of the year have already expired—that you cannot retrench in a few minutes or in a few days, or in a few weeks. The best thing for those who advocate retrenchment to do, would be to all go together, and leave the Government as much time as possible to make their arrangements in the recess. Speaking upon this as a purely financial question, we must, admit that it is a necessity; but what is the alternative? If by retrenchment you improve the state of your revenue in such a manner as that, these advances can be made out of the Consolidated Fund instead of being paid by Treasury bills—a system which has been animadverted upon all round the House—what do you do? You simply make these provinces debtors to the Colonial Treasury; and what will be the effect? That of course your colonial finance generally will be better, but nothing more. These provinces would still go on becoming indebted, and every year the cry in this Committee would be, "Auckland is being paid for by other provinces," it would be said that one province was being paid for by another. That is just what used formerly to go on in this Committee, and what will go on again. I should like to say a word about the hospitals, and other charitable institutions. And here I would like to congratulate the Government upon the change which they have made as compared with the proposals which were embodied in the first Financial Statement. I do not altogether approve of them as they now stand, but they are materially better than the former proposals. The first proposal was that the hospitals and charitable institutions should be provided for by contributions of counties and municipal bodies, aided by some small subsidy from the Consolidated Fund. It is not so much only from the financial as from the administrative point of view that I object to that proposal, because it is a system which I venture to think would have caused very considerable hardship to those who were likely to need the assistance of these institutions, and could under no conceivable circumstances have given sufficient security to the public at large that the injured and the poor were properly taken care of, and were under the supervision of proper authorities. Before leaving that part of the subject, I trust the Government will, at an early date, inform the House what is the exact system upon which they propose to conduct the administration of those institutions, in order that there may be a feeling of security in the country regarding them. Now, I would like to say a word or two about the necessity for raising a new loan. Well, if it could possibly be avoided, I believe the House generally would be glad. If we could maintain the public works in a state of necessary activity without it, and meet existing engagements, I believe this House generally would approve of dispensing altogether with fresh borrowing, if that could possibly be done. Without going into figures which are quite familiar to honorable members, it is perfectly impossible to dispense with further borrowing, unless we are going to make further inroads upon the debentures Imperially guaranteed, and which we can always use as a most valuable collateral security. I hope the time will never come within a good many years when we shall be compelled altogether to part with those bonds. It has always been a source of regret to me that we parted with £200,000 of the million guaranteed debentures. I do not know how that arose, as I was in England at the time. I am sorry that we have encroached on that million of guaranteed debentures, as I have always looked upon that as one of the most valuable assets which we could possibly hold, and which we should hold as long as we possibly could. With regard to the inscription of stock which has come down to us in the form of a Bill, I may say that the plan, originally due to Mr. Westgarth, has been perfectly well known to many persons for some time, and, if I understand rightly, it has been looked upon and strongly advocated as a very desirable thing. I will give my hearty support to that proposal, because I believe the inscription of stock will be of very great value, and will be calculated to improve the demand for our securities as a permanent investment. My honorable friend the member for Dunedin (Mr. Stout) made some remarks on the general question. No doubt when you are attached to any side of the House—whether Abolitionist or Provincialist—you are tempted to give a colouring to everything you say, even in matters of finance, into which it would be very much better that we should not import these feelings if it could be avoided. I do not know any better rule in dealing with finance than that you should not quarrel over your figures. My honorable friend has spoken of the robbing of the provinces, or something to that effect; he spoke of the wrong to the provinces which was going to be inflicted by abolition. I am quite content to admit that in some respects the expectation of the Government will not be realized, because there is not the money to realize it with. That is the reason. If the expectations of the Government were to be realized, the people in the provinces would have to pay more taxes. This must be the case in order that the objects of the Government may be realized. I will tell my honorable friend this: that long before he was in this House, for many years past, the same problem has been before the country. It has been simply the allegation, for I do not know how many years, that it was the Provincial Governments which were losing by colonial finance; but the real question is, whether the people who lived in the provinces were losing. There is a wonderful deal of difference between the two propositions. One of the great advantages that will come out of the Abolition of Provinces policy will be this: that the public will be brought face to face with their expenditure. They will know the source of the advantages which they will derive, and they will also know thoroughly the cause from whence disadvantage or misfortune may arise in regard to the finance of the country. Then my honorable friend says what we ought to do is to economize on the departments proposed to be charged on the Land Fund.

Mr. STOUT.—I did not say so.

Mr. STEVENS.—I was unfortunate in not hearing the honorable gentleman distinctly. My honorable friend will have an excellent opportunity of studying economy when he comes to deal with those items. The honorable member for Parnell, I think, if I understood him rightly, had a very simple method of settling the deficiency, of making up deficiencies in the land revenue, and of obviating a state of things which he considered to be dreadful in relation to the land revenue of provincial districts. If I understood him rightly, he said that, if there was a surplus of land revenue in certain localities, it could be taken to meet the wants of other parts of the colony—that the difficulty could be got over in that way. Well, that is a very simple proposition indeed; but I do not think it would bring the revenue and expenditure into equilibrium. Even if it did, it would hardly be consistent with those Provincialist notions which my honorable friend, I believe, professes, or, until very recently, professed. It would be a distinct violation of the Abolition principle, and it would be exceedingly distasteful to the people in large sections of the country. I do not think my honorable friend's remedy is one which we should adopt. My honorable friend the Premier told us that it was quite evident that the Public Works and Immigration policy had been an undoubted success. I do not propose at this period of the debate to discuss that point with my honorable friend; but I say this, that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and that we have not yet got to that point at which we are fully able to judge of the full effects of that policy either for good or for evil. We must wait for a year or two, and we will see; and I have no doubt that the people of this colony will form a very clear and distinct opinion on that point. Without wishing to weary this Committee, I would like to call attention to a comparison which I have made of the value of the products exported from this country in the year 1871, before the Immigration and Public Works policy could have taken any effect, with those of the year 1874—less than two years ago—and of 1875. A study of these figures will be useful to honorable members who wish to arrive at a conclusion as to the facts. I find from the statistics that whilst in 1871, when the Public Works policy could not have had time to affect our producing powers, the value of exports—gold, kauri gum, hides, tallow, wool, and grain—was £4,789,623, in 1874 it was only £4,897,855, when the policy had been three years in active operation. And taking the statistics of 1875, the export value is only £5,260,087, the wool being taken at a very high rate. I do not think there is any great amount of increase in value there, when we look at the state of things since then. I am afraid that, although we have a very considerable amount of population come into the country, the aggregate quantity of what we have got to sell, the produce of the country itself, is not at all commensurate with the rate at which we have been borrowing money, and expending it. That is all I want to establish. I do not wish to throw any sort of discredit upon the policy or its author, or anything of the sort; but it does appear that we have been subjected to a very excessive expenditure in comparison with the productive powers of the country. We shall have an opportunity, when the subject becomes more matured, of discussing the merits of that policy, by the light which further experience will give. Before I go any further, I should like to say that, after a very careful examination of the finances, I see no reason to change the opinions I expressed at an earlier period of the session, and which the honorable member for Taieri seemed to doubt. In the course of the debate which took place, my honorable friend seemed to think that my figures were not correct, and that the expenditure of the country was not two millions and a quarter. I should like him to discuss the figures with me. I think I could convince him that the expenditure of the country was something considerably in excess of two millions and a quarter. I think honorable members are rather in the habit of allowing these things to pass by without giving them the close examination which they deserve. In the face of this very great expenditure, what has to be done? What can be done to help this state of things? What is going to happen next year? I agree with those who think that the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer should make greater reductions in his Customs estimate, as, notwithstanding the reductions proposed to be made, the revenue may not at all reach his estimate. It is very difficult for one, who has not got the same means of obtaining information as the honorable gentleman, to say with any real confidence what is likely to be the exact revenue. In the face of a very large diminution in our staple product, in the face of the fact that the price of grain is not very high, unless there is some great addition to the produce of gold, which has been almost stationary for the last few years,—unless there is some very great increase in that item, I am very much afraid that greater reductions ought to be made in the estimate than my honorable friend proposes to make. I speak with some diffidence on this point, because the honorable gentleman has access to information which I cannot possess; but I would prefer to see the estimate placed at a lower rate than has been proposed by the honorable gentleman. Then, Sir, we have to consider that next year we shall have an addition to the permanent loans of the country. We are going to borrow another million, and next year we shall have to provide the interest upon that amount. We should remember that, and not come up here next year under the belief that we are going to have a prosperous state of finance. When we come up here, we shall find a deficiency in Treasury bills of £145,000. We may have £50,000 or so less on the Customs than is estimated; and it is highly probable that the total deficiency which we shall have to meet next year will be from £200,000 to £250,000. Then, as I have said, we shall have to provide for additional interest on borrowed money. We have got to face this difficulty, and the sooner we face it the better. When there is talk about retrenchment, I am not one of those who go in for reducing the salaries of the Civil servants 25 per cent. all round, rather pay a moderate number of good men well; but I say that this difficulty of retrenchment is one that has to be met, and it is one of the greatest difficulties that have to be encountered by the Government, and we should give them our sympathy and assistance in overcoming it. I would suggest that we might, without any violation of any sound principle of finance, possibly induce holders of our bonds—I mean the consols and older bonds which carry a sinking fund—to take bonds that do not bear a sinking fund, but are only subject to 5 per cent. interest. These bonds are now over par, and so the profit attaching to those taken at below par for the sake of the chance of being drawn at the annual drawings, has ceased to be an inducement to hold. By this means, I suggest, the sinking fund would be dispensed with, and accumulated sinking fund released for so much as might be converted. As regards the estimates, I do not propose to weary the Committee by getting up a discussion on them. We should bear in mind this fact, that one-third of the year has already gone in this session, and that we cannot go into a long discussion now, but can best deal with the subject on the items. With regard to the departmental reductions, I may say that one of the most important departments, and one which is exceedingly well managed—I refer to the Telegraph Department—is, instead of being a source of profit as it should be, a source of loss, by reason of the extraordinary quantity of telegrams which are sent on the public service. I see the cost of these telegrams is estimated at £16,000 for last year. I must say that I can scarcely conceive how it is possible that £16,000 should be necessarily expended in sending telegrams on the public service within the colony—to say nothing of those sent to foreign parts. I trust the Government will devote attention to that item of their expenditure, with a view to seeing whether that well-managed department cannot show a profit instead of a loss. With these few remarks I will now close. If I have said anything that will be of the slightest use to the Committee in their deliberations, I shall feel that I have not wasted their time. As regards the general estimates, I shall give the Government every assistance in making reasonable reductions in the departmental expenditure.

Mr. LUSK.—Sir, I had not the pleasure of hearing the statement made the other evening by the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer to this House. Had I done so, it is possible that I might have had some of the doubts which have arisen in my mind removed by the observations he no doubt made at that time. But, Sir, I have endeavoured to follow the remarks he made from the printed reports placed in the hands of honorable members; and looking at the question as a whole—namely, the question of the financial position and proposals of the Government at this time—I feel bound, before any progress is made with the work of passing the estimates through this House, to offer one or two remarks on the general subject of the proposals which I understand are now made by the Government. I will not attempt to go into the general question of those proposals, nor to go over the whole ground covered by the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer. That has already been dealt with to a considerable extent by other honorable members. But it has struck me that the most important part of this question is that part which deals not so much with the past, nor so much with the existing condition of the finances of the country, or the mode in which the country's accounts are kept, as with what the Government propose to do in the future. It seems to me that that is the question of paramount importance to the country at the present time, and, looking at the statement of the Colonial Treasurer with the view of ascertaining what those proposals were, I confess to a considerable feeling of disappointment. I find that the honorable gentleman states that he has been able to make a reduction of some £34,000, as compared with the proposals laid before us by his predecessor. I have endeavoured, in the short time which has been at my disposal, to trace out, in the estimates which have recently in an amended form been laid before this House, the mode in which these reductions have been made, and I find that half of that reduction is occasioned by leaving out two of the items which appeared in the old estimates, namely, £7,000 for provincial libraries, and £10,000 for provincial officers.

Major ATKINSON: No, State Forests.

Mr. LUSK.—Perhaps I may be wrong in regard to the provincial officers. But, however that may be, it appears to me that this is but a very small concession to the feeling which is not merely prevalent, but universal throughout the colony at this time—namely, that very large reductions ought to be made by the Government, in view of the critical times which even the Government themselves admit are very close upon us. I think, Sir, that when the Government state, as they do state, that they are by no means satisfied even that their own proposals are sound ones, when they show that they are actually proposing to raise nearly £150,000 by Treasury bills for the purpose of eking out the proceeds of the land sales, it seems that they are bound to show something very much more considerable than such savings as these, and that great reductions and great economy are now required. But, Sir, when I come to look at this matter of raising £145,000 on Treasury bills, I am met at once by the consideration that this is practically an essential part of the policy of the Government—that it is an essential part of the proposals they make for the future financial management of the colony, because it is not as though this sum was only to be required for this year. If we are to believe that the proposals of the Government to give large subsidies to the counties and municipalities are bond fide and straightforward, then I say it is not for this year only that the £145,000 will be required. It will be required every year, and in an increasing ratio too. I say this, because the Government have again and again said that the land revenue of this colony is not increasing—that in fact the land revenue will be likely year by year to decrease; and if all these charges which I find in the elaborate return appended to this statement are not of an ephemeral character, and if the revenue which meets those charges is not to increase, then I say this scheme, this expedient for raising huge sums of money by Treasury bills, will have to be resorted to year after year, and in an ever-increasing degree. This appears to me to be by far the most important and by far the most terrible of all the views that can possibly be taken of our financial position: that, as a matter of fact, the proposals for the future government of this colony involve an increasing annual deficit in the financial resources of New Zealand. I believe there can be no escape from this conclusion by any one who will look at these figures as laid down by the Treasurer, and who will consider the probable course of events in the future. We have been told to-night that, when these railways are completed, there will be a large increase in the amount of money coming into the Treasury from them. I take leave to doubt it, because I have taken the trouble to look at the maps appended to the Public Works Statement which has been laid before the House; and looking at those maps which show what part of the railway system of the colony is now in operation, and what part is in course of completion, I am forced to the conclusion that by far the most profitable parts have been completed, and that those to be completed are for the most part likely for some years to come to be rather a source of loss than profit to the revenue. I am forced to that conclusion, not altogether from my own knowledge, because I do not undertake to say I know the whole railway system of the colony; but let any honorable member look at these maps for himself, and consider, from what he knows of the part of the country from which he comes, whether the extensions now being carried out are likely largely to increase the receipts over the expenditure incurred by the Government in working those lines. I speak without the least doubt in my own mind with regard to that part of New Zealand from which I come, that it will be years—many years, I fear—before any large amount of revenue arises from the extension of railroads now in course of construction in Auckland. When I say that of Auckland, I think I may also safely say it of every other part of the North Island. If any honorable gentleman will look at the returns of the railways now in the hands of Government, he will see how fallacious a hope it is that there will be “a great relief to the Consolidated Revenue from the receipts from these railways”—those are the words used. It is a mere vision. There will be no relief for years to come, or else all the experience of the past is of no avail. Then, if that is the case, I should like honorable members to consider that we have before us a new system of government—a new system by which this colony is to be so governed that it will be led into a state of happiness and prosperity never known before. And the basis of all this happiness and future prosperity of the colony is an increased debt of £145,000 for the first year, and that not for purposes that will pass away with the first year; because here they are, and I think every one will admit that they are recurring liabilities. They are such liabilities as Crown Lands Department, Receivers of Land Revenue, Education, Surveys, Interest on Provincial Debts, Subsidies to Road Boards, Interest on Railways, Surveyor-General's Department, Native Land Court, Hospitals, Benevolent and Charitable Institutions, and Museums. Which is it of these that is likely to pass away at the end of the first year? Which of these liabilities is to be cast upon something else at the end of the year? I have not heard anything that leads me to suppose that the land revenue is to be relieved of these liabilities in the future. If not, it means this: either that we are going to have a largely increased land revenue in future, or else we are going on in a system of reckless borrowing on Treasury bills year after year, until it becomes worth our while to borrow another million to pay them off, and then start again on the same bad principle. If that is the new system of government, then it appears to me a fallacious hope that this colony will progress, that its people will become contented, or that there will be any real advantage whatever in the proposals of the Government. I do most earnestly hope that the promises I heard made to-night by the Minister of Justice will be laid to heart by Ministers themselves in a very different way from anything I can see evidenced in any proposals they have yet made to the House. That honorable gentleman asked the Committee to-night to join with the Government in endeavouring to effect all kinds of economy. But I tell him I would go far beyond that. If the Government will join us, I can say for myself, and I believe for many honorable members, that we shall be prepared this year to assist them largely in cutting down these proposals for expenditure. I do not want to wait for a future year, until we have got deeper into the mire before we put our shoulders to the wheel. I say the coach of State is now in so dangerous a position that it is time an effort should be made by the Government and this Committee to extricate it before we separate. I will assist; and I trust the Government, having made such promises and admitted the necessity for such efforts, will join with any one, whether he be a supporter of theirs or a member of the Opposition, who will assist in extricating this country from the load of debt now impending over it.

Mr. RICHARDSON.—The honorable member who has just sat down made some remarks upon the probable receipts from the railways, and the assistance to the Consolidated Revenue which those in course of construction will be likely to yield. If those remarks went uncontradicted, they might do some harm in the future. At a very moderate estimate, the Consolidated Revenue will receive this year, when all provincial lines are taken over that are now open or about to be opened, assistance to the extent of £180,000. That does not include several lines which are now in course of construction, and are likely to be completed and open for traffic within a reasonable time. When I mention the names of these lines, I think honorable gentlemen from the parts of the country through which they run will not agree that the returns from them are likely to be visionary. There is the whole of the line between Timaru and Dunedin under construction, and a great portion of it is about to be completed and ready for opening. Can any honorable member say that line will not return a very large revenue, and assistance to the Consolidated Revenue? I maintain that it will return very large assistance, and in proportion probably quite equal to, if not more than, the other lines open in the South at present. In the North Island, also, there is the line from Napier to Wai-pukurau. The traffic on that line is very largely increasing, and during the coming year it is certain to yield a very considerable revenue. Although I know there are some honorable members who doubt the fact, I do not myself doubt that the line from Wellington to Wairarapa will produce a large revenue as soon as it is open. The traffic on the road in that district is at present very large; and, as soon as the railway is open, it must enormously increase. Then there is the line between Wanganui and Manawatu. There is already a very considerable traffic in that district, and it is increasing. These lines really represent a very large amount of the capital which is appropriated, and which is not returning any interest at all at present on the outlay. When they are open, those lines will tend to relieve and assist the Consolidated Revenue very largely in the future. I will not trouble the Committee with any further remarks. I merely wished not to allow the remarks of the honorable member for Franklin to go uncontradicted.

Mr. LUSK.—Do I understand the honorable gentleman to say that the £180,000 which the Consolidated Revenue is to receive this year from the railways has not already been taken credit for?

Mr. RICHARDSON.—It is on the estimates.

Mr. LUSK.—Then that amount is already put down. Therefore all the honorable gentleman has mentioned are future benefits to arise from lines not yet completed.

Major ATKINSON.—Lines which will, I may again say, represent about half the capital already expended. There are at present only lines representing about £3,500,000 which are paying.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—The honorable member the Minister for Public Works appealed to members from the South with regard to the probabilities of the railways there paying. I must say, with regard to what fell from the previous speaker, that there are railways and railways. With respect to those in the South there is every reason to be hopeful. I should like, without wearying the Committee, to give them one or two of the most recent results showing the advance which railways in Canterbury have made. In the twelve months ending 31st March, 1875, the excess of earnings over expenditure on the lines then open was £19,641, and the working expenses were 84 per cent. of the earnings. In the next year the excess of earnings over expenditure was £261,000, and the working expenses were reduced, as the lines were extended, to 67 per cent. of the earnings.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Rates.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I am quite aware that the rates were increased, but still the result shows that the railways are developing the country in a manner which certainly exceeds the expectations most men had formed of them. I must say that the earnings of the first year (1875), £126,000, and of £185,000 in the next year, are results which must be regarded as highly satisfactory. The only point which does seem unsatisfactory to me is, that, when the scheme was first instituted, the permanent way was not so strong as it should have been, and that a large expenditure will be requisite to renew it. In connection with this railway question, I am certain that constant appeals will be made to this House for further accommodation. People are not satisfied with the improved means of transit that has been provided for them, and they never will be satisfied. Constant claims will be made, and the necessity of meeting these claims will militate against the payable nature of these railways in a way that would not be the case if they were in the hands of private companies: not that I advocate putting the railways into the hands of private companies. I do not propose to detain the Committee with any observations upon financial questions, as they have been ably dealt with by the honorable member for Akaroa, the honorable member for Christchurch (Mr. Stevens), and other honorable members; but it is admitted on all hands that we are in difficult times. The fall in wool, and the necessary cessation of a large public expenditure, are bringing about results which we shall have to face, so that there is very little good in spending our time in regrets. What we should do at this stage of the session is to turn our attention to the question of administration, and it appears to me that the first point we should direct our attention to in connection with the administration is one which, to my mind, has prevented the work of the session being gone on with satisfactorily. There is a feeling in the minds of honorable members that we ought to know who are to be the administrators, and the want of that knowledge has been the great drawback of the present session. When Ministers tell us that there are to be considerable changes in the Government, the House is entitled, before the session closes, to know who are to be its Administrators. Administration, to my mind, is above everything else. Our efforts at Constitution-making have not been successful, and, as I said on a previous occasion, the Constitutional Bills that have been brought down are really summed up in the 205th clause of the Counties Bill, which says that the Governor shall have power to make laws and declare what is to be done during the recess; and it is for that special reason that I attach so much importance to the question as to who are to be our Administrators during the recess. The necessity for this information is very strongly shown by the manner in which a very important decision of this House has to-day been treated in another place. A few days ago we decided, in the public interest, that we could no longer set aside the sum of £10,000 a year for the maintenance of a State Forests Department, and we find that not only did Ministers in this House vote on different sides on the motion for the repeal of that Bill, but, when it went before the other branch of the Legislature the proposal that a Minister brought down here for the destruction of the department, and for bringing the £10,000 a year to account for other purposes, was voted against by another Minister in that Chamber. Such things are very serious at a time like the present, when administration is of so much importance as it undoubtedly is. I should like to say a few words on the subject of retrenchment, a subject which will, no doubt, occupy a good deal of time during the passage of the estimates. I feel as strongly as any honorable member can that retrenchment is necessary, but I hope that in determining upon retrenchment we shall be just in the manner of carrying out our views. The expenditure of the country is divided under two heads—the ordinary expenditure and the extraordinary expenditure, which comes out of loan and is devoted to public works, harbours, &c. With regard to the ordinary expenditure, I may point out that when we come to examine the receipts and expenditure of the different departments, it will be found that many of them are self-supporting. Take the Registration of Lands and the Registry of Deeds, for instance: it will be found that not only are they self-supporting, but that they actually return a revenue to the Government—that, as a matter of fact, the Government is making money out of the labour of its officers. Then, if we take the Telegraph Department, the extension of which is, I think, one of the most satisfactory evidences of the progress of a young country, it will be found that it is paying its way—that is, if we cut off the expenditure that is forced upon the Government for the construction of new buildings and the extension of lines. I do not think the country would be doing right if it did not extend the operations of that department. If we want to economize in the departments, do not let us do it by cutting off £10 or £20 here and there from the salaries of officers, but let us deprive ourselves of luxuries which we have no right to have in the present state of the country. Do not let us act cruelly to officers of departments when there are other means of retrenchment if we choose to avail ourselves of them. I regret to say, and every honorable member must recognize it to be a fact, that, whenever an attempt is made to cut off a single luxury, the whole House is up to defend expenditure of that kind. I, as an old member of the Civil Service, probably feel very strongly on this subject, and may be thought to be partial; but when the House comes to think of the administration of something like £4,000,000 of money, for that is what

New Zealand has now to administer annually, I think there can be no worse economy than to cut down salaries and create discontent amongst officers who have to deal with such large sums of money. I believe that the service is composed of men who are zealous and earnest in the performance of their work; but human nature is human nature, and if their salaries are cut down you will not get the same amount of work out of them. £500 may be cut off here and there, but it will result in a loss of ten times the amount during the year. Then, as to the extraordinary expenditure, there is a point in connection with the loans which requires to be grappled with by Ministers. First of all, the manner in which the money has been raised and afterwards appropriated is, no doubt, exceedingly mischievous, and I believe the proposal of the Government to curtail the borrowing during the present year will be followed up by proposals that will place the whole borrowing system on a better footing. I have before stated my opinion that the sooner we come to an arrangement by which there shall be a power to appeal in respect to public works expenditure, and in respect to the raising of loans, the better. At Home a branch of the Board of Trade, which is known as the Board of Works and Loan Commissioners, distributes the works when it has satisfied itself that the loans will be properly expended; and I am confident that we shall never have a political body in this House which will be capable of determining what expenditure is remunerative and what is not. My honorable friend the member for Akaroa, when he alluded to the public and private borrowing, and the sums raised by Municipalities and other bodies, did not allude to the proposals of this year which seem to me to be the most serious of all. I refer to the proposals under the head of Harbours, which will amount to considerably over a million of money, besides the endowments in land. The Commissioner of Customs proposed to lay a return on the table which would show the total amount to be raised. He has not done so, but in round numbers I believe the amount will be something like a million and a half of money for the purposes of these harbours, and this money is to be handed over to the different Harbour Boards throughout the country to be expended without, as yet, any general control such as ought to be inserted in a borrowing Bill. I wish to say in connection with these harbours, that I think they are, more than anything else, purely colonial works. There is no one point of policy which will tend to raise the status of New Zealand among the colonies of this hemisphere more than the creation of free ports; and what are we doing? We are creating a large number of bodies which will render such a policy impossible. They will fix a different scale of charges in each port, which will be most detrimental to the trade of the colony. Even now we have a Harbour Board issuing regulations and pilot directions as if they were the Harbour Board of New Zealand; and such a state of things cannot but lead to very great difficulty in the future. I have been one who—when money was going freely, and, as I thought, a course of extravagance had been entered upon—raised my voice most strongly in favour of prudence and economy, and I shall not now, when the time has come when I believe every member of this House will have to give his attention and contribute what he can from his knowledge towards the administration of this country, raise the voice of complaint. I shall not be one of those who take a doleful and gloomy view of things. I believe, with one of the last speakers, that this is a time when we should put our shoulders to the wheel so as to get things put into proper form. I do not think they are in proper form at present, and I disagree in point of policy with the Government in respect to the borrowing powers they propose to give to Harbour Boards, and to Counties, and also as to the distribution of the Consolidated Fund to those bodies generally. Having a common purse with the colony always seemed to me one of the great evils of Provincialism, and I do not see that the proposals of the Government do away with the evils of Provincialism. They will be creating a number of hungry bodies, which will come up to this House to be satisfied, and will create just as great a clamour as was ever created by the Provincial Governments.

Sir G. GREY.—I desire to press the motion.

Major ATKINSON.—I trust that the Committee will not agree to report progress, and I hope we shall get through the business. We have had a financial discussion so far; and, if honorable gentlemen wish to discuss the finances further, I hope they will take this opportunity and discuss them thoroughly, and then let us proceed to necessary business. I hope a good deal will be done to-night before we part.

Sir G. GREY.—I hope the Committee will agree to the motion. The reason I give for it is this: I am exceedingly anxious to move a resolution in the House. I objected very much to the Committee of Supply being gone into until this discussion had taken place, and I asked that the discussion might be taken whilst the Speaker was in the chair, in the same manner in which it was taken last year. If that had been done I could have moved a resolution. My object in pressing the matter is that I desire to move a resolution, the Speaker being in the chair. It is my own belief, and the belief of many who think with me, that the estimates are capable of being reduced by £100,000, and I believe, further, that it would be possible to make an arrangement by which the payment of sinking fund could in a great degree be done away with. We think that these two matters would result in a yearly saving of £200,000, which would at once relieve the colony from the difficulties in which it is. I think that, having agreed that the Speaker should leave the chair in order that a discussion should be taken in Committee, I am now entitled to get the Speaker into the chair again, in order that I may have a right to move a resolution, which I could have done if the discussion had been allowed to take place in the House as it did last year. Therefore I must press my amendment.

Major ATKINSON.—The honorable member can move such a resolution as that at any time—the Committee, however, must consider what it means. The Government have reduced the estimates as far as they can see their way to do it prudently, but the Government are not prepared to carry on the business of the country if they are ordered to further reduce the estimates by £100,000. Of course, the Committee will understand that. I will give place to no man in my endeavour to reduce the estimates within proper limits; but I am not prepared to do so unreasonably. The honorable member has given no consideration whatever to the matter. He is absolutely ignorant of the finances of the country, of the estimates, of the working of the departments, and of the revenue of the country. He has shown that he is so, in every discussion in which he has spoken upon the finances, both this session and last session. Therefore, I say, let us come to a conclusion at once, and let the Committee understand the position of the honorable gentleman and the position of the Government.

Mr. REES.—The eminently characteristic speech the Premier has just made—characteristic both of his good temper and of his good judgment, as well as of the justice which he deals out to the honorable member for the Thames—was only of a piece with the finances which he had given to the country, and the position which he and his friends on the Ministerial benches have brought the country into. From himself down to the Ministerial ranks, to the Ministerial supporters, there is no single person who dares to hide from himself the fact, that the country has, through foreseen or unforeseen contingencies, been brought into a perilous position. We have all, supporters of the Ministry and members of the Opposition, a great deal of hope for the future of the country and a great deal of belief in its resources. It is no excuse for the honorable members, who have brought the country into this condition, to say that the country is wealthy, when they are accused of having squandered its wealth. It is of no use to say that the body-politic is able to bear a great strain, as an excuse for having placed an unprecedented strain upon it when it was not necessary to do so. The honorable member for Christchurch City, Mr. Stevens, who spoke in an utterly dispassionate manner—in a manner which could not, by any process of reasoning, be inferred to show the slightest animus one way or another—said that no man in his reason could blind himself to the fact that the country was in a critical position in its monetary affairs—of course he was not speaking of the constitutional question at all—one which might well cause alarm and raise grievous apprehensions even in the minds of those who had the greatest trust in the resources of the country. Then the honorable member for Avon, certainly not a gentleman who would be likely heedlessly to attempt in any way whatever to harass the Ministry, or to draw a gloomy view of our present or future financial position, goes further than the honorable member for Christchurch. The honorable member for Franklin (Mr. Lusk) also did so. Indeed, the more dispassionate honorable members seemed to be, and the less influenced by any possible feeling of faction or of party, the stronger were the arguments they used, so it appeared to me, as to the critical position in which the colony now is, and as to the danger or dangers which loom ahead. It will require a great deal of skill, forethought, and patriotic feeling, as well as good sense and good judgment, to enable us to meet those dangers. The honorable member for Christchurch said the Ministry were deserving of our sympathy. I do not understand what the honorable member meant by that. Sympathy! For what? Sympathy because they have been called upon to suffer? They have been called upon to suffer nothing. Sympathy because they have been compelled to take a course which they were not inclined to take? They have not been compelled to take any course. Sympathy because for years they have lorded it over the House by virtue of their majority, have lorded it over a minority which may represent a majority of the people? Sympathy for that! Sympathy because they have been allowed to borrow to an extent unknown before in proportion to the means and population of the country? Sympathy because they have been enabled to dispense millions of money without any check? Do they claim sympathy for this? If it be because they have had a career of untrammelled prosperity, and because they have been placed in a more powerful position than I believe any other Ministry ever was placed in any of the British colonies—if that is cause for sympathy, then the sympathies of the House and the country ought to be given with no ordinary measure to the honorable members who occupy the position of Ministers. If those honorable gentlemen had to endure a time of adversity, and had been called upon, as men were called upon seven or eight years ago, to face a decreasing revenue, and not by external aid, by the aid of borrowed money, to build up a fictitious prosperity in the country; if they had been called upon to face a great monetary crisis, to face a time of great depression; if they had been called upon to suffer in this way, and to see a country naturally looking to them to rescue it from depression, whilst they, with vigorous minds and patriotic hearts, were doing what they could, honorable members might well have accorded sympathy to them. But for the truculent air with which they speak to honorable members who differ from them, for laughing at honorable gentlemen who seek to point out defects in their proposals and in their financial measures, they cannot claim any sympathy whatever. Their suffering will come soon enough. When these moneys are done, and when they can by no possibility float numerous Treasury bills to cover deficiencies in receipts and under-estimates of expenditure, when the borrowing of money is at an end, when the public works are finished, and they have to face an angry people both in the North and in the South, as they will have to do before very long, then they will have some call for sympathy; but, like Owen Glendower calling spirits from the vasty deep, they may call, and call in vain. Will the sympathy come? Sir, the financial propositions laid down by the Premier are not founded upon just grounds, or upon just expectations. The honorable member for Christchurch (Mr. Stevens) very well put it to-night that there will be a falling off in the revenue this year. No one can have a doubt of it. Of course it will follow upon the falling off of the expenditure upon public works, which naturally gave a large producing power to the people for the time being—gave an artificial producing power and an artificial spending power to the people, who received more or less some cash from the Government works going on and from the money spent, which otherwise would not have been spent. When the golden sands of the stream of Pactolus cease to flow we shall see a falling revenue, for what has been done hitherto will no longer be done; the gulf will be so great between the revenue and expenditure that even Ministers themselves will be afraid to ask permission to float so many Treasury bills, and it will be necessary to bridge it over. The estimates we have had submitted to us do not touch at all the new expenditure that is coming upon the country. I may observe that I hope the Premier will remember, in dealing with honorable members, not to speak as he spoke just now to the honorable member for the Thames. It does not seem to me to accord with political decency at any rate, nor with the courtesy with which the Premier of a Government, and the leader of this House, should speak to another honorable member superior to himself in regard to patriotic feeling, intellectual power, education, or position. I say I hope he will give up using such a tone. If he will try to think of it, I am sure he will see how ill it becomes him, and with what very bad grace it sits upon him as leader of this House, to attempt either to take up such a position or to assume such an air as he did a few minutes ago in speaking of the honorable member for the Thames. The Government has not, in the slightest degree, led the House to expect, or provided for, any other estimates of a great amount of cost, which must necessarily fall upon the revenues of the country. Does the honorable gentleman think that these sixty-three County Councils are going to be called into existence without the expenditure of any money? Have they made any provision for that? Who will pay for all the work that will have to be done? The Government themselves will have to do an enormous amount of extra work; they will have to employ extra hands for that and pay them. It will, I suppose, require £1,000 each before these County Councils are fairly started into existence. Why, the very elections themselves will cost a large amount of money. They must have offices for the County Chairman, for the County Treasurer and Secretary, and for the Council to meet in. Where are they going to get them? They will not spring up or grow; they must be built, or purchased, or obtained in some way. That will cost money. Why, the very furniture for these offices, the very books, the seals for the counties—everything will have to be paid for. There is not a penny down in the estimates for these things. I undertake to say that before the sixty-three County Councils come fairly into existence—before they commence their work—the expenditure, with the salaries that will have to be paid, will amount up to nearly £1,000 for each Council. Well, there is no provision for this. If it is to come out of the county rates it will be more than the whole rates of the counties will be in a year. If they are going to rate the people, the farmers and the property-holders, simply to pay these things, I should like to know with what favour this scheme will be received. The people then will say that indeed they have changed King Log for King Stork—that, whereas the old Provincial Councils as Log did not represent them in the outlying districts, the new County Councils will be the Stork that will swallow them up. These honorable gentlemen not only boast by inference—but they do it openly, and one would think their trumpeter was dead, and that they had the necessity of putting the trumpet to their own lips and blowing their own praises. It seems that, with the exception of one or two honorable gentlemen who are very much attached to them, they cannot find anybody to speak well of them but themselves. Therefore I think it will be wise for the Premier when he speaks again to any member of this House—whether it be the honorable member for the Thames or not—to remember that, and not cast such accusations as he did—that every speech the honorable member makes, every remark he makes, and every effort he makes in this House shows his ignorance of this, and his ignorance of that, and his ignorance of the other. We might almost imagine the honorable gentleman was looking in the looking-glass when he made such statements. And this is statesmanship? When the country is running head over heels in debt, the people running head over heels in confusion, the Constitution pulled down, and lying scattered about in ruins, nothing inserted, nothing done, a session sitting four months; and now, when we have just begun the estimates, when the Counties Bill, in a mutilated form, has been passed through—a Bill which really does not affect the local self-government of the people in the slightest degree—the Premier takes it upon himself to tell other honorable members that they do not know anything about it, and that every discussion shows their ignorance. The assumption of wisdom is good no doubt very often; but I think it is very ill-placed on such an occasion as this. The suggestion that was made by the honorable member for Christchurch, Mr. Stevens, in relation to the Sinking Fund, is not, to my mind, so difficult a matter as that honorable gentleman seemed to consider it. The Sinking Fund, after all, is only a statutory assurance for the provision of the payment of certain money borrowed by this country within certain times; and I have not the slightest doubt that, without any breach of faith whatever, supposing the interest upon the money were paid, the sinking funds could be let fall altogether. The Hon. the Premier now laughs. It is refreshing sometimes to hear him laugh. It is refreshing in this way: that, whenever the honorable gentleman laughs, the members of this House always know that he is not at all prepared with an argument. When he is prepared with an argument, or even when he is prepared with a species of political truculence, he assumes a peculiar style; but when he cannot use either one or the other, the honorable gentleman laughs. So that it is, to my mind, a very assuring sign when that honorable gentleman's features are pleasantly convulsed. We have not seen so much of it lately as we did at the beginning of the session—I will say that for the honorable gentleman; but it is always reassuring to anybody who is urging an argument. I say that the same law which made the Sinking Fund can unmake it. Exactly in the same way as if an income tax were placed by this House or by the Assembly—for we have got too much into the habit of thinking this House everything—on all incomes, it would take off a certain portion or percentage that we pay for the interest on our loans. Now, that would be exactly as great a breach of faith against the persons who, outside this country or within it, receive money as the interest on the money which they have lent to this country, as the doing away with the Sinking Fund would be. In fact, it would be a greater breach of faith in this sense: that it would immediately affect the people by taking so much money out of their pockets, by reducing the rate of interest which they received from 5 per cent. to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or something of that sort. Whereas, on the other hand, the doing away with the Sinking Fund—which, after all, is only a statutory assurance for the repayment of money after a certain fixed time—and providing other means for it, would not in the slightest degree either diminish the value of the debentures, or make them in the slightest degree less safe. I am not prepared to say myself, but I think the Treasurer, if he is asked, will assure this Committee that the debentures on which the Sinking Fund accrues have no further value in the market than the debentures bearing the same interest on which there are no sinking funds. If that be the case how can it possibly damage them? There can be no reason if, as I believe is the actual fact, the 5 per cent. debentures on which there are sinking funds are of exactly the same value as the 5 per cent. debentures on which there are no sinking funds. That is a most important item, inasmuch as the Sinking Fund itself is £110,000 a year, and the money which is paid for interest on the Sinking Fund on our own securities is another £70,000 or £80,000 a year. That represents a sum of £182,000 a year, which would have covered last year a great portion of the deficiency which was seen in the revenue. Well then, the necessity arises for retrenchment in some form or another. It is all very well for the Premier to say the Government will not be forced into retrenchment; if the majority of the House like—

Major ATKINSON.—I never said so at all.

Mr. REES.—I understood the honorable gentleman to say so.

Major ATKINSON.—Quite the reverse.

Mr. REES.—I would like to know what the honorable member did say?

Major ATKINSON.—I said I was not prepared to agree that £100,000 should be taken off these estimates without consideration; that I was prepared to reduce them to the utmost limits consistent with the efficiency of the service, and that the House must trust me to do that if they desired that the public service should be carried on properly; but that I could not undertake to accept a reduction of £100,000 without due consideration.

Mr. REES.—I should like to know if that was what the honorable gentleman said? (Hear, hear.) Well, who asked the honorable gentleman to do that?

Major ATKINSON.—The honorable member for the Thames.

Mr. REES.—Not at all. The honorable member for the Thames did nothing of the sort. He never asked the honorable gentleman to strike off without consideration. I am astonished to hear the honorable gentleman say that the honorable member for the Thames ever asked him to strike off a penny without consideration. What he wanted was, that the Government should pay some little consideration to these things. That is what he wanted, and he said that with due consideration—especially if they called to their aid the honorable member for Waikouaiti, the new light on finance—the honorable gentleman did not apply the remark about the Commissioner of Customs: that was my interpolation—with due consideration, he believed, £100,000 could be struck off.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Do it.

Mr. REES.—I am amused at the innocence of the honorable member who comes from Blueskin. "Do it," he says. Will the honorable gentleman support him? There is no "Hear, hear," to that.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I will support him in reducing the estimates. The estimates are now before us, and it is for the Committee to reduce them as they think proper. Generally, I am prepared to support any honorable member who goes in for striking off unnecessary services.

Mr. REES.—When the very first item was proposed to be reduced last night, the honorable gentleman got up and was going to read about forty pages out of a book in support of the item.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—That was for a necessary service.

Mr. REES.—I do not say it was not for a necessary service. All I say is, that the fact remains, and I will be bound the honorable gentleman will do the same in reference to everything and say it is a necessary service. And yet the honorable gentleman, with a sort of stentorian "Hear, hear," when anything is said about Ministers and reductions, says, "There are the estimates; let them be reduced." Why, if a majority of the House say they are to be reduced they will be reduced. But who are the proper persons to reduce them and bring them to the House in a proper manner? Is the burden to be cast upon the House? Not at all. It is the Ministry who are responsible for the estimates. What are the Ministers for? Honorable members seem to have forgotten altogether the functions of the Ministers. The Ministers themselves seem to have forgotten what are the functions of Ministers. They come here and say, "If the House likes to do this," and "If the House likes to do that;" "If the Committee likes to do this," and "If the Committee likes to do that." That is not the function of Ministers. Ministers should bring down their estimates to the House and say, "This is all we can do. If the House thinks something more can be done, let somebody else do it—we will not." That would be an independent statement. But I suppose nobody ever dreamed of getting an independent statement from such a Ministry. If they do they will find themselves wonderfully deceived. We have now heard a statement, to make which the honorable gentlemen have availed themselves of the assistance of all the clever persons in the House. The honorable member for Olive helped them. I was sorry to hear my honorable friend Sir Julius Vogel take a little rise out of that honorable member by saying that he was a most rising statesman, or something of that sort. The Ministry, if they require any financial help, can either go to the honorable member for Olive or the honorable member for Waikouaiti. The Ministers ought to see that the finances were brought down in such a shape that they could defend them, and could say, "This is all that can be done." But what is the duty of the Ministry in the face of a certain amount of revenue? It is to make the expenditure meet the revenue, and that they profess not to do. Why should it be on the Land Fund alone? And here I will remark for one moment upon the course which the Ministry have taken in relation to the Land Fund. It was said over and over again that the Land Fund would not be taken for public purposes—that the Land Fund was not to be touched—that the Land Fund was to be sacred, perfectly sacred, free from all unholy hands whatever. What is the state of affairs now? The Land Fund is nothing of the sort. In fact it is very evident that the whole of the Land Fund will very soon be taken away from the provinces altogether, whether they be rich or poor—the whole of it will be taken, and, to use an expression of the Superintendent of Otago, thrown into the maelström of colonial finance. Even the Ministers: what do they say? They say that the Land Fund will have to be pledged to the extent of £145,000 to carry on the business of the country. That amount is to be taken out beforehand. What will they do next year, with a falling revenue and increasing expenditure? We shall have to pay interest to an enormous extent. The interest on the Sinking Fund will amount to £1,200,000 before long. While the debt is going up, the income will be coming down. I suppose those honorable gentlemen will say, "The House must give us power to raise a little more money on Treasury bills." That is the finance of the honorable gentlemen, in the same way that the Counties Bill and the Financial Arrangements Bill are their constitutional measures. I think it is time that this House took the matter in hand. We all know that it is somewhat difficult, in the face of the present feeling of honorable members, and the pledges which they gave when they came up to this House—it is somewhat difficult to compel honorable members to divest themselves of feeling and to examine things exactly as they are. In the interest of the country, in the interest of the constituents, in the interest of the public creditor, in the interest of every class in the community, because the payment of the public debt must be considered—even the large property-holders must pay heavy rates, if the mass of the people are not able to pay through the Customs—in the interest of every class in the community, it is quite time for this House to take the matter in hand, if the Ministry will not do so, and say the expenditure shall be made to fit with the income. Any one acquainted with speculations knows what it is to be plunged head over ears in difficulties through not making one's expenditure fit with one's income. They will know it by years of bitter suffering. The country will know exactly the same thing, for the affairs of the country are exactly like the affairs of a joint-stock company or an individual. Take, for instance, the case of an individual going largely into mining speculations. He spends a great deal of money, and gradually goes on spending until he gets beyond his means and goes beyond his depth; and if events do not turn out fortunately for him, what is the result? Why, ruin. Having spent years of suffering, he tries to get into a good position. It will be the same with this country, if we do not take care. The members of this House ought to take care. The fictitious prosperity abounding during the last few years cannot be taken as a criterion of what will be in years to come. Last year, we had a deficiency of £300,000 or £400,000. This year we shall have a greater deficiency, although the Land Fund is to be taken, except the £75,000 for Canterbury; but they will find that that will also be taken. Next year we shall have a still greater deficiency. I should like to know where or when it is going to end. If a man left his affairs in the hands of a trustee, and the trustee were to say to him, "I shall do the best I can, but I shall run you £300,000 or £400,000 in debt next year," would the owner of the property trust its management into his hands? No; he would say, "If you cannot make the expenditure fit with the income, then I will find some person who can." The honorable gentlemen on those benches say they will not do that. We want them to consider whether they cannot make greater reductions, not only in the Sinking Fund, but in the public expenditure. I am sure that the public expenditure could be reduced. It has been already hinted that the reductions should begin in the very highest quarters, among the Ministers themselves—that they should not begin in the lowest quarters, not with the tail-end—with those who have actually to make a struggle for the very bread they eat and the clothes they wear. Let us see whether reduction cannot be carried out in other quarters—whether we cannot begin with those who are able to spare something out of their luxuries or comforts—and, if necessary, let us impose additional taxation upon the country. If that is to come, and it must come sooner or later, why not meet it at once? It is all very well to say that it is a distasteful thing. Of course, it is a distasteful thing. It is very pleasant to be able to spend millions of borrowed money; but it is not pleasant to pay the interest afterwards. If we have spent the money, let us begin now and endeavour to find the money to provide for its repayment. That is what the Ministry are wanted to do. I am sure the House would back them up in such a course. I am confident that the House and the country would support them. If they brought down a proposal for a property and income tax, I am confident that the country, and a large majority of this House, would carry them through with it. ("No.") I do not know who says "No;" I know the Opposition would. What is wanted is the consideration of this question. What is the use of passing the estimates, and to find when we meet next year that the country is £300,000 or £400,000 behindhand, besides the expenditure upon the public works? This will be so; I do not think honorable members can hide that from themselves. There will be an increasing burden to be met afterwards. If there should come upon us any commercial crisis, if there should come a monetary panic, if property decreased in value, it would come to this, that we should not be able to pay the interest on the borrowed money. It is clear that the affairs of the country must be carried on. However economically they are carried on, they cannot be carried on without a certain amount of expenditure. There will be an increasing amount of interest to pay; it will go on like snowballs, rapidly increasing as they roll on. It is better that we should face these things. If a European war should happen to break out; and if a time of great depression came upon this country, I do believe that we should find ourselves absolutely unable to pay the interest on the public debt. We cannot always expect to be in a prosperous position. I say, if Ministers, those great financiers can afford to taunt other people upon their ignorance of finance, if they simply, by a majority in this House, are able to occupy a position, let them show by their works and their acts that they are capable of holding such a position, and not be issuing Treasury bills to meet the exigencies of the moment. We shall have more Treasury bills next year, and the year after, until they will not be able to get any more bills discounted. The House, in terror and fear, will refuse them such authority, and then grinding taxation will have to take place in order to meet the demands of the public creditor. This is perfectly plain; every man can see it. I would ask even the warmest supporters of the Government to consider whether it is not better now to face it at once. Let Ministers determine to make a large reduction; let them determine to see if they cannot do something about the Sinking Fund. Let them, as the honorable member for Christchurch pointed out, if necessary bring down a proposal for increased taxation—a property or income tax—by which the interest on the Treasury bills, and the ever-increasing deficiency in the receipts as against expenditure, might, to a great extent, be met. Why, any man of ordinary ability can understand that, and do it. Any three honorable members of this House could form such a plan as that, and I believe the majority of the House would carry it into effect. It is wrong to carry on a policy of continually borrowing to make up deficiencies. We shall have £150,000 Treasury bills to meet this account, and £150,000 of Treasury bills to meet another account. Every year the expenditure must increase, unless we devise and act on a scheme of retrenchment. The plan we are following can only lead to final disaster and financial ruin. It is a plan which can only lead to great distraction among the people and create a party class-feeling. The end of it will be this, that the great property-holders will begin to fear that the value of their properties will be largely decreased, and that enormous taxation will fall on them. The men who spoke in this way a year or two ago were called alarmists, or something of that sort. Those honorable gentlemen seem to fancy they are going to get out of their financial embarrassments by borrowing money on Treasury bills, the interest on which will have to be met. Why do they not stand up at once, like financiers and men, and meet this difficulty in the face? To increase our liabilities, to throw greater burdens on our shoulders in the future, is not the way to meet the difficulty. I would therefore ask, Sir, that they should take some time to consider this matter. If they say that their estimates cannot be reduced, then the House must consider whether they can be reduced or not. I hope, however strong supporters of the Government honorable gentlemen may be, they will, in the interest of every class, consider the questions of retrenchment, of additional taxation, and of the Sinking Fund. If retrenchment is not carried out during this session, it will not be carried out at all. Do you think that, if the estimates are passed for certain works, Ministers will then retrench? Is there anything to show that they will do so, and that they will not carry on the present extravagant expenditure? I hope the motion of the honorable member for the Thames will be agreed to.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, the attack to which I was subjected must be present in the minds of honorable gentlemen; and I should not have noticed it but for the effect the statements made by the Premier might have upon the country. I was accused by him of being utterly ignorant of the finances of the country, and of having given no consideration whatever to the estimates. I was accused of that, Sir, and the accusation was made in the rudest manner—a manner not becoming the leader of this House, or the House itself. Now, I wish to tell honorable members, Sir, that when the gentleman who with such rudeness and ignorance spoke to me was in his cradle, or certainly in his early youth, I restored the finance of one great country which, by financiers like himself, had been involved in difficulties very much like those he has involved this country in. And not only that, but throughout my life I have had to attend to the finances of colonies. I have administered the Government of New Zealand for years upon the most moderate sums, at the same time conducting the Government in the most efficient manner. I left it unburdened by any debt. I assisted its people to found that prosperity upon which the credit has been built up which has enabled that honorable gentleman and his friends to raise such great sums; and, with all that knowledge and that experience, I have most carefully considered the estimates brought forward by the Government. I appeal to the speeches which I made last session in this House, and ask honorable members whether every one of the predictions I then made has not been fulfilled. I assert that, so far from my having shown ignorance, the honorable gentleman himself has shown the most lamentable ignorance of the finance of the country, and he has always shrunk from allowing his finance to be investigated. Last session he put off the question of his finance until many members had gone away, and this session he has pursued the same course. I have not only considered this finance myself, but I have had the assistance of able men, who have, in the most courteous manner, given me their opinion upon it. Sir, not only myself but the honorable member for Christchurch (Mr. Stevens) also proposed that we should at once face the difficulty we had to meet. The honorable member for Akaroa, in point of fact, proposed the same thing, and such has been the general feeling. Now, Sir, my heart has been filled with concern at seeing the reckless waste of public money which the Colonial Treasurer has carried on. My heart has been filled with concern at seeing him squandering the public lands on his favourites; my heart has been filled with concern at seeing him tax unjustly Her Majesty's subjects in this country, and at seeing him save from taxation those classes who he thought would keep him in power. Sir, when I think of these things I feel what I can hardly describe. And now, when I see that he could, if he pleased, make reductions such as I speak of; when I see that he could restore speedily the prosperity of the country; when I see that he could relieve the producing classes by taking off them the taxes which unjustly press upon them; when I see that he could put taxes upon those friends of his who draw large incomes from this country and spend them elsewhere, then, Sir, I am determined to force my resolution on the House. I wish to bring him under the notice of the people whom he has so cruelly wronged, robbing them of their lands and property, and all to gratify his lust of power.

Motion for reporting progress negatived.

On the motion, That the item £31,065 2s. be agreed to,

Mr. MURRAY moved, That the item be reduced by £100.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that he believed this portion of the estimates was prepared by the Speaker, and the Government had, in reality, very little to do with it. As he understood the honorable member for Bruce was desirous of opposing all the additions under this head, he would move, as an amendment, That the item £1,250 for the Legislative Council be reduced by £250.

Mr. SWANSON thought a great deal of time would be saved if the debates took place on the total amounts, and not on any individual amount.

Mr. MURRAY explained that he was not proposing a reduction, but merely opposing an increase being made.

Mr. REID hoped that the Committee would be consistent. If they were going to increase their honoraria on account of the length of the session, it would not be consistent for them to refuse to pass claims which were made on the same ground.

Mr. MONTGOMERY understood that the honorarium was kept at the same rate as last year.

Major ATKINSON said an increase had been decided upon, and it would appear on the supplementary estimates.

Sir G. GREY asked if the Government proposed to support the increase.

Major ATKINSON said the Government had undertaken to bring it down and would support it. He would point out, with regard to the salaries now being considered, that it was rather a delicate matter for the House to reduce what the other branch of the Legislature had determined, after careful consideration, was a fair remuneration for its officers. It was on the recommendation made by the Legislative Council that these salaries were brought down as they now appeared.

Mr. MURRAY could see no reason why the House should depart from the principle which it had laid down last year.

Item, Chairman of Committees, Legislative Council (addition to permanent salary, £300), £100, struck out.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved, That the item Clerk (addition to permanent salary, £400), £100, be struck out.

Agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved, That the item Clerk Assistant, £350, be reduced by £50.

Agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON moved, That the item Clerk of Parliaments (addition to permanent salary, £600), £100, be struck out. He did not see why an exception should be made in the officers of the other House. If this gentleman got £600 a year for the work he did in the House he had a thoroughly good job, for he was no longer in the House than he (Mr. Swanson) was, nor indeed so long, and had not to read through the same mass of Bills and papers?

Mr. ROLLESTON would point out that this officer had very important duties to perform, and his office was a very responsible one. The Clerk of the House had to read through all the Bills that came before the House, to learn their nature, and to advise Mr. Speaker on all technical points. It was a position of responsibility, and should be recognized as such. He did not believe in underpaying responsibility of this class connected with the Legislature. This officer's place could not be supplied by taking up any chance man, for it required long training to fit him for the position. The House would not treat a professional man in the way now proposed; and the Clerk's duties required just as much training to perform as any professional man went through.

Major ATKINSON thought the House would be making a great mistake if it reduced this salary. Great confusion in the business must ensue if there was not a competent officer in this position, and it was necessary to pay a sufficient salary to secure the services of such an officer. This was not a question of increase of salary, as the salary now proposed had been paid for years, and the circumstances of the colony were not such as to call for this reduction.

Mr. STAFFORD said that if the Committee was going to reduce salaries that had existed for years it should do so on some principle, and not pick out particular cases. He would point out that the duties of the Clerk did not end with the session, as he had a great deal to do afterwards in the preparation of the Journals and the Appendices. If the Committee thought the circumstances of the colony were such that salaries should be reduced, let them pass a resolution that all salaries above a certain amount should be reduced, and not select particular officers, which was a very invidious and unwise course to pursue.

Motion negatived.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved, That the item Expenses of Members of both Houses, £18,075, be reduced by £75. His object was to test the question whether the members of the Assembly living in Wellington should receive any honorarium. If this was payment of members, then 150 or 200 guineas was not sufficient; but if it was to defray the expenses of members while attending Parliament, then those residing in Wellington should not draw any honorarium. There were twelve members of the Houses residing in Wellington, and one within seven or eight miles of it. The practice, when the Assembly met in Auckland was, if he remembered rightly, that no members of Parliament residing within fifteen miles of the Parliament buildings received any honorarium. The present system was hardly fair to those honorable members who came from a considerable distance, and were put to considerable expense and inconvenience in attending in their places in Parliament. They should not be placed on the same footing as members who resided on the spot, and, having their own homes there, were not put to any expense. He moved this amendment so that if it were carried the Government might take it as an indication that the Committee did not think members resident in Wellington should receive any honorarium. It did not signify that he only moved a small reduction, because the Government were not bound to expend the whole sum voted unless they knew it was the wish of the House that they should do so.

Major ATKINSON said the Government could hardly take this amendment as an indication of the intention of the Committee, seeing that the House had, in a previous session, after careful inquiry by a Select Committee, passed a resolution directing what was to be done. Before the Government could act in the matter, the House must pass some resolution in relation to it.

Mr. REYNOLDS would point out that, before a resolution passed by a previous Parliament was of any value at the present time, it must be re-passed by the present Parliament. This Parliament could pass any resolution it liked upon the subject, and it was only the Government who could bring down such a resolution. By testing the question in the way he proposed, it would be an indication to the Government that the House thought such a resolution should be brought down.

Mr. SWANSON said the best way to settle the difficulty would be to fix a radius, and decide that members residing within that radius should receive no honorarium or allowance. In Auckland, the Provincial Council fixed the radius at twenty miles.

Mr. ROLLESTON thought it would be a most invidious thing for the House to take upon itself to differentiate the amounts to be paid to honorable members. The expenses of one member might be greater than those of another; and he could quite conceive of circumstances which would justify the Wellington members in taking honoraria as well as other honorable members.

Mr. REID said that when the proposal to pay the Wellington members was brought forward it was treated as payment of members; but if they were going to retrace their steps, he would suggest that no allowance should be paid to members who resided within two miles of the House. It would be unreasonable to expect members to go five miles without receiving an allowance; but if the sum were not regarded as payment of members, he saw no reason why the Wellington members should receive it.

Mr. REES thought there was a good deal of reason in what had fallen from the honorable member for Port Chalmers and the honorable member for Taieri. If the sum was to be looked upon as payment of members, there could be no objection to all members receiving it. He had been in favour of payment of members for years; but if the sum paid was to be looked upon as an honorary gift, those members who lived in Wellington, and were put to no great loss of time in attending the House, should not be allowed to receive it. As a matter of fact, the Wellington members were the worst attenders in the House; with one or two exceptions they were very irregular, and spent a little time in the House just as other members might do in the Town Councils of their respective towns. They had no claim whatever, unless the sum were to be paid simply and solely as payment of members.

Mr. ROLLESTON said he would be sorry to see the idea of the honorable gentleman acted upon. His argument in favour of the honorarium was, that it presented an opening to all classes to become members of the House. If a working man were elected to a seat in that House, he would of course have to give up his business, and must be remunerated in some way. Then, again, it was evident that members residing in Wellington would find it impossible to attend to their business if they were at all attentive to their parliamentary duties.

Mr. BURNS said he had heard a great deal of abuse levelled at the Provincial Councils this session; but there was one very good practice which might be copied from them with advantage; and that was that members residing within a certain radius should not receive any honorarium. If they were going to debate the principle of payment of members, the whole question would have to be considered; but as this was a matter of reimbursing members for expenses incurred, he thought the plan adopted by the Provincial Council of Otago was a very good one. To carry out that idea, he would move, That the item, Expenses of Members of both Houses, be reduced by £2,075; and he would at the same time give notice that it was his intention to move that the expenses of members be limited to 20s. a day from the opening of the session to its close, such sum to be paid only to such members as attended in their places in the House.

Mr. REES said that the remarks of the honorable member for Avon pointed not so much to honoraria as to the payment of members when he said that, if the Wellington members did not receive the honorarium, a working man might be debarred from coming into the House. That principle would apply all over the colony. There were many working men—not working, in the usual acceptation of the term—who would be glad, if they knew they would receive sufficient to compensate them for loss of time, to become members of the House. The House would have to pass a resolution in favour of payment of members before very long; and, if they did so, it would widen the range from which they then would get representative men. There were young men of intelligence who would not come here, knowing they had nothing to depend upon, for they would not come here to make a trade of politics. If the honorable member for Avon supported that view, he was entirely at one with him.

Mr. SWANSON said he believed the Speaker had it in his power to make advances on account of the honorarium as the session went on. If honorable members have been allowed to draw money from the Speaker, would he be expected to get it back from them again? If they made any change, it should apply to the future. As to the question of it being payment of members or honorarium, he thought 150 guineas looked very much the same in a man's hand whether they called it honorarium or payment. It was simply the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. £300 or £400 would not pay some members for their time, while £150 would be a great deal too much for others. In the Auckland Provincial Council, one of the best members was a working man, who attended the meetings after he had done his work, and he received no honorarium.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY thought they ought to pass a resolution applying to the next session either for the payment of so much a day or for an amount for the session. It would be very hard at the end of the session to take away that which people had calculated upon. He would support any resolution fixing the honorarium for the future.

Mr. HUNTER did not wish to refer to the issue which was before the House; but he desired to say that the statement that the Wellington members did not attend to their duties was without foundation on fact. He might say he and his colleague, who, he regretted to say, had been ill lately, attended regularly. Mr. Speaker was a Wellington member, and Mr. Bunny attended regularly. The statement made by honorable members was not borne out by fact.

Mr. BURNS hoped the honorable gentleman would not think he had said anything disrespectful to the Wellington members. He wished to lay down the broad principle that members were only to be recouped for any extra expense they were put to. Honorable members on all sides of the House were talking of reductions, but it would be useless to expect that reductions would be made if they did not begin with themselves. He wished most sincerely to put that view before the House; because honorable members should make even some little sacrifice if necessary, rather than that the estimates should go forth to the public with other reductions made, and nothing out of their own honorarium.

Mr. SHRIMSKI was as independent as any member of the House, and it made very little difference to him whether he got a fraction or a pound. He could not understand how those honorable gentlemen who are so much in favour of a reduction in the honorarium were generally the very first to go to the Treasury and get their money. It would be far better if they left it there. There were many men in the House who could not afford to come here without receiving something, for Wellington was an expensive place to live in. This was the harvest for the Wellington people; and when honorable members came here they were pretty well fleeced.

Mr. MOORHOUSE said honorable members who objected to the honorarium on principle might leave the money in the Treasury. He recollected one distinguished member of the Legislature who used to make an annual motion for the reduction of the honorarium, which was really a payment. On one occasion, after making his usual protest against the payment of members, he was delayed in starting from the place where Parliament met, and, having received all that the Legislature provided for his expenses, he made a demand to the Treasury through the proper channel for payment for the day during which he had been detained. It would be better to dispense with the humbug attaching to this matter. It was manifest to a good many that certain honorable members made an actual profit out of their attendance here, and he recollected that one honorable member classed his honorarium as one of his assets, together with his cows, pigs, and poultry; and that honorable gentleman, who came from a remote part of the colony, had now to depend upon his cows, &c., without any honorarium. It was a right and truthful thing to call what they received "payment." He confessed for himself that when he made his arrangements for seeking a seat in the House, being a man of very small means indeed, he set off against his general expenses the circumstance that he was to receive so much for his services in Parliament; and he would not be prepared to submit to the displacement of that amount without some feeling of disappointment. Those honorable gentlemen who wished to make capital by disclaiming against the iniquity of receiving payment for honest service, could make much more capital by declining to attend the Treasury to receive the money.

Mr. SWANSON said that if there was a man of that sort he would set him down as a regular blockhead. There were several members who would vote to do away with the honorarium altogether, and who would vote to prevent any increase, but who, so long as the honorarium was paid, would continue to receive it. If they did not draw the money, it would be spread all over the colony; so they preferred to take it to their own districts, and use it in the places they came from. He knew several members who did not spend a penny of the honorarium upon themselves.

Sir G. GREY was one of those who thought that members should be paid for their attendance in Parliament. In no other way was it possible to secure fair representation. He had not yet been able to get sufficient information to satisfy himself as to what was the necessary sum members should be paid to induce proper representatives to come to the House. It was with delight that he heard the honorable member for Newton describe the appearance in the Auckland Provincial Council of a real working man. He thought such men might be able to attend the Provincial Council without being paid, but it was impossible they could come to Wellington without receiving something to pay for their expenses. It was with great regret that he found, the moment some reduction was attempted, the Government at once declared their aversion to such a reduction being made. A double question here arose—namely, the payment of members of the Legislative Council and the payment of members of the House of Representatives. He submitted that it was questionable, under all the circumstances, whether the same sums should be paid to a member of the Legislature who resided in Wellington and to a member who was brought from a remote district in the colony. The same remark applied equally to each House. He did not think any payment was necessary to gentlemen who resided in Wellington. They should remember that a Minister could nominate as many members as he pleased to the Legislative Council, and, in point of fact, it could become a practice that a Minister could confer pensions upon particular individuals if the present system of honorarium were continued. He found there were no less than six members of the Upper House who were inhabitants of the city of Wellington, and that was an undue number, being one-seventh of the whole House. Considering the important measures that had recently been thrown out, he thought that was a state of things which should not be allowed to go on. It might serve to remedy it if the members of the Council residing in Wellington received no honorarium. When he recollected that a Bill for reducing the gold duty had been thrown out in the Legislative Council, and how large a power the Wellington members must have exercised in that action, and when he remembered that Wellington was not a gold district, he thought it was a wrong to the mining population of the colony that such a state of things should be allowed, and his earnest advice was that Ministers should be required to bring down a series of resolutions by which this payment to members residing in Wellington should stop; and if they were averse to such a resolution, they should go out of office and let other men come in.

Mr. STAFFORD said the argument of the honorable member for the Thames was a most extraordinary one. He protested against six members of the Upper House residing in or near Wellington, and he gave as a reason the influence they had over certain Bills. If they were not going to pay members of the Upper House, it would be found that nearly all the members of the Council would be from Wellington, and that very power which the honorable gentleman appeared to object to would be increased. When in office, he had found that as a fact there were as many refusals to accept seats in the Council as there were acceptances.

Mr. REID thought that the honorable member had not properly interpreted the argument of the honorable member for the Thames, who suggested that, with the view of remedying the present state of things, of which he complained, the honorarium to members residing in Wellington should cease, because it might not then be so easy to get Wellington members into the Council.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE would take that opportunity to record his protest against the proposed increase. He was a representative of a class of people in the country, and he thought that, without exception, he was the only man of the House who could properly be called a working man, as he received wages for his work, and literally earned his bread by the sweat of his brow. He was prepared to say that 150 guineas was quite sufficient to defray a member's ordinary expenses in Wellington, provided the session did not last more than four months. If, however, the sessions were of five or six months' duration, he was inclined to think it would be a question whether the honorarium should not be abolished and payment of members substituted. He was sure that, whatever might be a member's avocation, whether he was of the legal profession, engaged in mercantile pursuits, or was a farmer or a labouring man, he could not be absent from his home for a period of six months without receiving something to cover his expenses. He did not wish to make political capital out of his opposition to the increase to the honorarium. He told his constituents he could not come to Parliament unless he was paid, and he told them he would not come for the sake of the pay. There seemed to be a diversity of opinion as to the wants of members during their stay in Wellington. Some honorable members had told him that the proposed honorarium of £200 was not sufficient to defray their ordinary expenses. That was a statement which he could hardly reconcile to his mind. That amount was quite sufficient for his wants; it was more than sufficient. He would take that opportunity of entering his protest against the increase of the honorarium. He would support a reduction to one guinea a day. He might state, in reply to the honorable member for the Thames, that he had a wife and family to support at home, and still he considered the amount mentioned sufficient.

Mr. ROWE did not think this was the right time to discuss the question of honorarium. It had already been discussed, and there would be another opportunity of discussing it when the supplementary estimates were brought down. If the honorarium was to be continued in future sessions, he thought the members representing Wellington should not receive it. For many years he left his work to attend the Auckland Provincial Council without receiving any payment whatever. Notwithstanding what had been said by the honorable member for Wellington City, the impression on his mind was that the Wellington members did not attend the sittings of the House very regularly. He thought it would be well that the honorarium should remain unaltered for the present session, but he hoped some understanding would be come to that, in future, those members living within two or three miles of the city would not receive the honorarium.

Question put, "That the item be reduced by £2,075;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Sir G. GREY would now move another amendment, in order that it might be shown what the real intention of the House was. There were twelve members of the Assembly who resided in Wellington, and received £100 each as honorarium. He would move, That the total amount be reduced by the sum of £1,200.

Mr. REYNOLDS said he understood that some honorable members were under the impression that, by this vote, they would be fixing the honorarium. But that was not the case. The vote was simply intended to decide whether or not those members of both Houses who resided in the city of Wellington should receive any honorarium at all. There were at present twelve members of the Parliament residing in the city of Wellington, and they would receive honoraria just the same as those who came from distant parts of the colony.

Mr. GIBBS said the Committee seemed to be discussing the principle of whether members should be paid for their services, or whether they should be paid only their expenses. If it were simply a question of payment of expenses, then those members who resided in Wellington should not be paid, because their expenses could not be anything like so heavy as those of the honorable gentlemen who had to leave their homes in the distant parts of the colony. The question of how much members should receive was one which the House had settled, and the amount might as well at once be called payment. Some members said that £100 would pay all their expenses, while others affirmed that double that amount did not cover theirs. He thought that members should receive all their expenses, so that, at any rate, they would be nothing out of pocket. At the same time, if they were to take any more than their expenses, he did not see why the Wellington members should not receive such extra amount as well as the others. He would vote against the amendment of the honorable member for the Thames.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SWANSON asked what was the duty of the Examiner of Standing Orders, whose salary was put down at £50?

Major ATKINSON said that this officer had to see whether the private Bills came within the Standing Orders.

Mr. SWANSON did not think the House wanted anybody to tell them what was or was not a private Bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS would like to know whether the officer in question only received £50 a year.

Major ATKINSON said it was proposed to place £300 on the supplementary estimates for him, and then his salary would be £250.

Mr. SWANSON said he did not object to the person who held the office, but to the office itself. He considered the office a great sham, and the sooner the House got rid of it the better. In short, the office was a great impediment to the conduct of business. He moved, That the item be struck out.

Mr. BURNS would draw the attention of the Government to the importance of getting rid of the office. He was in the House, he believed, when the office was created, and the idea was, by means of the fees arising from the office, to form the nucleus of a library fund. But they had a very good library now, and he thought the office might very well be got rid of. He agreed that it was an impediment to business; and, now that the provinces were abolished, there would be a greater number of Bills than ever brought before the House, and they should not be impeded in their progress through Parliament. All private Bills should be referred to a Select Committee, which could take evidence if necessary, and therefore he did not see the necessity for the office.

Mr. MOORHOUSE did not think this office should be done away with, because it saved a great deal of trouble. The officer's chief duty was to see whether all the regulations had been complied with before private Bills were brought under the consideration of the House.

Major ATKINSON might explain that the Examiner of Standing Orders was appointed by the Speakers of the two Houses.

Mr. WASON asked whether the officer, who only got £50 last year, was to get £250 this year?

Major ATKINSON replied that that was the state of the case.

Mr. W. WOOD would like to know whether the Harbour Board Bills had been examined by this officer before they came into the House? and, if so, why was there so much delay before they were reported on? Was it that he had not examined them, or that, having examined them, he had kept back the information he had with respect to them until so late a period of the session that they could not pass?

Major ATKINSON said the honorable member could not have read the Standing Orders, or he would not have asked such a question. The Harbour Bills had been brought in by honorable members, who were bound themselves to accept the responsibility of the Bills being dealt with as private Bills or otherwise. There were, on the other hand, Standing Orders which provided that the private property of individuals should not be dealt with by the House without the persons affected having an opportunity of being heard in their own interest by the House. A private Bill, as such, had to be introduced by petition, which had to go through the office of this officer. Upon receipt of that petition, he had to see that proper notice was given, and to report whether the Standing Orders had been complied with.

Mr. SHEEHAN said this office had become more necessary now, under the new county system of government, than it had ever been before, for there would now be such a number of Bills of this kind that it would be impossible for the House to deal with them unless they had been previously examined. Whatever arguments might have been used against the existence of the office in past days, those arguments would no longer hold good.

Mr. SWANSON said the Standing Orders provided for the appointment of a joint Select Committee of the two Houses on private Bills; and he apprehended the members of that Committee would know which were private Bills, and which were not, without the assistance of this officer. Mr. Speaker, when he saw the Harbour Board Bills, very soon found out that they were private Bills, and he thought other honorable members could do the same. If the House was going in for economy, this was a very good opportunity for displaying it. This office was established to raise money for a special purpose, and that purpose had been accomplished, and they might now very well do away with the office. His experience of the office was that it was an unmixed nuisance, and that it sometimes led to wrong being done. If it had not been for the existence of the telegraph in the case to which he referred, the Bill would have been thrown out. It is now law.

Mr. BOWEN said the Committee ought to be very careful as to what it did with regard to this department. The Harbour Bills to which the honorable member for Newton referred were of a doubtful character—that is, doubtful as to whether they were public or private, and those were the Bills Mr. Speaker dealt with. But there were other Bills brought in avowedly as private Bills; and if this office was swept away, it would be impossible to introduce such Bills at all in conformity with the Standing Orders. In all Houses of Assembly, machinery similar to ours was provided for the introduction of private Bills, and for the investigation and consideration of the evidence brought forward by the promoters. It was necessary, for the protection of private interests, that Bills interfering with private property should be dealt with in an exceptional manner.

Mr. BURNS thought the Minister of Justice was scarcely stating the case fairly. The fact was that the office was first created, and then the Standing Orders were passed to fit it; whereas the honorable gentleman was trying to show that it was just the reverse. If the honorable member would look back to the proceedings of the House some ten or eleven years ago, he would see that this office was constituted in order that the fees arising from it might go to the library. That being the case, the sooner the office was got rid of the better.

Major ATKINSON said the honorable member was entirely mistaken. The office was first created, and then it was decided that the fees should be devoted to the library. Standing Orders which were founded on those of the Imperial Parliament were adopted for the protection of the inhabitants of New Zealand. They provided a machinery by which, if a private person or corporation wished to bring in a Bill affecting the private property of individuals, they were bound to give proper notice to those individuals. This officer had to see that the proper notice was given, so that the persons affected could appear before the House, and be heard in their own behalf. It might not be the best way to deal with private Bills; but the House was bound to prevent the property of private individuals being affected without their receiving due notice. Under the Standing Orders, this office must be kept up until some other provision was made.

Mr. BOWEN must again point out that this office was absolutely necessary, as business was now carried on. He was given to understand that the process of dealing with private Bills by the Parliament of New Zealand was less complex and expensive than that in force in any other House of Parliament. The fees had also been very much reduced, having been lowered from £70 or £80 to £25.

Mr. GIBBS said it was necessary that this £50 should be voted, if only to pay the clerk of the office. He would, however, like to ask whether the fees collected and charges made would not cover all the expenses of the office. If that were the case it would not be necessary for the House to pass special votes for the office.

Mr. RICHARDSON pointed out that the Standing Orders said that the fees should go to the library.

Mr. BURNS would like to know when those Standing Orders were passed. If it was in 1865, they were simply passed to bolster up this office. He could very well recollect the discussion upon this subject. He might add that a great many Bills were brought into the House which should have passed as public Bills, but which were sent to this office, and, after costing a great deal of money, were declared to be private Bills. The honorable member for Port Chalmers would bear him out in saying that such was the case. The sooner the office was done away with the better, and let all Bills be introduced into the House directly and dealt with on their merits.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the average of private Bills introduced during the last five or six years was only four.

Mr. BURNS said a most expensive Bill was introduced in the year after this office was first established.

Major ATKINSON said the office was not constituted until 1871. Up to that time there was only a clerk in the office: the Chairman of Committees did all the work, and the Standing Orders were much more voluminous than they were at present.

Mr. BURNS said the honorable member for Port Chalmers would bear him out in saying that in 1866 they introduced a Bill, which was referred to this office, and which cost £800 before it was finished with. He was sure the Premier was wrong. There was a Private Bill Office established in 1865, and honorable members who were in this House in that and the following year would remember the very great expense and trouble the then honorable member for Coleridge had in getting a Bill of his passed.

Sir G. GREY wished to remark that, if the Minister for Justice and the Minister for Public Works were correct in stating that only four private Bills had gone through the House during the last four years, that would mean that the public had had to pay £100 for each Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON explained that four Bills was the average per year for the last four years.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that if that were the case, there surely was no necessity for paying £200 or £250 a year for such a small amount of work. There were three Parliamentary Clerks, and surely one of them could perform all the duties of this office. The Government ought to set their faces against such a vote.

Mr. WAKEFIELD thought those honorable gentlemen who opposed the vote had very good grounds for doing so. There was no department which gave so little satisfaction and created so much discontent. He would certainly support the motion for striking out the vote.

Mr. J. C. BROWN said the work for this year had already been done, and, as the amount was only £50, he hoped the Committee would pass the vote without further waste of time.

Mr. PEARCE said he had been a member of the Committee of Selection for a number of years, and in that capacity had been brought into contact with this officer, who threw an amount of zeal into his duties that was very commendable. It was absolutely necessary that some officer should perform those duties, and they could not be better attended to than they were at present.

Mr. SWANSON looked upon the office as a great nuisance. It was not so much the £50 or the bother that he objected to, but severe pressure was absolutely brought to bear upon any one who had charge of a private Bill, to compel him to employ a parliamentary agent, who charged about £100 for his services, and did nothing more than ear-wig and lobby members to induce them to pass the Bill. He looked upon the office as an unmixed nuisance, and a means of extorting money from the public. There were officers in the House who could very well perform these duties, and he would strongly support the motion to strike out the vote.

Question put, "That the item, 'Examiner of Standing Orders, £50,' be struck out;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The CHAIRMAN said he believed it was absolutely necessary, as long as they had private Bills passing through the House, to have such an officer. He would therefore give his vote with the Noes, in order that this officer should be retained.

The motion was consequently negatived.

Mr. WASON moved, That the item "Library, £600," be reduced by £400. He thought this department might fairly be assisted by members themselves. He thought it would be a very fair thing if a subscription were paid by members using the library. He did not see why the country should be called upon to support such an institution, any more than it should be called upon to support Bellamy's. He did not see why something should not be deducted from the honorarium to support this institution.

Sir G. GREY asked the Government whether they would bring down, in the supplementary estimates, an increase of £25 in the salary of the Assistant-Librarian. He was sure the present salary of £146 was inadequate.

Major ATKINSON said the salary was no doubt very small, and the Government would take the matter into consideration.

Mr. WAKEFIELD thought it would be a great pity to strike out any sum put down for the library. He thought that library would be the nucleus of a great national library. In that library they had an institution of which the whole colony ought to feel proud.

Mr. STEVENS asked in what direction the vote of £600 was to be expended? Was it for the purchase of books?

Major ATKINSON said it would be placed at the disposal of the Library Committee.

Mr. ANDREW disagreed with the honorable member for Coleridge. He thought there was a wide difference between voting money for Bellamy's and voting money for the library. The food supplied in Bellamy's became mere waste, while the food to their minds supplied by the library remained for ever. Besides, if matters became so bad as was anticipated, and they had to realize their assets, he thought they could realize something upon the library, while they certainly would not be able to realize anything upon what was supplied at Bellamy's.

Mr. BURNS found that a great many books were missing from the library. He thought that was a fair subject for consideration. Was the library intended solely for the use of members, or had anybody outside the members or officers of the House a right to use the library? There were a great many books missing at present. There was no record of them to be found in the library. Members ought to know who had the right to take books out in addition to members of the Assembly.

Mr. MACFARLANE had seen books from the library in private houses in Wellington, and he wondered how they came there. He hoped the Librarian would pay attention to this matter.

Mr. WASON must object to the vote for the library, because it was in the nature of a perquisite to honorable members; and on that account it was most objectionable. If members were not paid sufficiently, let them increase the honorarium. If the institution partook of the nature of a public library, it ought to be open to the public free.

He could not see why members should enjoy an exclusive privilege of this sort at the expense of the country. Some honorable members appeared to think that a reduction of £400 was too great, and he would be willing to accept a reduction of £300. It would not be an unfair thing to ask honorable members to subscribe something to the library, and in that case they would pay more careful attention to the books than they did now, and would take more interest in the library.

Sir R. DOUGLAS thought honorable members had better advocate a clean sweep. Let them go in for the whole thing, and not for trifles. Let them sit upon chairs or upon nothing at all; and let them conduct their proceedings in the old fashion, when people were summoned to meet together by the sound of a horn.

Mr. SHEEHAN said that, if the proposal to reduce the library vote had come from the democratic revolutionary mob of Otago or Auckland, he would not have been surprised; but why a member from the aristocratic, learned, and polite Province of Canterbury should make such a Jack Cade motion as this, he could not understand. He could only suppose the honorable member was in jest.

Mr. SWANSON drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that some rare and valuable books had been missing from the library for a long time, and the Librarian could not obtain any trace of them. He thought it advisable that members should be allowed to take books home with them, giving security for their return; but under the present rules that could not be done. In the Province of Auckland, members of the Provincial Council used to take books home with them. Too much money was, he thought, spent in buying novels and light reading; and it should be an instruction to the Committee only to spend the money upon books of real use.

Mr. REES would support the proposal to reduce the vote by £300. He thought they did not want to expend so large a sum as £600 in twelve months, unless there were some special additions to the works members desired to get, which might cost a large sum of money. He understood this vote would be supplemented from fees for private Bills. He had no wish to go in for abolishing the library, or to make members pay for it, but he thought there was something in the suggestion the honorable member for Newton made with respect to the class of books which were purchased. It would be desirable to obtain such books as would be of use to honorable members for matters of reference, and in preparing them to discharge their legislative duties.

Mr. WASON would inform the honorable member for Rodney that he was perfectly serious in making the proposal he did. He would refer to the fact that during the recess certain people in Wellington had the right to take out books without paying any subscription whatever, and he did not understand upon what principle of justice that could be done. In all the small libraries in Canterbury, people had to pay something for the privilege of taking out books, if they had not the library to go to.

Sir G. GREY hoped the vote would not be reduced. A national library ought to be established in New Zealand. He quite thought that during the recess people should not be allowed to take books out of the library, but they might be allowed to read them there.

Mr. SHEEHAN was sorry that the honorable member for Coleridge had not mooted the matter in jest, because the reasons given by the honorable member for reducing the vote were most illogical. If the library were abolished it would be found that there would be a difficulty, in keeping a House, for members would not attend for five or six months.

Mr. ROLLESTON believed that very few people indeed took books out of the library during the recess under the new regulations. Permission was given to read the books in the library.

Sir G. GREY thought that £600 was not too much. It was essential that they should go on collecting books. Books which were now common would in centuries to come be great curiosities. A few good books would cost £600. For instance, a copy of the first Shakespeare could not be purchased under £750. It might be said to be only a curiosity, but, after all, the English race would always feel pride on looking at the original of this great author's productions. The spelling would also be of great interest for years to come.

Mr. BURNS explained that he had no objection to any persons in Wellington using the library, but thought the practice of not returning books should if possible be put a stop to. He believed members themselves were in this respect chiefly to blame.

Major ATKINSON said the Government could hardly consent to the vote for Bellamy's being omitted this session, as expenses had been already incurred under it, the Steward having been paid his salary. He himself objected to see the item on the estimates, and it was not the intention of the Government to place any sum on the estimates next year.

Mr. MURRAY said he would withdraw his amendment if he understood the Steward was to be discharged as soon as the session was over.

Major ATKINSON said he could not give that promise, as it was probable the Steward would be kept on as housekeeper, or in some other capacity.

Mr. ROLLESTON was glad this item would not again appear on the estimates, as it was not very creditable. At the same time, he wished to explain that it was a mistake to suppose that the vote went to provide dinners, or otherwise than in furnishing the necessary crockery and plate. He thought the Bellamy's Committee was too large, and that it would be more satisfactory if it were arranged by a Committee of seven, to be divided into three Sub-committees, each having special functions. He thought the establishment should be self-supporting.

Mr. W. WOOD said that, as he had been informed that the vote was to meet expenses already incurred, he would ask leave to withdraw his amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Item as reduced, £30,806 2s., agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 11th October, 1876.

Crown Redress Bill—Rabbit Nuisance Bill—Counties Bill.

CROWN REDRESS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he would endeavour to trespass as briefly as possible on the time of the Council, for the reason that it was to be hoped they were now approaching too late a period of the session to allow of such time for the consideration of an important measure like this as it deserved, and such time as it would require in order to pass it in a state in which it would give effect to the desires of those on whose motion it was introduced. The Council was well aware that a great wrong had been inflicted upon a certain body of Her Majesty's subjects in New Zealand—the Natives of the Middle Island—in matters connected with the acquisition of their lands by the Crown in former years. When he spoke of the acquisition of their lands by the Crown, of course he meant the cession of them to the New Zealand Company. Efforts had been made from time to time, during many sessions, to get this wrong remedied. But at last the Natives, left to their own resources, had employed European draftsmen to prepare a measure by which the claims which they believed themselves to have against the Crown should be capable of being heard before the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal. It was in accordance with instructions received from the Natives interested that "The Crown Redress Act, 1871," which he held in his hand, was drafted by an eminent firm of solicitors in Dunedin. The wrongs to which he referred were simply these: He would only take one class, in order not to protract discussion. He would simply take the question regarding the cession of the Ngaitahu Block, of some 20,000,000 acres, to the Crown. The negotiations for the purchase of that block were commenced by Mr. Kemp, under instructions from the Governor, in 1848. A deed was drawn out by that gentleman and signed by some of the Natives. Mr. Kemp did not obey his instructions, which were to visit the block and arrange with the Natives for their consent, and to see that reserves were laid out for them. He neglected those instructions. He did not set foot upon the block, but had interviews with the Natives at two places situated outside the limits of the block; and at one of those places a deed was signed purporting to convey the whole of those lands to Her Majesty. Now, to this deed the great majority of the Natives concerned were not parties. When the deed was brought to Wellington, it was submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, and declared not to be worth the parchment upon which it was written. Later in that year, the Government, wishing that so important a negotiation should not fall through altogether, despatched another officer to induce the Natives who had not been consulted to come in under the terms of the deed, which had been signed by some of the Natives at the request of Mr. Kemp. Seeing that half of the money payable under the deed had already been distributed to other people, without the Natives whose signatures were required having been consulted, special means had to be adopted to induce them to become parties to the cession, and the officer negotiating the transaction informed the Natives that, after all, the money consideration was by no means the main consideration—that the real compensation for the cession of their territory would be in the erection of schools for the instruction of their children, the appointment of medical officers to attend upon them when sick, and the appointment also of other officers to look after their interests generally, and to see that in their closer relations with the Europeans they were not unduly imposed upon. The officer had to utter these promises before he could persuade the Natives that they would be justified in giving up their lands and signing a deed as to which they had never been consulted. The rest of the proceedings for the purchase were, on that understanding, conducted peaceably enough to a close. The last instalment of the purchase money was paid, and the Crown stepped into possession of the block, which extended on the East Coast from Kaiapoi down to Kaiheku, at the back of the Molyneux, and on the west side of the island from Cape Foulwind down to Milford Haven. From that time to the present, no efficient steps—no steps worthy of the Crown in whose name the promises were made—had been taken to redeem those promises. The consequence was, that a whole generation, or, he might say, a generation and a half, of the people who were entitled to education and the other minor benefits promised, had grown up in ignorance even of our language, and no more capable of looking after their own interests than they were before. Of course it was impossible to assess at any money value fair compensation for a wrong like that. Other promises made to the Natives referred to another purchase—that of the Otaihu Block, of 400,000 acres. That purchase was made by the New Zealand Company, by the waiver of the Crown's right of pre-emption; and, in accordance with the system of purchase which the Crown had insisted upon, the Company adhering to in all its purchases, one-tenth of the surveyed lands was to be appropriated to the Natives. At the request of the agent of the company, the officer employed by the Government abstained from entering this specially in the deed of cession to the company, and, of course, the promises were never fulfilled. For these and for other reasons the Natives desired permission to plead in the Courts of the colony; but in the present state of the law, as they were advised, they had no standing before the Courts. The object of this Bill, therefore, was to give them that position. He had read the Bill carefully, but, being only a layman, he did not profess to be able to judge whether it would or would not give them the status they desired, or put them in a position to plead. On the contrary, he thought that, inasmuch as the 20th clause made, after all, a political body the body which was to decide whether or not they would get any compensation awarded to them, the Bill would not be likely to give the Natives the position they desired, and, consequently, he thought it would be very much better that the subject should be carefully considered by a Select Committee of the Council, and a Bill prepared which would give the Natives what they really desired. It would be an advantage to adopt that course, because he did not think that any Government had of late years held office which would not—or the individual members of which would not—gladly do everything in their power to remedy this wrong. But, at the same time, they must not shut their eyes to this fact, that it would be impossible for a Government which would really recognize the claims of these Natives to hope to carry a measure which would result in giving them by Act of Parliament a fair and reasonable compensation for their wrongs. It was only by the award of a judicial Court that they could hope to get this remedy. No man could face his constituents with a prospect of re-election who would be a party to doing justice in this case. He said that deliberately. He was prepared for severe remarks to be made in consequence of that statement; but, nevertheless, he believed that no Government could hold office for any appreciable period after having endeavoured to press for proper recognition of these claims upon the Legislature of the colony under the circumstances; and as he held that it would be necessary that this subject should be considered by a Select Committee, and as it was now really too late to hope that such a Committee could come to a satisfactory termination of its labours before the end of the session, and understanding also from very good authority that the Government itself was opposed to the matter, he thought it would be merely a waste of time to press the consideration of this Bill on the Council on the present occasion. He would, therefore, be quite willing to take the decision of the Council on the voices as to the second reading of the Bill. He moved that the Bill be read a second time.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN was sure his honorable friend would admit that there had never been on his part, or on the part of the Government of which he was a member, any indisposition to admit the just claims of the Natives to redress, or to take such steps as were in their power at the time to satisfy their reasonable claims. If he thought the object his honorable friend had in view in introducing this Bill could be accomplished, he would certainly not be found opposing its second reading; but he was of opinion that the practical result of the passing of this Bill, and its being brought into operation, would be simply the incurring of considerable expense on the part of the Natives, or on the part of the Crown, for the purpose of ascertaining facts which, as far as he understood, were not disputed. The honorable member had referred to two particular classes of claims—one arising out of the purchase of the Ngaitahu Block, and the other the claim of the Natives to what was known as the New Zealand Company's tenths. His honorable friend was aware of the steps the Government had already taken to satisfy the claims of the Native sellers of the Ngaitahu Block, and he knew, no doubt, that the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court had given it as his opinion that substantially these claims of the Natives with respect to their land had been satisfied by the action of that Court, and that all that remained to be performed on the part of the Government was the recognition of some moral obligations for providing schools, hospitals, and attendance to the sick; which moral obligations it had been the strenuous desire of the Government in late years to fulfil. He admitted, as readily as his honorable friend himself, that the Government in the early days had not done all that it might have done under the circumstances; but after the facts had been brought with sufficient prominence under its notice, steps were taken to afford redress, which ought to have been taken long before. With respect to the New Zealand Company's tenths, there was no doubt of the fact that in the original purchase on account of the New Zealand Company, the promise to reserve these tenths was made; but there was also little doubt that, on account of technicalities which he would not refer to, there was no existing legal right on the part of the Natives to the carrying out of that agreement. That there was a claim, a moral claim, he was not disposed to doubt; but he thought that claim, whatever it was, might be ascertained and satisfied by other means than those which were proposed to be provided by this Bill, the absolute and certain effect of which would, as he had said, be to involve either the Native claimants themselves or the Crown in a very considerable amount of legal expense, for the purpose of ascertaining facts which were easily ascertainable, and were not denied upon either side. He thought that there was another way very much better than that; and he had no doubt, if his honorable friend would apply himself to the settlement of that question with the same perseverance and desire to obtain justice for his friends in the South Island which had characterized his conduct for years past, his efforts at no very distant time would be crowned with success. At present, he trusted his honorable friend would not proceed with the second reading of the Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL did not rise to speak on the subject of the Bill generally; but as the honorable mover clearly implied that the Government had failed in the performance of its engagements so far as regarded providing educational establishments for the Natives in the Middle Island, he thought it was only fair that attention should be called to a report which was on the table, and which, amidst the mass of parliamentary papers, might have escaped the attention of honorable members, which showed how that subject really stood. If the Council would bear with him, he would read a portion of the report. It was by the Rev. Mr. Stack, Inspector of Schools, who reported to the Government on the subject generally of the education of the Natives of the Middle Island. Honorable gentlemen who knew the writer would, he was sure, admit that he was not at all a man who would write with any bias against the Natives: he had laboured amongst the Maoris nearly the whole of his life, and was one of their best friends. He said,—

"I have the honor to enclose the report of my inspection of the Native schools in Nelson and Canterbury for the year ending June, 1876. The number of Native and half-caste children in the South Island, under fifteen years, may be roughly set down at 900; allowing for those who are too young to attend school, there must be about 500 children who ought to be under instruction. The return attached to my report shows that 209 were present at the several inspections held by me. Adding the occasional attendants, and those who may be receiving instruction privately, the number being educated may be set down at 250, or half the number who ought to be at school. If this result does not seem satisfactory, it must be borne in mind that the education of the Native children is being carried on against the determined opposition of a large portion of the adult population.

"Every facility has been given to the Native parents to educate their children. Not only have schools been provided for them by the Government, but they have been relieved of the cost of maintaining them. All the Maoris require to do is to send their children, but this a great many refuse to do; and if it were not for the interest taken in the matter by the local Government officers, and such influential Natives as Kerei Taiaroa, Irai Tihau, and Te Rore, the number of Native children receiving instruction would be exceedingly small. It is hardly possible for those who have not experienced the senseless opposition offered by many of the Natives to the attempts made to educate their children to understand how people usually so intelligent can refuse to avail themselves of those institutions which can alone restore their race to a position of influence in the State. The absence of schools supplies the Maoris with a good cry that they are neglected; when they are provided with them, they either do not send their children, or, if they do, they seem at pains to hinder their advancement in learning. Only in a few solitary instances do the parents render hearty assistance to the teacher, and encourage him in his arduous work. It is hopeless to expect any improvement as long as the Maoris believe that by letting their children grow up in ignorance they are strengthening their claims to compensation for their lands. The only effectual remedy would be to make education compulsory."

After going on to enforce that view of the case, he states,—

"Under all the circumstances, I think it is a matter for congratulation that the attendance at the schools is larger by 64 this year than last; and although this increase is chiefly owing to the opening of three new schools, it is satisfactory as giving evidence that, instead of losing, we have, on the whole, gained ground."

That would, he thought, show that, whatever might have been the case in times past, the Government at the present time was not neglecting its duty in the Middle Island in making provision for the education of the Natives. He might say, however, in regard to the schools in Canterbury, with respect to which further particulars were contained in that report, that the Kaiapoi school had for many years been very liberally assisted by the Government; and he knew, from communication with Mr. Stack, that the difficulty was to get the Natives to send their children to school and to keep them there. The school authorities at last resorted to a system of boarding the children, for so long as they were merely day-scholars it was impossible to keep them. He knew that in this, as in other matters, so far as any rate as the province was concerned in which he resided, every fair claim which had been made on behalf of the Natives had always been recognized by the Provincial Government. He was present at the sitting of the Native Land Court in Christchurch to which the Hon. Mr. Mantell had referred, and the Judge said there that nothing could be more fair and liberal than the recognition by the Provincial Government of Canterbury of any claim he thought reasonable, and every provision he thought should be made for the Natives. At that time there were considerable reserves made for the benefit of the Natives. They chose them themselves, but unfortunately made a bad selection. Still, the Judge thought that all that was fair and right was done by the Provincial Government at the time. Of course, he could not speak on the subject so far as it affected other parts of the Middle Island; but he had thought it only fair to the Provincial Government of Canterbury to state so much.

The Hon. Captain FRASER must take exception to what his honorable friend had said about the Maoris objecting to send their children to school. In Otago all the adult Native population were educated; they could read and write and cipher very well. They were taught in former years, as the Hon. Mr. Mantell knew, by the Wesleyans. But the Otago Government entirely neglected them, and their young men and young women were uneducated. It was only, he thought, within the last two years that a school had been erected at Waikouaiti. One of the chiefs told him the other day that if, when he was a boy, he had had the chance of getting to school he would now be a clever lawyer; and he (Captain Fraser) trusted they would soon see that very man in Parliament, and there could not be a better representative.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said the Colonial Secretary began by speaking of the great expense which, in the event of this Bill becoming law, would be entailed on one side or the other. With regard to that, he would only mention in passing that it was an aspect of the question which the Natives interested had not failed to recognize, and he was credibly informed that they had already collected a fund of several thousand pounds, which was lying in a bank and quite ready to be invested in law—honorable gentlemen of the legal profession would listen to this—the moment the Natives had a status in the Courts of the colony in regard to their claim. The Natives, like other more intelligent savages, were rather fond of law, and they too could appreciate it when the judgment was on their side. The Colonial Secretary had referred to Judge Fenton's opinion on this case. He thought it was a great pity the Government had thought proper to print that opinion, inasmuch as it was not a proper outcome of the circumstances under which it was called for. Last session it was decided by the other branch of the Legislature that the Governor should appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the claims of the Natives and make a report, which was not to be binding on Parliament, but to be taken into consideration this session. The Government made vain efforts to carry out the intention of the Legislature, but it was impossible to get a member of the Commission nominated by the Natives against whom the Government had not an insuperable objection; and at last the Government suggested that Judge Fenton should be nominated on behalf of the Government. That being the case, the Natives came to him (Mr. Mantell) for advice, and he advised them that, rather than endeavour to get anybody to act who would not be a match for the Government Commissioner, they should join in the nomination of Judge Fenton, and leave it entirely to him. The only reason they did not do so, he believed, was that that gentleman absolutely refused to leave the sunny North and go to the bleak South to take evidence. Therefore it was that Judge Fenton's opinion was an ex parte opinion; and he did not seem to him (Mr. Mantell) to have had recourse to all the sources of information. He seemed to have taken the evidence of Mr. Kemp, but not that of Captain Symonds, who would be a very important witness as regarded the negotiations for the Otago Block. With all submission to Judge Fenton, for whom no one had a higher respect than he had, he would say that the reading of that document gave him the impression of its having been written in one of those mental phases that men are subject to when a question is forced on their consideration which they would rather leave alone. It showed the smallest possible amount of temper from the beginning to the end. He was not aware of the physical state of that gentleman's health; but, if he was subject to gout, he (Mr. Mantell) would think the fit was imminent if he was not actually suffering from it. He did not think it was worthy of that gentleman. As regarded the Native Land Court in Canterbury, he did not think that the Hon. Mr. Hall had said more than was justly due. Nothing could be fairer or more liberal than the action of the Canterbury Government in the matter. There was a little matter of mistaken identity on that occasion, when the Judge of the Native Land Court mistook a gentleman whom they all highly respected for His Excellency the Governor. That, however, had since been cured by legislation—the very legislation which remedied the defect which refers to the special claims which it was hereby intended to give the Natives an opportunity of bringing before the Supreme Court—"The Ngaitahu Lands Validation Act, 1888." The Hon. Mr. Hall had not over-described the conduct of the Canterbury Government on that occasion. It was just that conduct which one might expect from gentlemen. The report of the Rev. Mr. Stack, to which the honorable gentleman referred, respecting the aversion of the parents of Native children to send them to school, simply strengthened his (Mr. Mantell's) position, in saying that they had done a very great wrong to the Natives, in not having undertaken this task of education earlier. Those very Natives, whom they ought to have educated, were now objecting to their own children going to school. So far from there being any aversion to education, there was a craving for education on the part of the Natives at the time to which he referred. He remembered a case in which he met some Natives from Moeraki, who had actually invested 5s. in the purchase of a book. That was quite a new experience to the Natives. Their literature was derived gratuitously from the missionaries. Actually, on this occasion, they had invested 5s. in a book, which on examination he found was bound in calf-skin, and was a work on arithmetic. He asked them what was the use of the book to them, as they could not read it. They replied, "We cannot read the book; but you know, from your own experience, that when you come to our place we always ask you to set sums for us; and we do the same to everybody who comes by. Sometimes people come by who say they cannot set sums; so we have bought this book, from which these people can set us sums." He did not mention that as an exceptional case. They were all most anxious to learn, and in that they had been disappointed. There was no doubt that those promises weighed materially with them to come into a bargain which they were not bound to make; and they were induced to give way solely on account of those promises. The Hon. Mr. Hall had referred to a sitting of the Native Land Court. He (Mr. Mantell) remembered a sitting of the Native Land Court, which he thought was held in Canterbury or in Dunedin. There was a large assembly of Natives there, and those promises were referred to again. Judge Fenton said that was a question beyond his province to deal with; but he might be allowed to ask the witness—he (Mr. Mantell) being in the witness-box at the time—a question with regard to it. The question was, "Did those promises of education, and so forth, act as a strong inducement to the Natives to agree to the cession of their land?" This question, like all the other questions and answers in the Native Land Court, was translated into Maori. He (Mr. Mantell) answered "Yes;" and there was a general murmur of assent throughout the whole place. It was not an outspoken murmur, but every man and woman present gave a sort of low grunt of assent to what he said. Judge Fenton said it was very striking, and that he would make a special report to the Government on it, although he could not take any cognizance of it himself. It must be borne in mind that while, of course, they had had very large sums named as possible compensation for those wrongs done to the Natives, these sums were mere trifles in comparison with the profits they realized on the lands the Natives ceded. For the whole of the lands they ceded—the lands which belonged to their ancestors, who had fought for them for generation after generation—they did not receive so much as the lessee or licensee of a run under their legislation would receive as compensation if his license or lease were terminated by his run being declared into Hundreds, or anything of that sort. Even if compensation were conceded to the Natives in millions, the Europeans had received far more millions than ever the Natives would get. However, that was not the question. What the Natives wanted was an opportunity of being heard before the Courts. That was all. They had appealed to political bodies session after session, and without success. They had tried to establish a footing before the Courts, but they had always found themselves met by some difficulty or another. Among others they met with this great difficulty: that the Crown, which had kindly, through its officers, stepped in and accepted onerous trusts on behalf of the Natives, discovered that it was not bound by any trust which was not most deliberately and specifically assured; and therefore it was that this kind trustee, who had stepped in to protect the Natives from spoliation, had become the actual possessor of their properties, and was not in a position to give their claims consideration. He would accept the negating of the second reading of this Bill as a matter of course at this period of the session; but he thought that, unless the Government found time during the recess to devote attention to this subject, and to devise some better course for settling this outstanding question—and settled it must be sooner or later—if he were present next session, he would have the honor of bringing the matter before the Council at the earliest possible period. It was very true that they had stepped into the possession of these lands, and that the Natives had been shut out from their lands; and the whole of the profit was on the side of the Europeans, and the whole of the loss on the side of the Natives. But it so happened that he took a view of the profit and loss different from other gentlemen who took that view of the case. He most fervently believed that, so long as they were in this position of doing a chronic injustice towards those people, so long would the Natives have an outstanding debt against them, which they would have to repay in some shape or another, to the great loss of the country.

Bill read a second time.

RABBIT NUISANCE BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he wished to make a few remarks drawing attention to facts which had already been brought under the consideration of the Council by a most exhaustive report on the subject, as regarded Southland, from a Commission over which the Hon. the Speaker presided, and by a considerable amount of evidence taken by a Committee of the Council appointed to inquire into the rabbit nuisance. First of all, he would say that the rabbits appeared to have become extremely numerous within the last two or three years. In Southland they had become very numerous during the last two or three years. He had heard of the rabbits having been planted on islands on the coast of Otago, he believed, as early as the first days of the settlement; but they never seemed to increase very largely until within the last few years. The report of the Commission pointed out that in the extreme South, and also in the northern part of the Province of Otago, until within the last two or three years the rabbits, although numerous, were by no means a serious nuisance; but, during the last two years they seemed to have multiplied at a rate, he might almost say, without parallel. So far as he had been able to give an individual opinion on the subject, he fancied they had been multiplying in more secluded localities without the public being aware of the extent to which they were multiplying; and within the last few years they seemed to have migrated from the coastline between Invercargill and Riverton in hundreds of thousands. The consequence had been that their presence had been felt in the interior, on the grassy plains, as a scourge. Without exaggeration, their progress in many localities had really been desolating, as they had gone on to the land in such numbers as to materially lessen the depasturing capabilities of a large extent of country. These remarks would apply specially to Southland. He gathered from the evidence that had been taken that in the Province of Marlborough, and in some parts of the Province of Wellington, they were also very numerous. They were found to be a nuisance, but by no means to such an extent as they had within the last two years been found to be in some parts of Southland. In the report of the Commissioners some explanation was given of the sudden character of the infestation, for it was there pointed out that the fecundity of rabbits was something almost incredible. At page 5 of the report of the Commission, quoting from Chambers's "Information for the People," the Commissioners said,—

"The rabbit litters seven times in the year, and generally produces eight young at a time. At the age of five months the animal begins to breed, and, taking an estimate perfectly within bounds, it is supposed that a pair of wild rabbits, which breed no oftener than seven times in a year, would multiply in the course of four years to the amazing amount of a million and a quarter, if the young were preserved."

The Commissioners went on to say,—

"If common report be correct, the climate and soil of New Zealand are peculiarly favourable to the domestic habits of rabbits, and they are said to breed at least nine months in each year, having at least six young at each kindle, and the females will breed at the age of three months. If this be true, then the problem of extermination becomes very difficult of solution."

In some localities they multiplied much more quickly than in others, for in certain places they had been kept in check to some extent by boys shooting them, dogs hunting them, and cats killing them; but in localities where they found shelter—such as in sand, gravel, and in the neighbourhood of scrub, and more especially in rocky ground—it was more difficult to keep them under. The Commissioners went on to point out what the Council would expect to be the natural result of such an astonishing increase. The pastoral interest had most seriously suffered from this inroad. Both agricultural and pastoral interests had suffered, but the pastoral interest had suffered to a very serious extent. With reference to the export of wool, at page 4 the Commissioners said,—

“In Southland proper, there were from 700 to 800 bales less this year than the last, though the present was a favourable season. In one case, where 250 bales were shipped last year, there were only 150 this season; and, unless active remedial measures be adopted, it would be hard to say what the export would be next year. In another case, where there were 900 bales last year, there were only 750 this year. And not only do the rabbit ravages affect the quantity, but they injure also the quality of the wool; for as the young grass makes its appearance in the spring it is eagerly devoured by rabbits, and the ewes, with lambs following them, find themselves, when needing the most nourishment, reduced to comparative starvation.”

Then they went on to point out that the increase was very seriously affected. They gave a variety of instances, and pointed out that the increase on a large extent of country had decreased from 15 to 20 per cent. Throughout the whole of the Western District last year, which was an exceptionally good year, the increase was 20 per cent. instead of 65 to 70 per cent., which had previously been obtained. They further referred to the decrease in the carrying capacity of the country. They pointed out that the carrying capacity had been reduced in different places from 13½ per cent. to over 32 per cent. Here the question arose: how was this evil to be lessened? It was clear enough that it would bring ruin to all whose land had been invaded. He might here say that no doubt one original mistake which had been perpetrated was that they had not introduced the natural enemies of rabbits to counterbalance their astonishing increase. He had no doubt that if ten or twelve years ago, when some few settlers, having more foresight than others, began to take the alarm, they had begun to introduce in certain localities weasels, martens, and other natural enemies of the rabbit, they would now have less reason to complain of the extent to which the nuisance had grown. He remembered a debate which occurred some ten years ago in the Provincial Council of Southland, when there appeared to be a general confidence expressed in the power of cats to keep the rabbits under; but they had deplorably failed in doing so. He could see a collateral advantage in introducing some particular kinds of vermin that preyed on rabbits. For instance, the marten had a valuable fur, which might in itself become a valuable article of export; for under another name, in the Arctic regions, it was known as sable, and that was one of the furs which commanded the highest price in the market. But even granting that the introduction of natural enemies would keep in check the increase of rabbits, now that they had got such headway a long time would elapse before any number of natural enemies that could be introduced within a reasonable time could make any appreciable difference in the number, and so other means must be taken. In the South, some had been extremely active and energetic in endeavouring to destroy the rabbits by ordinary means—by using ferrets, dogs, guns, and nets. But something more than that was required. While some residents in the South had exerted themselves, others had not done so. They had been careless, and had allowed their lands to become nurseries for rabbits. Just as in the case of the thistles in this island, it was perfectly useless for any two or three or half-dozen persons in any locality to endeavour to destroy them, so it would be now to attempt to destroy rabbits, when the weed in the one case and the rabbits in the other were allowed to multiply in neighbouring lands. Now, in the South, and no doubt in other parts, there were many large Crown reserves, nominally in the management of the Government, but which were in reality left to take care of themselves; and upon these lands the rabbits multiplied a thousand-fold. Then there were large estates in the South which were used for pastoral purposes only, and the management of which had not been sufficiently careful to repress the rabbits or to make any praiseworthy attempt to keep the numbers down. Now that some residents in the South had been doing their duty, and doing their neighbours' duty at the same time, was evident from the facts which had come out. Mr. Cowan, who had been one of the leading sufferers, stated that in four months he had killed 28,000 rabbits. He said,—

“We did not take any particular notice of them at first. It is within the last eighteen months that the nuisance has assumed immense proportions, and that measures have been taken to suppress them. Since measures have been taken to suppress them, they have not increased so rapidly, and there is hope that, if these measures are continued, we may be able to keep them under. But I attach this condition, that the exertions to be made must not be confined to particular individuals; all people must act in the same direction. If my neighbours do not keep the rabbits down as well as myself, I could not keep the rabbits down; and I have no hope of the abatement of the nuisance unless united action be taken.”

And that was what was now proposed. After the matter had been carefully considered by a Committee of the other House, it was agreed to take the legislation of some of the Australian colonies as a model for the legislation which should be introduced here; and, after examining the Australian Acts, it was agreed to take the Tasmanian Act as the model. The Bill now under consideration differed in some particulars from the Tasmanian Act. One of the most important of those particulars was the fact that, whereas in the Tasmanian Act the rate was levied on the annual value, it was here proposed to be levied on the acreage. It was proposed in the Bill as it stood that, if ten landowners or occupiers petitioned the Governor to proclaim any district a rabbit district under the Act, any portion of the colony might be proclaimed a rabbit district accordingly. When the Bill was in Committee, he would move, as an amendment, that it should be a majority of the landowners who should have that power, instead of the number proposed in the Bill. The Bill provided that a uniform rate should be levied; but he did not consider that that would be fair to the lessees of Crown lands, and he would suggest that they should pay only one-half the amount that was paid by freeholders. Clause 9 of the Bill authorized the trustees to destroy rabbits where the owners, after due notice, neglected or failed to destroy them; and the subsequent clause authorized the trustees to send an officer to search for and destroy rabbits on such lands. The object of the Bill was to secure simultaneous action over those districts where the nuisance was felt to be so great that the majority of the landowners felt it was necessary to take steps to put an end to it. Before he sat down, he might remark that he had lately heard of, and had been curious enough to examine into, a rather ingenious plan for trapping rabbits alive. The plan was very ingenious; but, as it had not yet been practically tried, it was impossible for him to say whether it would succeed or not. If, however, it should succeed, he could see that the introduction of those traps into the colony would decrease the rabbit nuisance to a great extent. In districts where there were railways, this plan would be found to be very useful, because rabbits caught in this way could be utilized much more effectually than at present. In Victoria, where rabbits were a very serious nuisance some years ago, they had been destroyed to such an extent that, as he was informed, a very profitable trade was now being carried on in curing the meat and the skins of the animals. If the landowners in the South Island of New Zealand could kill 30,000 or 40,000 rabbits a year, he did not see why some establishment should not be opened for curing the meat, on the understanding, of course, that such establishment could only exist in those districts which railways passed through or near. He thought he had sufficiently explained all the objects of the Bill; and would only add that the Bill was a permissive one, to enable those who suffered from the rabbit nuisance to endeavour to put an end to it. He hoped that the Bill would be passed, so as to give such persons an opportunity of endeavouring to eradicate the pest.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said the question was of a very important character. The increase of rabbits in the colony was calculated to become, as it had already become in some instances, a serious nuisance; and he would feel great pleasure in supporting the Bill, if he believed it was calculated to enable farmers and others to overcome the nuisance. But he felt, with reference to this Bill very much as Lord Palmerston did in regard to the wine that was sent to him by an amateur manufacturer as a certain cure for gout. After tasting the wine, Lord Palmerston said that on the whole he preferred the gout. In the same way, he (Mr. Waterhouse) would rather have the rabbits than this Bill. Under the Bill it would be competent for ten persons—landowners or occupiers—in opposition to the wishes of their neighbours, to apply to the Governor to proclaim a rabbit district. A rabbit district having been proclaimed, trustees would then be appointed, who would receive a certain rate from the owners and occupiers of land within the district. The trustees were then authorized to give notice to persons having rabbits on their property to destroy those rabbits; and if after ten days such notice were not complied with, the trustees might forthwith authorize persons to enter upon the property for the purpose of destroying the animals, and the owner of the property would be called upon to pay the expenses of those persons. He remembered a few years ago taking a ride in the neighbourhood of Auckland with a gentleman who was at that time a member of the Council, and who was well known to most honorable members. While riding along, he caught sight of a very fine crop of thistles, and remarked to his friend that thistles evidently flourished there. Soon afterwards, his friend pointed to another piece of ground where there were no thistles. He (Mr. Waterhouse) asked his friend why there were thistles in one place and not in another, and the reply was, "That land belongs to me. Every year I have a notice served upon me by my neighbours to destroy my thistles, and I do so at considerable expense; but they take no steps to destroy the thistles upon their own land, and consequently their thistle-seed comes over to me, and I have to bear all the expense." And under this Bill a few people would be able to compel the owners and occupiers of land throughout a large district to submit to the encroachment of a number of persons upon their properties, and then the persons whose property was encroached upon would have to pay the expenses of the persons who entered on their property. There would be no end to the expense which landowners might be put to by this. Therefore, as he had already said, on the whole he preferred the rabbits to the Bill. He did not think the Bill had been sufficiently considered; but he would not oppose its second reading, and he hoped the Council would refer the matter to a Select Committee, which would be able to consider it more fully and deliberately than the Council could do, with the view of making it more perfect and removing the defects he had pointed out in it. He was unfortunate enough to have been troubled with rabbits, but he had taken steps to abate the nuisance on his runs, and he hoped to be able to keep them under. He had himself put ferrets on his runs, and he believed they were being used in other parts of the colony with the view of putting a stop to the ravages of the rabbits. He would advise the Government to take steps to introduce more ferrets into the country. An impression seemed to prevail that ferrets would not thrive in a wild state; but he knew that in the neighbourhood of Kaikoura ferrets were increasing rapidly in a wild state. It was on the introduction of ferrets rather than on the mode provided in the Bill that he relied as a means of relief from the rabbits, which were eating the farmers out of house and home.

The Hon. Captain FRASER thought, with his honorable friend Mr. Waterhouse, that this Bill was not all that could be desired. He himself and other gentlemen had waited on the Government, who had promised to bring down a Bill which would have suited admirably, but they had not done so. This was not at all a good Bill. They had machinery already. They did not want new and expensive machinery, as their cattle and scab inspectors were quite sufficient to see the Act carried out. He had intimated to the Committee that within a few months a few rabbits on his run had increased to five thousand, and that unless some steps were taken in regard to them they would become a very serious nuisance. The Government were quite as much interested in this matter as anybody else, because the rabbits would make the lands of the Crown perfectly useless. He had no doubt that this spring the sheep would suffer from the immense increase of rabbits, and certain runholders were taking steps to prevent the spread of these animals. He would vote for the Bill, in the hope that a better measure would be brought down.

* The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said he had pointed out the evils that would arise from the increase of rabbits in a previous session, and then honorable members thought that what he had said was not correct, but the experience of the last twelve months had shown that he had not exaggerated. On one of his runs they had killed at the rate of 4,000 per week. They had given the small rabbits to the dogs, but they still had 60,000 good skins ready to send to the market. That would show the magnitude of the evil in his district. The cost of killing these rabbits he found to be £1,500 per annum. The extent of the run was 70,000 acres, and three years ago there were 45,000 sheep on it. Now there were only about 29,000, and they were not in as good condition as when the larger number were there, he believed that the wool from them would not be of as good quality as that which came from the larger quantity. The fact was that the stock had deteriorated in value from every point of view. And then as regarded the value of the land. Land infested with rabbits was lessened in value by £1 per acre. In estimating the loss, he had to put down £1,500 as the expense of killing the rabbits and £3,500 as the decrease in value of the wool, and lambs; altogether he considered that the loss on that one run was £5,000 per annum. He believed that £15,000 per annum would not cover the loss on some of the larger stations. It was a well-known fact that the farmers had objected to any Bill being passed which would provide for the killing of rabbits some time ago, but a few months had altogether altered their tone, and now instead of desiring a permissive Bill they wanted a compulsory one. He had taken the trouble to send telegrams to the principal farmers in Southland a few days ago, but he had only received one answer. The sender of that was one of the largest farmers in the South Island, and his reply was as follows: "Self and neighbours for a compulsory Bill re rabbits." He did not think that the tax of 3d. per acre would be sufficient to provide bonuses, because the evil was so great that a deal of money would have to be spent on it for at least a year or two ere any good result would be found to have followed. He believed that if a compulsory Bill were introduced, and all the settlers were to unite in the effort to put down the nuisance, they would in two or three years exterminate the greater number. But as long as one settler waited for the other to begin there would be no abatement of the nuisance. Were the Bill made permissive it would be of very little use. The very persons who had said that they could cope with the nuisance—the farmers—were the very persons who propagated the evil at first. It was no doubt easier in densely populated districts to cope with the difficulty, but that was no reason why there should not be united action. He felt certain that on the farms in the most densely populated districts of Southland there were as many rabbits as on any runs in the interior of the country, in proportion to their acreage. He held that the Crown, having possession of the larger portion of the land, was called upon to contribute in some measure to the abatement of the rabbit nuisance. Who was likely to suffer most in consequence? Why, the Crown itself, for the simple reason that if the wool-producing value of the runs began to fall back as it would do, it would be found impossible to get anybody to lease the lands at any price if the rabbits continued to increase as they had done. He himself would not take a run as a gift that was overrun with rabbits. He held that, whatever rate might be levied on Crown lands, one-half of it should be paid by the Crown itself, or at any rate it should be deducted from the assessment. It would be good policy for the Government to do this, because they would thereby obtain the assistance of all the settlers in the district. With regard to what fell from his honorable friend Mr. Mebzies, he would only say that he did not think the honorable gentleman was quite correct in his statement. The honorable gentleman had said that in Victoria the evil had been overtaken; but how was it possible that the evil could be overtaken if they were continually curing rabbits there? It was clear that, to keep a curing establishment of any size going, 4,000 or 5,000 rabbits per day would be required; and if that number could be procured daily, it could not be said that the evil had been overtaken. He had recently read an article in a newspaper to the effect that, if the rabbits continued to increase in South Australia as they were increasing, they would soon overrun the whole colony. Only a few days ago he had been talking with a gentleman who had visited Master-ton, in this province, and that gentleman had told him that he had been surprised at seeing so many rabbits there. He (Mr. Holmes) would say that the existence of so many rabbits in that neighbourhood would lessen the value of the land by 20s. per acre at least. It was quite clear that some legislation on the subject was necessary, and although they might not do much with respect to it this session, still, if they addressed themselves to it with a will, he had no doubt whatever that a Bill would be passed that would be of some service. He would urge upon the Council the necessity of reading the Bill a second time.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN was sure that no one who had read the report which had been made on this subject, or the evidence which had been adduced in other places regarding it, could for a moment hesitate to admit that there was an immediate necessity for legislation in connection with it. He would vote for the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped that if it were referred to a Select Committee it would be so framed as to insure its passing during the present session. He was of opinion that everybody interested should be compelled to take his share in the work of exterminating the rabbits. Whether or not the Crown lands should bear their portion of the cost of exterminating that plague, was a question which might very properly be discussed at some future time. At present it would probably not be admitted that the Crown could be called on to pay; but in the future, after every effort had been made, after it had been seen what was possible to be done under local exertions, he thought the District Boards would have a fair claim upon the colony for some kind of subsidy or assistance, if it could be shown that they had really rendered to the Crown lands the amount of service that honorable gentlemen seemed to think possible.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL was sorry to hear from the honorable gentleman who had just sat down that the Crown would not contribute in the slightest degree towards exterminating this nuisance, until the settlers had done their utmost to eradicate it.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN explained that he said the Crown lands should not be taxed.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said that, as far as the pastoral tenants in Otago and Southland were concerned, it was absurd to expect that they should alone contribute to the extermination of this pest without any assistance whatever from the Crown, which held the freehold of the land. These pastoral leases had only a short time to run, and it was a matter of calculation with the lessees whether it was desirable to spend annually a large sum of money in the destruction of rabbits, or whether they should not feed what sheep they could on those lands and in the end deliver up their runs to the Crown as huge rabbit warrens. The Hon. the Speaker had had an opportunity, which he (Mr. Campbell) had not had during the last two years, of going through the southern portion of the Province of Otago. He had, however, seen the Hon. the Speaker's report, and he had also the evidence of gentlemen who were managing for him in the South, and the opinion was unanimous that, unless something was immediately done by those who were interested in the matter, the rabbits would become such a nuisance and such a scourge as to bring absolute ruin upon a great number of those engaged in pastoral pursuits, and to render the value of the land absolutely nil. This subject had been so fully entered into by the Hon. Mr. Holmes that he would not delay the Council by going more fully into it. But he might say that, unless some hope was held out to the pastoral tenants that, with the united aid of all classes, some endeavour would be made to exterminate this nuisance, they would lose all hope, and abandon their runs at the expiry of the leases. He would suggest to the Hon. Mr. Menzies that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. That would be the best way of getting the matter maturely considered, and it would expedite the passage of the measure, because the Select Committee could bring up a report, and the measure could be passed through the Council without any delay.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said the same suggestion—to refer the Bill to a Select Committee—had been made by other honorable gentlemen without their having stated the nature of the alterations they thought should be proposed. Perhaps the honorable gentleman would suggest the alterations he thought ought to be made.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said an alteration he would like to see was this: that there should be a differential rate, and a distinction made between leases of a long tenure and those of a short tenure. It was not fair that a person with the lease of a run for only a year should be called upon to pay the same as a person who had a long lease. Those were matters for the consideration of a Committee, and, after they had been fairly considered there, the Bill would be reported to the Committee and passed through more rapidly than if all these questions were discussed in the Council. He simply threw out the suggestion to the honorable gentleman; if he was not prepared to adopt it, he (Mr. Campbell) would propose certain amendments in Committee of the Council.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL had not intended to trouble the Council on this question, but that a suggestion appeared to be gaining favour which he ventured to think was not a practicable one. It had been pointed out, with considerable truth, that it was unfair to impose solely upon the tenants of the Crown the cost of rescuing the Crown lands from a process of impoverishment which would affect the Crown eventually more than its tenants, and therefore it was suggested that the Crown ought to make an allowance to tenants towards the cost of eradicating this pest. There was a great deal of force in that argument, but he would suggest to honorable members that, if any alteration of that kind was proposed by the Council in this Bill, it would be a violation of the privileges of the other branch of the Legislature, for it would be nothing more or less than an Appropriation Bill—it would be appropriating the revenue of the Crown, which it was quite clear they had not the power to do. He would suggest to honorable members whether they should not take some other steps for the purpose of giving effect to their view, which he thought was reasonable.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—It would only be lessening the assessment.

*The Hon. Mr. HALL said the honorable gentleman was far too acute to suppose for a moment that that was not really paying money. He spoke on the spur of the moment, and of course under correction, but he had not the slightest doubt that with such an alteration the Bill would be an Appropriation Bill to all intents and purposes, and, as such, one which could not originate in the Council. He hoped that honorable gentlemen who had spoken in favour of referring this Bill to a Committee would not attempt to introduce any amendment of that kind, for if it were introduced he was afraid they would lose the Bill. He would have very great pleasure in supporting the Bill. He thought that, of the many measures that had come before them this session, there were very few of greater practical importance to the colony than this. There had been very much more lengthy and more high-sounding measures, but very few of greater practical importance to the colony in the future; and he earnestly hoped that honorable members, whatever their opinions might be as to the particular way in which this subject should be dealt with, would not press those objections—in some of which he entirely agreed—to such an extent as to render it improbable that a Bill on this subject would become law this session. To use the words of the Hon. Mr. Holmes, they must have some Bill. They knew there had been, and were told there still was a very great feeling of opposition amongst a certain class of settlers in the Province of Otago towards more extended legislation than this Bill proposed. They knew that more comprehensive and more energetic legislation would probably encounter very serious obstacles in another place, and therefore he trusted honorable members would not refuse to take a partial remedy if they could not get a complete one. It had been stated that a permissive Bill was very objectionable—that what was required was a compulsory measure. He was inclined to agree with that; but if it were even probable that a compulsory measure would be rejected, he asked honorable members in their own interests—it would not affect him at present, although it might eventually—to take a permissive Bill; and if experience showed, as they believed it would, that a permissive Bill was insufficient, then they would have an undeniable argument on a future occasion for asking for a compulsory Bill. He trusted, therefore, that if this Bill was referred to a Select Committee, honorable gentlemen would bear those considerations in mind—that the particular measures which they thought were required, and which he was inclined to agree with them were required, were measures which could not be carried at the present moment; and that they would be content with what they could get rather than, by striving after something more comprehensive and more energetic, allow Parliament to break up this year without passing some measure—a result which he believed would be a very great calamity.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said this Bill appeared to be a very imperfect one, and to have been rather carelessly drawn. The 3rd clause was an exceedingly vague and very unfair one. He presumed that in Committee they would make it much more explicit. The 9th clause also seemed to be clumsily worded; and there was an absence in the Bill of any provision in case of injury done by dogs, or other means employed by the trustees in the destruction of rabbits. It would very often happen that a number of lazy fellows, who did nothing else but kill rabbits, would be employed by the trustees, and do great harm to the sheep. There was no provision for that. Those, amongst other reasons, led him to hope that in Committee the Bill would be carefully considered by honorable members, and that it would be very much improved if it were to pass this session. The Hon. Mr. Campbell's argument, that tenants with so short a tenure as the Crown tenants had should not pay the entire cost of destroying rabbits, had no doubt a semblance of fairness; but he would caution that honorable gentleman that it was an argument which cut two ways. It would be an argument very much against the leasing of land in this country, and would probably be used very much to break up large holdings, and possibly to increase the sales on deferred payments. It was a very dangerous argument to use, and, considering the moderate provision proposed in the Bill—only 1d. an acre—it was a very unwise one to raise. The analogy drawn in reference to lands held in England, on which the landlord was either expected to make compensation for injury done by game or to assist in its destruction, was not altogether a fair one. But he wished to point out that there must have been most extraordinary mismanagement in the attempts to destroy the rabbits in this country. The extermination of rabbits in New Zealand was totally different from that carried out in England. He had seen rabbits in some parts of England, and also notably on the coast of Scotland, quite as thick as they could be in this country, and by the employment of a few professional rabbit-killers in one season the rabbits were so destroyed that it was no longer profitable to the persons who followed the occupation of killing them. Of course rabbits could be sold in England, while they could not here; but it was evident that the wholesale destruction carried on in England would amount to annihilation in the course of two years. The persons employed there, however, understood their work better than the people here, who appeared to be able to do little or nothing in the way of keeping down rabbits. The Government or the trustees could easily get a few proper and suitable gamekeepers or rat-catchers from England, and, if they imported some of those persons, he believed the rabbit nuisance would soon be very much abated. It was owing to the unskilful measures adopted that rabbits had got so much ahead here. The calculation that the honorable gentleman was good enough to say was being made by some gentleman whose lease was soon coming to an end, seemed very much like cutting off one's nose to spite the face. The gentleman would allow his sheep to dwindle down year by year, rather than go to the expense of keeping down the rabbits. As the rate was only to be a halfpenny an acre, no one would surely allow the rabbits to become so great a nuisance as to prevent sheep-growing. The doctrine the honorable gentleman had indicated was a very dangerous one, and it would be much better if the settlers would turn their minds to the adoption of means which would be more effectual in the destruction of rabbits. He had the advantage the other day of speaking to a gentleman whose property was situated in the very middle of this rabbit nuisance, and who told him that he was able to keep the rabbits pretty well down in his own district, and also that there were a large number of landowners around who were contemplating doing exactly what the Hon. Mr. Campbell had stated. Therefore it would appear that, though that was a very short-sighted policy, it was nevertheless contemplated, and honorable gentlemen would vote for the measure with that before their eyes. But there were two sides to the question, and he thought a certain amount of fairness ought to be shown. He did not think, for instance, that any ten landowners had a right to impose any great expense of this kind upon their neighbours, but that it should rest with a certain proportion of the inhabitants of any district declared. If that were done, no practical injustice could arise, or such as ought to prevent them from passing a Bill imposing a tax upon the Crown tenants of pastoral runs. He wished to point out, however, that there was another class of Government land affected which was not leased at all. There were many pieces of land in the North Island—and, as an instance, land between Wellington and the Forty-Mile Bush, belonging to the Government—which were not leased at all, and which would become regular rabbit-warrens. Would not the Government, in common with other proprietors, pay for the destruction of rabbits? Then, again, were the Maoris to be exempt, as they were in too many matters in the North Island already? In the district in which he lived, practically they could not raise a dog tax, because the settlers would not pay, inasmuch as all the curs in the province belonged to Maoris, and the only dogs that belonged to the settlers were for useful purposes. Were Maoris to be exempt from the tax for the destruction of rabbits? If so, this Bill might go into the fire so far as regarded the North Island, for the Maoris were by far the largest landowners in the North, and certainly they would not take the slightest pains to destroy rabbits; on the contrary, they would regard them as a source of food at hand, and would not even object to allow them to wander on to the land of their European neighbours. There were, therefore, two classes of land which ought to be considered. Another reason why these two classes of land should not be exempt was, that it was of no use whatever to have five people out of ten or out of twelve thinning their pigs, rabbits, or any kind of vermin down, as long as a single place was left open as a refuge for them. He had seen that exemplified in the case of pigs. Wild animals were very cunning. As soon as they found where they could retire in safety, they would go out to feed; and on the first alarm they would run from all points to where they knew they would be safe. It was the same with rabbits. The Bill was intended to grapple with a very serious difficulty, and one which he believed it was their duty to face this year. It was one of those measures which if they did not attend to this session, it would be too late next year or the session after to avoid very serious loss to the country, and a very serious diminution in the export of our staple commodity. For that reason he would support the second reading of this Bill, in the hope that it would be considerably amended and altered in Committee.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES, in reply, said that, in moving the second reading of the Bill, he had remarked that there were two clauses which he proposed to amend in Committee, and he thought all the honorable members who made observations about the Bill were not present then. In the 3rd clause, which had been modelled after the Tasmanian Act—although the South Australian Act resembled it a good deal—he proposed to strike out the word “ten” in the second line, and introduce the words “a majority of the landowners;” so that a few individuals could not, as appeared to have been apprehended by some honorable members, be able to bring the Act into operation over a large district in which they possessed a very small amount of property. Then, again, in the 7th clause, he proposed to introduce a provision which would render the rate on leased lands only a halfpenny. Those, he thought, were the main alterations and improvements that could be made in the Bill. He was glad that there was such a general concurrence in the object of the Bill. While he was entirely in the hands of the Council as to referring the Bill to a Select Committee, it appeared to him they would only be losing time if they did so. Unless there were some alterations of more importance than those he had declared his willingness to propose, he thought they would only be losing a day, or perhaps longer, by referring the Bill to a Select Committee; and then the Bill might not be improved. He did not mean to say it could not be made more perfect; but what the Council had to consider at that stage of the session was not altogether what they would desire most to see enacted, but such provisions as they thought were likely to come into effect this session; for, as more than one honorable member said, it was of the utmost importance to do something—to make a beginning; and if it were found that whatever provision they might make this session was not sufficient to arrest the evil, they could amend it next session. With reference to the amendment which the Hon. Mr. Campbell referred to, he must remind the Council that the Bill, as originally introduced, did contain a provision in that direction, although not going to the full length of the suggestion which had been made. The 7th clause now terminated with the words “one halfpenny per acre;” but the following words were contained in the clause as originally introduced, and were struck out in another place: "In the case of lands held on lease or license from the Crown, a receipt for one-half of the rate so levied shall be accepted as part payment of any rents due on account of such holdings to the Crown." It seemed to him that if they were to elaborate the mode of assessing Crown lands held under pastoral leases so as to press equally upon them, bearing in mind the duration of the tenure, they would add to the risks which the Bill might have to run before it finally passed. He thought that by adding some other words which he would propose in Committee, with the object he had stated, the end would be gained, and in a manner which would be unobjectionable.

COUNTIES BILL.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—Sir, when the Bill for the Abolition of the Provinces was under discussion in the Council last year, I was asked what was proposed to be substituted for the institutions about to be swept away; and my reply was that it was not necessary that anything should be substituted for them, but that they would be succeeded for purposes of local administration by the Road Boards, Municipalities, and other local bodies which had grown up in considerable numbers within the last eight years, and the growth of which was, in my opinion, checked by the existence of the provincial form of government. I said that whether, in future, the government would continue to be by Road Boards, or whether they would take the shape of shires or any other form, would depend very much upon the people themselves and upon their representatives. In the Bill which was then before the House of Representatives, the Local Government Bill, the Government had indicated, generally, their views upon that point. The view entertained by the Government at that time was that the Road Boards should be regarded as the unit of local government, and that they should be allowed to develop themselves into higher forms called shires, or any other name which might be given to these institutions, by the aggregation of the Road Boards, or otherwise, as the necessities of the people might require. In the Hansard report of the proceedings in another place on the 10th August last, when the second reading of the Counties Bill was proposed by the late Premier, there are some interesting tables with regard to local taxation generally, and with regard to the Road Boards and local institutions of this colony. I shall not trouble the Council by quoting those tables, except to a very small extent. They show that last year there were 314 road districts in the colony. There is a table which shows that the total receipts of those road districts for that year was £420,404 16s. 3d., including a sum of £147,226 12s. 6d. which was in the hands of the Boards at the commencement of that particular year. As may be supposed, the Province of Canterbury monopolizes the largest of the figures of this return. In that province the Road Board receipts for that year appeared to amount to £256,643 2s., including a sum of £114,861 11s. 7d. which was in the hands of the Boards at the commencement of the year, and a contribution of £94,203 9s. 1d. from the Provincial Treasury. The figures of the other provinces were exceedingly small beside those of that province. Notwithstanding the number of the local Boards, it was found that they occupied really only a very small area of the colony, and it was felt that it was necessary to establish some system of local government which should be or might be made operative throughout the whole of the colony. To meet the need that, where no Road Boards exist, there should be no want of local administrative power for public purposes, is one of the purposes of this Counties Bill, of which I am now about to propose the second reading. By this Bill the whole colony is proposed to be divided into counties. The boundaries of the counties are given in the schedule of the Bill. A great deal of time has been devoted to the settlement of this question, and it is due to the concurrence of the representatives of the several districts of the colony, and to the aid which they have afforded to the Government, that the scheme has been put into the complete form in which it now is, although I will not say there may not be room for still further amendments. The Bill provides for the election of the County Council by the electors of the several ridings of the county. It provides, after the first Council has been elected and holds office for a shorter period than is proposed to be fixed for subsequent Councils, that the period of the duration of the Council shall be for three years. It also provides for the election of the Chairman of the County. Upon the mode of the election of the Chairman of the Council, I am prepared to find a difference of opinion. Whether or not the Chairman should be elected by the whole body of the electors or ratepayers of the county, or whether he should be elected by the Council itself, is a question which I expect to hear discussed before the measure is finally disposed of. There are certain counties, six in number, the boundaries of which have been defined, which are exempted from the present from the operation of this Act. Three of the counties which are thus exempted are entirely Native districts, and in the others the number of inhabitants is so small that it is unnecessary to attempt to bring the Act into operation in them. By section 11 of the Bill, it is declared that the Council may, at any time within three months after its first meeting, determine that practically, except for one particular purpose, the Act shall not continue in operation in that county. The Bill to that extent is permissive. Clause 71 prescribes what are the duties and functions of the Council of any county in case it is determined that those portions of the Act referred to in the schedule are not to be enforced in that county. The revenues of the county are set out in the Eighth Part of the Bill as follow:—

- "(1.) Rates made and levied as provided by this Act or any Act incorporated therewith;
- "(2.) Tolls levied on county roads, bridges, and ferries, and all rents of such tolls;

- "(3.) Moneys received by the Council under any grant or appropriation by or under or in pursuance of any Act of the General Assembly of New Zealand ;
- "(4.) All moneys payable to the county under the provisions of "The Financial Arrangements Act, 1876 ;"
- "(5.) All rents and profits from property vested in the body corporate ;
- "(6.) All fees, fines, and penalties recovered under the provisions of this Act, or any by-law made thereunder, or of the Acts incorporated therewith, for any offences committed within the county ;
- "(7.) Moneys received by way of loan, as provided in this Act ;
- "(8.) Moneys received by way of subscription or voluntary donation ; and
- "(9.) All other moneys which may become the property of the body corporate of the county."

I shall refer presently to subsection 4, which relates to moneys payable to the county, under the provisions of "The Financial Arrangements Act, 1876." In that Act it is proposed that for a period of five years the payment shall be guaranteed to the local governing bodies of a sum equal to £3 for £1 on the general rates collected by the county or Road Board, to the limit of 1s. in the pound of rateable value of the property. In the Financial Arrangements Bill it is provided that the Land Fund shall be charged, amongst other things, with subsidies to the County Councils, Road Boards, and River Boards in the district. Section 8 of that Act is to the following effect :—

"In respect to the subsidies mentioned in subsection four of section four, there shall be issued and paid during each financial year, in respect of all sums received by way of general rates during the year ending on the 31st day of March previous thereto,—

- "(1.) To each River Board, a sum equal to the sum so received by such Board ;
- "(2.) To each County Council, a sum equal to one-half of the sum so received by such Council, or equal to one-half of the total of the sums so received by all the Road Boards within the county, whichever of such two sums is the greater ;
- "(3.) To each Road Board, a sum ascertained by dividing a sum equal to that hereby payable to each county, amongst all the Road Boards included therein, in the proportion of the general rates so received by each :

but for the purpose of this section no sum shall be deemed to be received by any Council or Board in excess of the sum receivable on a rate of one shilling in the pound of the annual value of rateable property."

Further on, it is provided,—

"The balance of the Land Fund of each district, after payment of the charges mentioned in section four, shall be disposed of as follows :—

- "(1.) If any money is raised as provided by section eleven, and applied to make up any deficiency in the Land Fund, or if any money is advanced from the Consolidated

Fund for such purpose as provided by section fifteen, then the balance of the Land Fund at any time accruing hereafter shall be applied to repay all sums so raised or advanced.

- "(2.) Subject to any such repayments, the balance of land fund mentioned in section four shall be divided amongst the counties in the district as follows :—

"Three-fifths in the proportion of the areas of the several counties in the district ; two-fifths in the proportion of the general rates received as above provided by such several counties and their included road districts."

Section 21 of that Bill provides,—

"All revenues arising in any district, anything in 'The Public Revenues Act, 1867,' or any other Act notwithstanding, under 'The Gold Fields Act, 1866,' or any Act for the time being in force relating to the mining for gold, shall, except as hereinafter provided, be paid into the Public Account to a separate account for such district ; and the Colonial Treasurer shall issue and pay such moneys as herein provided, that is to say,—

- "(1.) All rents or other moneys payable to the Native owners of the land from which revenue has accrued,—to such Native owners ;
- "(2.) The balance,—to the county in which such revenue has accrued ; or if it has accrued in two or more counties, then to such counties in such proportion as the Governor from time to time directs."

Section 23 of that Bill enacts that all gold duties shall be payable to the counties also. There is a further important provision in section 32 of that Bill with reference to those districts in which it has been determined that the Counties Act shall not be brought into force. Provision is made in that section that the portion of the Land Fund which under ordinary circumstances would be the revenue of the county shall be distributed amongst the Road Boards and outlying districts by the County Council itself. Provision is made that, in case of the failure of the Council to discharge the duty imposed upon it, the Governor may step in to superintend the distribution of the money and the carrying out of the required works. So much for the revenue of the county. I shall not weary honorable members by going through the Bill, the main portion of which is machinery. The functions of the Council are defined in Part X. Powers of borrowing, as is usual on those occasions, are also bestowed. The borrowing powers are of two kinds—one a general power, which is limited to twice the value of the rates in the year immediately preceding ; and the other a special power, which is hedged around with such provisions as I think will relieve the minds of honorable gentlemen as to the possibility of its being very much abused. It requires that the borrowing, whenever it is to be done, shall be done with the consent of the ratepayers, and that a poll shall be taken and formal proceedings be instituted before any special loan can be raised. Honorable gentlemen will see that considerable care has been bestowed to secure the adaptability of this machinery to the existing circumstances, or to any circumstances which may possibly arise in the future. Power is given to the Governor in Council to constitute new counties; and power is given to unite two or more counties into one, and to alter the boundaries. Power is also given to the County Council itself to alter the ridings of the county, and to provide for the merger of Road Boards into the county itself. There are a great many other provisions containing powers which are necessarily conferred upon bodies of this kind, and to which I need not further refer. In clause 212, power is given to the Governor to remedy any defects that may be found to exist in the working of this machinery—a very necessary power when it is considered that the whole Bill is new, and that its administration will, in the first instance, be necessarily confided to hands not perhaps quite experienced in such matters. I move that the Bill be now read a second time.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—This Bill, in my opinion, is one of the most careful and most excellent measures of its kind that we have had to consider for a long time. It is not possible that perfection can be reached by any person, however ingenious; and what we may think is perfection to-day, a little experience may prove to be not the most efficient and best-contrived system that could have been devised. There must be so much of experiment in any of those Bills that I was glad to hear the Colonial Treasurer say that if the Act did not work well, alterations might hereafter be made. I was also glad to hear the honorable gentleman say that in Committee he thought it probable the Bill might be amended. I perceive that the amendments made in this Bill will rather be based on principle than on mere details. As far as I can see, there are not many details to take exception to. My own idea of the principle on which we ought to proceed with counties would not be quite so bold as the course the Government has taken. I would prefer to have a system of aggregating Road Boards into clusters, so that they might send delegates at certain periods of the year to form what might be called a County Council electing its own chairman merely for the proper carrying on of its deliberations, and constituting themselves entirely into a distributing body to distribute and apportion the funds of the entire county. By so aggregating the Road Boards, a certain harmony might be secured, and the great danger which I apprehend overhangs us in this Bill, of indiscriminate borrowing, and of erecting large political powers in the country, would have been postponed, at least, if not avoided. I would like to have seen ridings as far as possible made to coincide with Road Boards, and I would have liked to have seen the Road Board boundaries in no instance allowed to overlap the boundaries either of ridings or counties. I am sorry to find that in some of the counties in the schedules it is unfortunately the case that parts of a Road Board district are in two or more counties. That cannot be a desirable state of things, and must lead to a good deal of confusion hereafter. I should like to see clause 6, Part II., which gives the power of merging Road Boards into the county, entirely expunged, because I think our legislation should take a precisely contrary direction to that. We should only by that means have some counties with a short leg—with one riding belonging to the county, and eight other ridings in the neighbourhood of the county. We should thus have something like the same difficulty we always anticipated would happen to the country when certain of the provinces would break down, and would have to be taken over by the General Government. That difficulty was so great that no Government had courage enough to face it, and for a number of years several provinces, which were really not able to carry on, were subsidized and kept just alive rather than they should be merged. I hope our legislation will take the direction of making the Road Boards and ridings coincide, and the County Council simply a meeting of the chairmen of the various Road Boards for purposes of mutual interest. I think it will be found to be a very serious difficulty if one riding or Road Board is in a different category from the rest; and I think, as the Road Boards have been an acknowledged success throughout the colony, there ought to be no loophole given by which, in consequence of a quarrel among themselves at a particular epoch, the inhabitants of a road district might destroy the form of local administration which has been found so beneficial. I think it would be wonderful if those who think with me upon the nature of the constitution of Councils should not be opposed to the election of the Chairman of the Council by the whole of the ratepayers of the county. I think that will not only lead to a conflict of authority, but will delay the period when a more natural, more economical, and more simple form of government shall come about—when the Chairman of the county shall be simply the president of a meeting of associated chairmen of Road Boards. I wish also to say that I see another great difficulty in the election of the County Chairman by the whole of the ratepayers. In the province in which I have lived ever since I have been in this country, as simple, economical, and efficient a form of local self-government has been adopted as could possibly be suggested. In that province the Superintendent is elected by the Council, and he consequently is not the master of the Council, as he would be if he were elected by a plebiscitum as is proposed in this Bill at present. He is the servant of the Provincial Council. I think that is the position he ought to occupy; and there can be no doubt that harmony between the Chairman and the Council will be insured if that system is in force. That harmony does not always exist under the other systems, as we have seen in the Parliaments of other days. The counties now proposed to be established are like what the provinces have been in times past, and we shall see the same difficulties arise as we have seen in times past. If we are to have the Chairmen of counties elected by the whole body of ratepayers—by manhood suffrage, in fact—why should we not have the same system of voting in regard to the raising of loans? The fact is that we are not to be allowed to vote by our qualifications as electors in regard to the matter which touches us most nearly—namely, the raising of money by loan. In the election of the County Council, a plurality of votes is allowed in proportion to the amount of the property which the electors hold. I should have thought that, if there was one single occasion on which a person should vote in respect of his property, and use a plural vote, it would be in just that particular case of the raising of loans. Yet in that case, and in the election of County Chairmen, there is to be no plurality of votes at all. I hope that the proposed mode of electing the Chairmen will not be agreed to by the Council; but I do trust that the Council will go a little further, and insert in the Bill some clause allowing the owners of property a plurality of votes in proportion to the property they hold. I think that the Chairman ought, if he is a paid officer, to be disqualified from holding a seat in Parliament. My reason for this is that in times past great difficulties have arisen in regard to the Superintendents of provinces and other paid officers in Parliament; and I look on this as a direct inducement for people to make a profession of politics for the sake of the pay that is attached to it. Once in Parliament, such people know that their maintenance in Parliament depends on how much they can screw out of the Government. Part IX. of the Bill refers to the ordinary loans, such as those which we struck out when the Municipal Corporations Bill was before us. I should be disposed to strike that provision for borrowing out of the Bill altogether, unless the plurality of votes is allowed, in which case I think no great harm could be done. I should, however, like to see a clause introduced to provide for a sinking fund of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on all loans. I have been asked by the Superintendent of the province in which I live to try to restore the boundaries of the province. By some accident, the Provincial Engineer gave the wrong boundaries, but this had escaped notice until the boundaries were printed in the schedule to this Bill. Honorable members will see that it is not only reasonable to desire that the proper boundaries should be set forth, but that it is desirable also. I will vote for the second reading of the Bill, and hope that in Committee the Government will propose amendments in the direction I have indicated.

* The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—Sir, one of the main objects of this Bill appears to be to create a machinery for grinding out fresh taxes from the body politic. I expect that this will be the only permanent endowment that the public at large will receive from the abolition of the provincial system of government. The public at large were led to acquiesce in the change of the form of government from the belief that they were to receive permanent and substantial endowments; but those permanent and substantial endowments have been gradually decreasing. They were last year £1, and now they are reduced to one-half the promised amount. "Men may come and men may go," but this machinery will "go on for ever." Our substantial endowments may go, but this taxing machine will remain for ever, and landowners will be in the position of the milch cow which has two owners, each of whom tries to get the last drop out of her. This Bill is no doubt the result of the determination of Parliament last session to abolish Provincialism. I cannot but express my regret that the administrative machinery is not of a more simple character. I believe the whole ends to be obtained would have been obtained by the establishment of a simple machinery, instead of the one now proposed—something, in fact, like what is known in some parts of the Australian colonies as the "Main Road Board system." Had that been done, had such Main Road Board in each province been elected by the various road districts, and intrusted with the superintendence over and the maintenance of the main lines of road, all the machinery actually necessitated by the abolition of the provinces would have been provided. My honorable friend Dr. Pollen has stated that this Bill is of a permissive character; but I will point out that, though it is permissive in name, it is not so in reality. It is optional for the County Boards under this Bill to avail themselves of the administrative clauses of the Bill, but there is no provision for the discharge of the duties that must devolve upon somebody if they do not come under the Act. The main lines of road are intrusted to the County Boards; but if the County Boards decline to bring themselves under the provisions of this Act, there will in point of fact be nobody to take charge of the main roads. The result will be that the Boards will—whether they like it or not—be forced to come under the operation of the Bill. It is all very well to say that the Bill is of a permissive character, but I think that in operation it will be found to be of an entirely opposite nature. I am certain that the County Boards will not be in existence many months before they will find it absolutely necessary to bring themselves under this Act. The Hon. Colonel Whitmore has referred to various parts of the Bill which must engage our serious attention in Committee; and I hope that the same principle will be adopted in this Bill which we have adopted in the Municipal Corporations Bill, and that it will be provided that whatever borrowing is to take place under this Bill will have to take place with the consent of the ratepayers; and I also trust that when such consent is obtained, and when the poll is taken, it will be recognized that persons pecuniarily concerned should have voting power proportionate to the responsibilities that will attach to their properties consequent on the liabilities being incurred by the counties. I notice a considerable deviation in this Bill from that which we were told last year would be brought down. I gather from the context of the Bill that it was originally designed that the boundaries of the counties should, where Road Boards existed, be coterminous with the boundaries of the Road Boards; but I wish to draw attention to the fact that that is not the case in many instances. In the Province of Wellington there are only eight Road Boards; and it is now proposed that there shall be in this province six counties, and I think it will be found that, consequent on the reduction in the number, the boundaries of the Road Boards in some cases overlap the boundaries of the counties. This is the case with the two Counties of Wairarapa East and Wairarapa West. In the Wairarapa district there are three Road Boards, and these are now divided into two counties, and each county comprises one-half of the road districts. Difficulties will consequently arise, owing to the fact that the principle originally intended to be carried out has been departed from. I call the attention of the Hon. Dr. Pollen to this matter now, in order that steps may be taken to remedy it in Committee. I shall approach the Bill with an anxious desire to improve it, where it is capable of improvement; and I shall certainly not oppose its second reading.

* The Hon. Captain FRASER.—I was not here last year when certain revolutionary measures were introduced, and I have not had an opportunity of expressing my opinion about them. I will do so now, and very shortly. In all climes, Sir, and in all ages, when a revolution has been brought about, it has been either by a successful military leader or by the surging up of the mass against long oppression and in defence of sacred rights. But in this quiet colony of ours, what took place? A revolution was initiated not by pressure from without, not by pressure from within, not after long and statesmanlike deliberation, but on the spur of the moment, when smarting under the stinging sarcasms of a political opponent, the Premier of this colony issued his fiat, "Provincial institutions are abolished in the North Island." It is very easy to initiate a revolution; it is very easy to set a stone in motion downhill; but, Sir, when once the hand leaves the stone all controlling and guiding power is lost. When Sir Julius Vogel returned to this country, he found that the revolutionary stone had made a bound, and that after a great struggle the Abolition of Provinces Act was carried by a compromise. At the commencement of this session, no doubt it was thought that the revolutionary stone would roll on very quietly. But apparently the Constitutionalists had made a way, and almost on the first day of the session the revolutionary stone went with a plunge into the Piako Swamp. Then we saw for nights and days and weeks a fierce struggle between the Revolutionists and the Constitutionalists, the one wishing to take the stone out of the mire, the other to bury it for ever there. But, Sir, Providence, like an honorable friend of mine, generally votes on the side of the majority, and Providence willed that the stone should roll outward and onward. As soon as the slime of the Piako Swamp was cleared from the stone, the Constitutionalists saw with joy that there was a rent in it, and they fiercely attacked it with sledge-hammer blows to break it asunder. They would have succeeded, and put an end to the revolution, but the Shepherd Kings of Canterbury intervened their wool bales, and the revolutionary stone rolled on, and it continues to roll. I hope it will soon be arrested by the magic wand of justice and power wielded by our good Queen. I have passed over the greater part of this planet, and I have seen tricks of jugglery in all parts of the world, but I must say I never yet saw such an extraordinary trick of jugglery as that which has been perpetrated by the present Government—that of making one-half of the Constitution swallow up the other half. This ill-digested Bill which I hold in my hand is the excrementized production of that operation, and this Council is called upon to deodorize it, and make it sweet, so that it should be spread broadcast over the colony to fertilize it, and bring into existence next session forty or fifty Chairmen of Councils, who will all, as children of the horse-leech, come up here as members of this Parliament, making it utterly impossible to carry on constitutional or any other form of government. Having said that much, I do not intend to add much more on the subject at present, but may have an opportunity by-and-by. This ill-digested Bill is full of that epidemic which has done so much harm in this country during the last seven years—I mean the borrowing power, Municipal Corporations, Harbour Boards, County Councils, all having borrowing powers; and I trust this Council will put its foot down strongly upon the borrowing power. About twelve years ago an Imperial Act was passed, giving permission to trustees to invest trust money in Indian railway securities. Last year when I was at Home those securities began to get a little shaky. There were signs of a disturbance in India; and the financial papers took the question up, and they said that, the Imperial Government having given permission to invest moneys in such a manner, they were morally, and might be considered legally, liable. Now, if we are going to give permission to all these bodies to borrow money, the Government will become liable, or our credit will be dragged through the mire. There are several points in regard to the Bill which I intend to call the attention of the Government to when we are in Committee. A very curious circumstance has happened in regard to one of the counties in which I take a great interest, and with which I have for many years been associated. The name of that county has been changed. I do not know why it has been changed, or how it has been changed, or after whom it is called. I trust it is not called after any of that flight of harpies who accompanied the honest digger from Australia—those harpies who have been so well described by the poet of Mantua. I never look upon one of that obese class without thinking that he has fattened on the blood of the miners. If that is the case, there will be a rising up of every man in that county, who will consider it a personal insult offered to himself. The neighbouring county is called after one of the largest lakes in the colony—the Wakatipu; and why not call this county after another large lake, and maintain the Maori names as long as possible? Why not call it the Hawea? and let the pure waters of the Hawea wash out the present ignoble name attached to the county.

* The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—Sir, I have not had an opportunity of even reading this Bill through, and therefore I cannot discuss it as I otherwise might be inclined to do. But in glancing over it, I noticed certain peculiarities in the Bill upon which I wish to make a few observations. The first matter has already been referred to—the borrowing. Borrowing for ordinary purposes, to the extent of two years' income, I do not object to, because it does not involve the county in any very serious obligation. But borrowing for special purposes I do object to, because it is without limit, and because it virtually involves taxation without proper representation. In some of the counties that cover a large area, a majority of the population are miners. They are not landowners, and they will virtually have the taxation of the landowners in their own hands, because they are in a numerical majority. Now it is altogether against what we consider fair and just that the parties who are to pay the taxes should be overridden, and have no voice in fixing the incidence of taxation. For example, in some districts that I am acquainted with there will be three miners to one landowner, and the majority will have the power to initiate borrowing to any extent; while those who have to pay the taxes will only be able to stand by and observe what is done—they will be powerless in the matter. I think that is an anomaly that should not be permitted to remain in the Bill. Then again there is the old drawback that I have so frequently raised my voice against—namely, borrowing money at a high rate of interest, on the plea that the Colonial Government is not liable for it. What is this money borrowed for, but for purposes which a Government such as that of New Zealand, taking upon itself the affairs of the whole colony, is bound to carry out? And if money is borrowed for such purposes, is it to be supposed that the colony is not liable for it? For example, the making of main roads throughout the colony is a work similar in character to making railways; and if it is the duty of the Government to do the one, it is equally its duty to do the other. And the repayment of money borrowed for such a purpose may be fairly expected from the Colonial Government. Any caveat against the liability of the Colonial Government would, I believe, not be entertained should the question ever arise in a Court of law. Besides, the loss to the colony in borrowing money at 7 per cent., when it could be got at a lower rate by the Colonial Government, is surely a waste. All the colonies in good credit, such as Queensland, New South Wales, the Dominion of Canada, get their money at an average of 93 for 4 per cent. debentures; while this colony, not in such good credit, has only to pay 5 per cent. for the debentures at par. There is a clear loss, over borrowing by the Colonial Government, of 2 per cent., and that, on a large sum of money, involves a considerable waste to the colony; because whatever is a waste to a portion of the colony, or to the people of the colony, is a waste to the colony itself. I have protested against such a course repeatedly in other sessions, and I again draw attention to it, and protest against wasting the borrowing power of the colony, and losing a clear 2 per cent. on all the money required for these purposes. We talk about a paternal Government. Is it the act of a paternal Government to allow the people to be placed in a false position such as this? There is another subject closely connected with this. I have recently been at Home, and I have been frequently spoken to with regard to the difficulty of finding out the actual liabilities of New Zealand. Every person connected with the Stock Exchange, or with financial matters, can tell you that New Zealand has a certain amount of debentures—say seventeen and a half millions—floating in London. But they say truly they can find no record whatever of the outside indebtedness of New Zealand; because scarcely a week passes in which there are not applications for the floating of small loans for harbours, docks, and other purposes, by local bodies. That is unsatisfactory, because, on the London market, the calculation is that the amount of borrowing in the aggregate is not greater than we can really afford to pay. Another objection I have to the Bill is that the counties are too large. I have before me a map of the amended counties, and I observe that some of the counties are 120 miles long. Wallace, for instance, extends from Bligh Sound to the Bluff. At the extreme southern point there is a certain class of people; in the centre there is a different class; and in the interior there are pastoral tenants and landowners. How is it possible to work a county 120 miles long by about thirty or forty miles wide from any one point, or to get persons to represent the different ridings in that county, and to meet at any given point to transact business? I consider there is a fatal objection to the Bill in that respect, and an alteration will have to be made in Committee. At any rate it is imperative that facilities should be given for dividing these large counties into smaller and workable ones. The administrative difficulty otherwise will be found to be almost insuperable. This county to which I have referred contains more than a million acres. This would be perpetuating and intensifying the system of centralizing we have just been getting rid of—the provincial system. I believe that, if these large counties are created as they appear on the map, nearly every shilling of the money derived from the interior of the country will be spent near the coast or in the settled districts, and the parties contributing largely to the revenues of the counties will be deprived of any participation in the outlay of the money. There is another county side by side with that of Wallace, and covering almost as great an area. In every case there are natural barriers that would indicate where the divisions should take place. I have also another objection to the manner in which the counties have been laid off,—namely, that, instead of taking the watershed, as has been done in every case, the rivers should have been taken; because the river is the natural boundary and separates the interests of the different localities. Generally speaking, the effect of a river running through a particular locality is to determine the character of the land and the pursuits of the people on each side of it. Reference has been made to the ridings. I think Road Boards, as they are already in existence, would have been better. The amalgamation of a certain number of Road Boards forming a county would, I believe, be a better arrangement than the present. The only paid member of the County Council is to be the Chairman; but in order to prevent any log-rolling, either with regard to the appointment or the emoluments, it would be wise, I think, if we were to fix the salary, and that it should not exceed a certain sum. In the marginal notes to the Bill, a member of Parliament is prohibited from becoming Chairman. That, however, is not incorporated in the body of the Bill. I think it should be, because, generally speaking, the most available men are members of Parliament; but there is this drawback: that in the future the very shortest time they may be expected to be away from the districts in which they reside will be four months, and I think it would be much better if they were excluded from any participation in carrying out this Act. There are plenty of men in each of the districts quite qualified to take the position of Chairman, and I think it would be wise to reintroduce that part of the clause providing that members of Parliament should not be Chairmen of County Councils. We expected that the whole gist of the measure would be to introduce cheap local self-government—that the people should govern themselves in an inexpensive manner; we should not permit large salaries to be given to the Chairmen, to begin a system that we have discontinued by the abolition of the provinces. With these remarks I shall support the second reading of the Bill; but I should like to see it amended somewhat in the direction that I have indicated.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—As there appears to be a considerable feeling of unanimity on the part of the Council in favour of the second reading of this Bill, it is not my intention to offer any remarks at length with reference to it. As has been truly said, it is the natural sequence to the policy of abolition that was brought before the country, and affirmed by such a large majority of the whole colony; and I think the Government have reason to be congratulated upon having submitted to this Council a Bill drawn so carefully, and providing so fully for the benefits of local self-government—the object which we have all had in view for such a length of time. It appears to me that the Bill now before us provides to the very fullest extent that local control and that local administration of affairs which ought to be conducted by local Governments without their being hampered with such unnecessary powers of legislation as made them so obnoxious in former days. In common with some honorable gentlemen who have spoken on this Bill, I should like, if it were possible to attain it, to have seen a system of local government not hampered with the machinery which undoubtedly surrounds the local government in the present measure. And it has been a matter of very frequent and careful thought with me as to whether such simpler system could not be adopted; but the more I have reflected upon the matter, the more I have found that it is a perfect impossibility to obtain complete simplicity of government, and at the same time surround it with all those necessary checks which are so essential to good government. For that reason I have come to the conclusion that at all events, as far as my own mind goes, I shall not be able to suggest any improved form by which the machinery of government can be simplified. It has been suggested—and it is a suggestion that occurred to my own mind also—whether the same result could not have been attained by placing the power of election in the hands of the Road Boards, and from these bodies forming a central body such as the County Council, that would take the administration of main roads and matters of general interest, which, we know perfectly well from our own experience, cannot be efficiently managed by the simple Road Boards. In considering that question, I felt that to adopt such a system as that would be to make the scheme almost unworkable. I felt that each representative from each particular Road Board would come in a concentrated form with his own particular ideas for his own particular place, and that thereby the general interest would suffer very materially, more especially as the numbers that would constitute the County Councils would be so small that log-rolling to a considerable extent would prevail, and no satisfactory result would follow. I have had some experience in connection with the conferences of Chairmen of Road Boards, and my experience has been that the result of their meeting has been unsatisfactory in the extreme. Each wanted, in the first place, that his own particular road district should be specially benefited; and then, jumping suddenly from that position, they assumed to themselves powers which the General Assembly itself even would not assume. That has been my own experience, and I think it is by comparing the results of experience in different localities that we shall be able to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem. So far as my own mind is concerned, I felt myself obliged to discard the idea that representatives chosen by the Road Boards would give us a satisfactory administrative body to control the general expenditure upon works within any particular district or county. There is one feature which I think is of special advantage in connection with the particulars of this Bill, and that is as to the mode of election of County Chairman. Having been connected with the only county that was in existence in the colony before abolition, I can speak with some authority as to the system of election by the County Council itself. Our experience of that mode of election in Westland was unsatisfactory in the extreme. The fact also that there was a salary attached to that office made it still more difficult to arrive at a really satisfactory conclusion, or at such a conclusion as we felt to be in accord with the feelings of the bulk of the people whom the Chairman was called upon to represent. The feeling, if not of all, at any rate of a very large majority, after their experience of the system of election by the Council, was undoubtedly to condemn it, and to insist upon the election being made by the whole body of the people. I think by the latter means a very much fairer representation of the people is arrived at; and I do not think it will be found under that system that in the practical administration of the affairs of the county there will be any serious clashing between the Chairman elected by the people and the members also elected by the people, more especially if those special powers that were intrusted to the Superintendent under the old Constitution Act are removed, and when no system of legislation has to be adopted, and where such serious responsibility does not devolve upon the Chairman of the Council as at present rests upon the Superintendent, who has the initiation of all matters relating to the expenditure of money. I therefore view this with great satisfaction; and I join with the Hon. Mr. Holmes in saying that I trust the provision inserted in this Bill with reference to the payment of County Chairmen will not be pushed to any extreme. It does appear to be necessary to make provision in the Bill to enable the Council to do so, if they think proper; but I would have been very glad if it were possible to allow the Council to have that power, and at the same time to strike this clause out of the Bill altogether. I recognize that possibly some remuneration will have to be given to the occupant of this office, which in the case of large counties will no doubt be one of considerable responsibility, and will involve duties which cannot be expected to be performed without some payment. I hold that it is the greatest mistake, where a large sacrifice of time and a great amount of attention are required, to make the acceptance of such offices a purely honorary matter. I think the work is in a great majority of cases not so well done. Those interested cannot find fault, because the work is simply done as an act of grace. There is, I think, another very good provision in the Bill which will meet the difficulty probably of some of those places where there are already large Road Boards having considerable revenue, and where those Road Boards are in reality able to perform all the duties of a county. I refer to the permission given by which a county may be established only in form and not in reality. There was a matter which, I think, is of very great importance, referred to by some of the speakers, in reference to the power of borrowing. From what I understood to be the feeling of the Council with reference to general loans, as expressed in the discussion on the Municipal Corporations' Bill, I take it that the Council will make some alteration in the Counties Bill of the same nature as has been made in the former Bill. I think, on reflection, that such a course will be the correct one to adopt. Although the extent of borrowing is limited, still I think it is very much better that we should insist upon all loans going through the ordeal provided here for special loans, and simply give the counties power to borrow in the same way as Municipal Corporations, by allowing an overdraft to the amount of two years' revenue. This will give enough money if any special emergency arises, and I think it will bring the ratepayers and the borrowers face to face, and will certainly insure that close supervision of borrowing which, I think, is the great protection we have against those numerous loans. There was one matter specially referred to by two honorable gentlemen upon which, it appears to me, they are under a misapprehension. That is with reference to the exceptional mode of treatment as to voting on those special loans and at the elections for County Chairmen. I understood the Hon. Colonel Whitmore to refer to manhood suffrage as being exercised.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I said that the present electoral privilege amounted nearly to manhood suffrage.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I think there is a marked difference between manhood suffrage and a qualification to vote based on the payment of rates. I think the mere fact of being rated, and of being obliged to contribute towards the revenue of the country, certainly gives a fair right to vote; and, while I do not approve at all of manhood suffrage, I do approve of the system of voting laid down in this Bill. The matter I especially intend to refer to is with reference to voting on special loans. I understood the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse and the Hon. Colonel Whitmore to say that the system of plurality of voting—which, after all, is a protection of property—is not included in this particular form of voting. Now, perhaps I may be mistaken; but I would submit to those honorable gentlemen my view of the matter. I see in subsection 6 of the 150th clause—which provides for taking the poll—that the poll shall be taken under the provisions of "The Regulation of Local Elections Act, 1876;" and I find, on referring to that Act, that the 26th clause says,—

"Every person proposing to vote shall inform the Returning Officer of his name, and the Returning Officer shall satisfy himself, by reference to the roll, or by inspection of the miner's right shown, that such person is entitled to vote, and has not already voted, and shall thereupon deliver to him as many voting papers as he requires, not exceeding the number of votes which he is entitled to give.

Again in a subsequent clause,—

"All the voting papers to which any voter is entitled shall be given to him at the same time."

If I understand that aright, it implies that plurality of voting, as it appears in the prepared roll, shall be exercised in the matter of special rating in the same way as on other occasions. I think that meets the difficulty suggested. If it does not, I certainly agree that some provision should be inserted which would give the same right of plurality of voting in the matter of special loans as on other occasions. I would also point out to the Hon. Mr. Holmes—who objected, apparently, to the right of miners voting under their qualification, on the ground that in some districts miners would be as three to one to those who would be called upon to pay rates—that these miners are themselves taxed to a very large extent, and that their revenue, independent of the power of rating over their property such as it is, would also have to be security, and would have to go towards the redemption of loans that might be raised by their votes. Therefore I think that objection will be removed. With reference to the duties of the Council, I think most matters are specified in Part X. of this Act. I am not quite clear with reference to charitable institutions, referred to in clause 193. I see the County Councils have power to make provision for hospitals and charitable institutions within the county; but I do not see the provision which I think existed in some former Bills by which the boroughs and counties could unite in the matter of hospitals. Now, as a rule, the hospitals, from which the country receives by far the larger amount of benefit, are situated within the borough, and are to a very large extent supported by the borough. At all events, in our part of the country—where the Government subscribes two-thirds and the people one-third of the revenue—the people within the towns are called upon to pay a very much larger proportionate share than the people in the country. Although we have the county divided into separate districts, and make every district responsible for the patients coming from it, still people, when they fall ill, naturally come to town, and when they have been there for some time they are admitted into the hospital as patients from the town, and of course that is charged upon the people of the borough. I think some provision ought to be made by which the expenses of such charitable institutions should be borne in some proportion to the benefits derived from them. There is another matter which I do not see any notice taken of in the Bill. That is with reference to cemeteries. We know that around all small townships one of the first things required is a cemetery; and from my own experience, I know there has been very great difficulty, owing to the absence of proper regulations for managing those cemeteries, in having them maintained in that proper and decent order which I think we all desire so much. I would be glad to see some provision introduced into this Bill giving the Council power to regulate and make rules for the proper and efficient administration of cemeteries. There is only one other matter which occurs to me at present, and that is with reference to the question whether it is desirable that the Chairmen of these counties should be permitted to sit in Parliament. Upon this point I may say I feel considerable doubt. I feel that probably, if any number of gentlemen, being Chairmen of counties, come up to Parliament, they will be charged with some particular local ideas which may frequently outweigh their better judgment in matters of general importance. But I feel that, with the great number of counties we shall have, and with the number of people who will come from the Councils, we shall be protected by the feelings of one against the other. I think that, by excluding them from Parliament, we may exclude the counties from benefiting by the services of many persons perhaps better fitted to occupy the position than others who feel no interest in and have no acquaintance with parliamentary duties. I am inclined to think at present, although open to argument, that we shall be doing no great harm by allowing the Chairmen of the County Councils to sit in Parliament. With regard to the size of the counties, I think that is a matter which will necessarily adjust itself. I agree that it is desirable that ridings and road districts should be identical. I think that the experience of two or three years' working of the system will enable us to adapt it thoroughly to the circumstances of the country. Perhaps I have entered into matters of detail, which should be properly considered in Committee; but I did not like to allow this opportunity to pass without expressing the views I had formed respecting this important Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I feel that, in this Bill, we are making provision for a system of administering local government after Provincial Governments are removed; and, being fully impressed with the conviction that we cannot hope, in this session, to make provisions such as will be permanently acceptable, I am willing to accept anything that is likely to be practicable, without much cavilling or criticism. For that reason I shall support this Bill generally, although, in a few points of detail, I may be disposed to suggest some amendments. But even with this determination to support the Bill, I cannot allow the second reading to pass without expressing an opinion upon the subject. I must say that I am not satisfied with this measure, and I am equally certain that the public will not be satisfied with it. It seems to me that a radical mistake has been made in its construction. Several honorable members have already pointed out that the ridings should be road districts, and that belief I entirely concur in. I hold that we should have taken as the unit the existing Road Boards, and divided the county into Road Boards, or kept the county under the administration of the country as outlying districts, till the population in those districts desired to have Road Boards passed. I think the County Council should be composed of the Chairmen of the Road Boards within the county, and two or more members elected within each riding or road district. If the counties had been subdivided into ridings, and the ridings made simply identical with the road districts, I believe the best form of local government would have been obtained. Under this Bill, Road Boards may become merged in the counties. I think it would be a most deplorable mistake if the Road Boards were extinguished. It would fail to give what I am certain the colony most desires to have—namely, the administration of local affairs subdivided and extended to road districts, municipalities, parishes if you will—to have them subdivided and extended, so that each little community that has a certain amount of unity of interest shall be able to manage the affairs pertaining to itself. I would refer to a quotation I made last year on the question of the abolition of provinces, and the Council will perhaps excuse me for refreshing their recollection. It is a quotation from Palgrave, and is as follows:—

"Might we not more simply say that the first, often the only officer of Governments, is that of magistrate; their capital affair to assure their subjects the quiet enjoyment of their life, their household honor, and their property. For these they are responsible to those they govern; for the rest, let individuals, corporations, villages, towns, shires, and provinces arrange their own matters as they see best. . . . Men very commonly get on all the better for not being meddled with."

Now, that is the idea to be carried out, if we take the road districts or ridings as units. Let them choose the County Councils, and let there be a clear distinction drawn between the functions which each are to exercise. If the County Councils have only the arterial roads and bridges on them under their control, they will have very little to do for a time; but, undoubtedly, as time passes on, other legal powers will be added to them, and by-and-by they will become a very important power in the State. That is my great objection to the Bill. I believe it will become necessary to bring in amending Bills from time to time, until the public generally come to recognize what they want, and will be able to express it. I do not believe they now know what would be best, or would be able to choose. At the same time, although I do not coincide with some of the fundamental propositions in the Bill, I am not prepared to offer any obstruction to its passing, because I do not think that any amount of care we might bestow on the Bill would enable us to produce a measure that would give satisfaction, if it was found in practice to work unfairly or inconveniently. I am firmly impressed with the idea which was touched upon by the Hon. Mr. Hall in one of the earliest debates this session, who, in anticipation of the measures to be brought in this session to replace the form of local government we had determined to remove, said that the replacement of satisfactory institutions would not be the work of one, but of many sessions. And I would add to that the reflection of one of our most thoughtful writers—Helps—who says, "No great State was ever built up without much toil, self-sacrifice, and renunciation on the part of many noble persons through many generations." And we shall find that, before we frame our new institutions in such a manner as to give general satisfaction, we shall have to spend many sessions in debating and discussing them. Therefore I hold our most prudent course would be to amend the Bill in such details as are most obviously objectionable, but to accept the skeleton—the framework—without much objection, and from time to time to amend it in those directions in which we see amendments most required.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL.—As an allusion has been made by the Hon. Mr. Menzies to a suggestion which fell from me at the commencement of the session, I desire, in order to prevent misunderstanding, to state that this Bill, as it stands, is not my idea of what the best measure of local self-government for the colony would be. But I am free to admit that the difficulties of elaborating any thoroughly satisfactory measure have shown themselves even greater than I thought they would be at the commencement of the session: therefore I am prepared to vote for the second reading of this Bill, and to endeavour to give every assistance to the introduction of improvements in Committee. Although my opinions are different from those of many of my friends whose opinions are entitled to great respect, I think it would be better if we could elaborate a scheme by which the County Board might have been elected by the various Road Boards. It is quite true that there is this great difficulty: that in a part of the colony there are no Road Boards; yet in all parts of the colony we require some provision for local self-government to take the place of that which we are abolishing. Still, I think an attempt might have been made even to get over that difficulty; but as a contrary course has been decided upon, I think we shall but do our duty to the country by endeavouring to do the best we can with this measure. I would mention, in support of my view, that, so far as I can gather, a system of that kind has worked well in the southern part of the province from which I come. We have there a Board of Works, with nothing like such large powers as the proposed counties are to have, but which has had the expenditure of a very large sum of money. Its members have been elected by the various Road Boards; it has elected its own Chairman, and, as far as I can gather, it has done its work very well, in an unostentatious, practical, and inexpensive manner, which I think it will be very fortunate if those counties equal. I do not mean to say that complaints have not been made against that Board; but I believe that, after experience of the working of the proposed new Boards, the residents in that part of the country will look back to the Timaru and Gladstone Board of Works as a body which has deserved well of that part of the country. The difficulty of elaborating any thoroughly satisfactory measure arises, to a very great extent, out of this fact, that we have no uniform set of circumstances to deal with in this colony. There is in this Colony of New Zealand, perhaps more than in any other country on the face of the globe, a great variety of different local circumstances in different parts of the country; and it seems impossible to devise a measure for one part of the colony which would be quite suitable to another; and that is why I feel strongly the opinion the Hon. Mr. Menzies alluded to, that it will take a very long time before we can elaborate any system of local government in this colony which will work well. That is the reason why I, for myself, say now, as I have said before, that I would have been very glad to see the provincial system of government continued in the southern part of the colony. In the North it could not live, but in the South I do not believe its work was done. It still had revenues to spend; it had work to do, and, on the whole, in the larger Provinces of Canterbury and Otago it worked well; and, with all its faults, I think we shall be fortunate if we introduce a system which will give as much satisfaction in those provinces as Provincial Governments have done. I say "in the provinces," because, in my humble opinion, the greatest evils of Provincial Governments have not been traceable in the provinces, but in the General Assembly. The Superintendents and the gentlemen allied with them, session after session and year after year, came to the sitting of the Assembly much more impressed with the sense of what was due to their provinces than of what was due to the colony, and were prepared to sacrifice the interests of the colony to the interests of their provinces. That is, to my mind, the real reason for the abolition of the provincial form of government. If Provincialism had been abolished in those parts of the colony where Provincial Governments could not be carried on any longer, I do not think the power of the Superintendents of the remaining provinces would have been so formidable as to be a serious obstacle in the way of the Colonial Government. But what we have to do now is to try and find out the best system of local government for the future; and I would suggest that we should familiarize ourselves with this idea, that it may be desirable that we should not insist upon absolute uniformity—that we should remember that what suits one part of the colony may not suit another. Of course we cannot expect to arrive at that at once, but year by year we may find that we shall be able to make improvements. With regard to one or two salient points of the Bill now before us, I agree with those honorable gentlemen who think that the mode of electing the Chairmen of counties proposed in this Bill is not the best that can be adopted. The person whom I should like to see holding the office of County Chairman is a good man of business. He will not be the social or political head of the county, but simply the presiding member at the Council meetings, and to carry on the routine business of the county; and therefore, as has been said, the best man we can get for that may not be the most likely to get the most support in an election contest. In other words, the best Chairman might not be the best candidate. I think we might find many men willing to accept the position of Chairmen of counties, who would not be disposed to go through the excitement, the expense, and the trouble of an election. I think that, if we adopt the mode of election suggested in the Bill, we shall lessen the chances of getting the best men; and in Committee I shall be prepared to vote for an alteration of the system now proposed. If in the election of a Chairman each elector has only one vote, while for the election of the County Council each elector may have a plurality of votes, it is probable that you may be creating a feeling of antagonism between the Council and the Chairman. The Councillors will to some extent represent property, while the Chairman will represent the people, and the latter may be constantly saying to the former, "I represent the people and you do not." There is danger of that: I also think it may be desirable to remunerate the Chairmen of counties where large demands may be made upon their time; but I do not think this should be put so prominently in the Bill as it is now. I think that if they are paid they ought not to have seats in the Assembly. There would be great inconsistency in our trying to make our Disqualification Act more and more stringent if we are to allow paid officers of the county to have seats in the Assembly. I can only say, in conclusion, that, in whatever shape the Bill may pass,

I shall do my best to make it a workable measure.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.—Sir, it was not my intention to have said a word on this occasion, particularly after hearing the able speech of my honorable friend Mr. Bonar; but in consequence of what has been said, I feel bound to make a few remarks. For many years past I have been strongly opposed to Provincialism; but since I saw this Bill come down to this Council, I certainly must confess that I greatly regret that the Abolition Bill ever became law. As the Hon. Mr. Hall has said, it will be very difficult indeed, in consequence of the great difference in the topographical features of the country, to frame a measure that will be satisfactory to all parts of it. The Hon. Mr. Holmes alluded this evening to the size of the counties. Now, I know of a county of over one hundred miles in length, and that county is absolutely divided in one direction by the Kaikoura Range. In fact it is impossible to get from one end of the county to another during three months of the year. And then another part of the county is divided by a very high range, which cannot be got over except on horseback at certain seasons of the year. This is a very unworkable kind of thing. It has been said that we must bring in some Bill; but, to my mind, we did not want such a measure as this. We have got the Road Boards to fall back upon. The Chairmen of Road Boards could have called meetings of the Boards in districts where there were Road Boards; and in places where Road Boards did not exist, it would have been very easy for the Government to have stepped in and provided for a difficulty of that kind. The fact is, that this Bill proposes to inflict upon us all the evils of Provincialism, but without giving us any of its good qualities. As my honorable friend Mr. Holmes very pertinently asked, why should we have so many borrowing powers in the colony? Are we going to start de novo, and put a debt on the country by means of the debentures of these counties? If we have so many different borrowing powers, we shall probably have to consolidate the loans. I know it will be maintained that these borrowing powers will be granted to the counties in such a way that the colony will not be responsible for their debts; but though we may not legally be liable, we shall be liable equitably for all the debts of these County Councils, Municipalities, Harbour Boards, boroughs, &c. When all these debentures are floating about the country, what will the people in London say when our debentures are offered to them? They will say, "We do not know what these people owe outside;" and I think it would be only a reasonable thing for them to say. I do not like this measure at all; and although I am not going to offer any opposition to it, I cannot sit down without saying that if my vote were to throw out this Bill entirely I would give it with all my heart. I think it would be much better to have the Chairmen of these County Councils elected by the Councils themselves. I entirely agree with the Hon. Mr. Holmes's remarks upon this point. I thoroughly agree that a person who would be a good Chairman of a County Board very probably would not be considered so by the people in general, who would under this Bill have the option of electing him. As far as the question of allowing the Chairmen of counties to hold seats in this Assembly is concerned, I should be opposed to their doing so, whether they were paid or not. I imagine that a salary would be attached to the office of Chairman; and whether he took it or not, I should certainly object to his having a seat in Parliament. There would be a chance of the House of Representatives being composed of members of County Councils; and if that were the case, they could simply do what they liked. They could band themselves together and carry everything that they wished, and drag the country down to ruin. The end and aim of each man would be to get as much as he could for his own county. Now as regards the miners' rights, it has been said, that the miners have been overtaxed; but I say that there is no class in the country which has been so leniently dealt with as the miners. How many hundreds of thousands of pounds have been spent in providing them with water-races? And what have we got for doing so much for them? Very little indeed, if anything at all. The money they pay cannot be called taxes. It is simply a rent that they pay for being allowed to take the gold out of the ground. Does the honorable gentleman tell me it would be right for these men to have the power, as they travel round the country, to vote in the different counties on the question as to whether money should or should not be borrowed? They are men who have no interest whatever in the country, and yet they are to have a voice in deciding whether it is desirable to borrow money or not, and fixing the amount to be borrowed. I think that is perfectly absurd. I will not detain the Council any longer. I do not think it is necessary for me to refer to the details of the Bill, which I have read with some attention, and what few remarks I have to make I shall reserve until the House is in Committee.

* The Hon. Mr. ACLAND.—Sir, an honorable gentleman has said that he thought it would be desirable that the ridings should be coterminous with the road districts. I wish to draw the attention of the Council to the fact that anything of this kind should be done very carefully. In the Province of Canterbury, the road districts were of very different sizes. There had been a power given to the districts to divide, and some were very small; in fact, the road district of Waimate was coterminous with the proposed county. I think that the ridings should not be of necessity coterminous with the old road districts; and I hope, therefore, honorable gentlemen will see the necessity of giving the matter careful consideration before anything is done.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—Sir, I shall have occasion for saying but very few words in reply to what has fallen from honorable gentlemen this evening in reference to this Bill. The principal objections to the Bill have been very ably answered by my honorable friend on my left, Mr. Menzies. I agree that it is very desirable that the ridings of the counties should be coterminous with the road districts, and that this should be done by administrative action. I have no doubt that the Road Boards themselves, where it is possible to make their boundaries exactly the same with the ridings of the counties, will, under the power which they will have of altering their own boundaries, adapt themselves to that condition, and so alter their own boundaries as to make them coterminous with the ridings of the county. I am not able to agree with those honorable gentlemen who think that the County Councils should be elected by the Road Boards; and I will explain the reason why. Honorable gentlemen who have gone through the Public Works Bill know that a check is imposed on the Road Boards by the necessity of reference to the County Councils with regard to many of their proposed works; and undoubtedly, if the County Councils were elected by the Road Boards themselves, the power of this check would be greatly limited. Holding that view, I think that a separate election is preferable. My honorable friend Mr. Bonar expressed the opinion that cemeteries should properly be placed under the control of these local bodies: I am at one with him on that point, but the state of the law renders it impossible at present. It is a very important subject, and legislation on it will have to be provided for separately in the course of the next year. I have no doubt that the cemeteries will ultimately be placed under the control of the local bodies. As far as charitable institutions are concerned, I have only to say that they will have to be provided for by the districts in which they exist. In the meantime, provision is made for the charitable institutions in each district, and, either in this Bill or in the Provincial Arrangements Bill, power is given to the Governor to take part of the subsidies payable to any of these boroughs or road districts in which hospitals exist for the maintenance of them. No doubt all these things will settle themselves in time, with a little patience and a little judicious administration. I am sorry that I have not been able to secure the approval of my honorable friend opposite for this Bill. His chief objection appears to be to the large borrowing powers that are proposed to be given to the counties. But I apprehend that it would be scarcely possible for these local bodies to find the means for constructing bridges and other large local works without being obliged to have recourse to borrowed money. The Colonial Government is divesting itself of all the revenue it has to spare, and bestowing it on the Road Boards and counties. If there be not sufficient funds arising from rates, &c., for the construction of their works, I suppose the counties have no alternative but to borrow; but it is for the ratepayers to decide whether they shall do this or not. I have heard to-night, from my honorable friend on my left (Mr. Holmes) what I have frequently heard before—namely, that it was impossible for the colony to escape from its liability for these local loans. I deny that any responsibility can attach to the colony, as a whole, for these local loans. The persons who lend the money will have an absolute knowledge of the security upon which they lend, and they will be made fully alive to the fact that the Colonial Government will not be liable for the repayment of the money. I do not see by what process any liability can, under these circumstances, be incurred by the Colonial Government. It has been objected that the counties are too large; but, if that be so, there will be no difficulty in remedying it. The moment a County Council comes into existence, it is quite competent for it, if it finds its boundaries too large, to take steps to reduce them. The adaptability of this Bill is so great that we should try the experiment of its operation before we declare that the counties are too large or too small. I listened with much surprise to the speech of my honorable and gallant friend opposite (Captain Fraser). I thought he was an Abolitionist among Abolitionists, but I am sorry to find that his colours are very different from what I supposed them to be. He said that the change from Provincialism to this system of local government was made on the spur of the moment, and he referred to it as being of a revolutionary character. But I may tell him that the change was not made on the spur of the moment, but after very careful and long consideration. In the year 1874 a resolution was passed declaring that it was desirable that a change should be made from the provincial form of government in certain parts of the colony, and that declaration was before the whole country for a year. It was discussed and criticised by every newspaper in the colony. In the next year, legislation took place upon the subject—legislation extending beyond the originally declared purpose, but not the less expected and not the less welcomed on that account. That legislation has not yet accomplished its end; but it will do so, I hope, in a very short time. On the day after the last day of the present session, the Abolition Act will come into force. Since that Act was passed there has been a general election, and an appeal to the country upon this very question. It has been the question of questions upon every hustings in the country; and no attempt has been made of anything like a serious character, and no attempt is likely to be made, after that appeal to the constituencies, by the representatives to repeal that Act. To say that legislation of such a kind was made upon the spur of the moment, and that it deserved to be characterized in the manner in which my honorable and gallant friend characterized it, is stretching the use of language, if I may be permitted to say so, a little too far. I will not detain the Council any longer. I am glad to see that my honorable friend opposite (Mr. Waterhouse) concurs generally with the principles of the Bill.

Bill read a second time.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 11th October, 1876.

First Readings—Inspector of Prisons—“Hinemoa”—Grey Gorge Bridge—Crown Agents—Kakanui Harbour Board Bill—Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

The Auckland Public Buildings Bill, the Palmerston South Athenæum Bill.

INSPECTOR OF PRISONS.

Mr. BURNS asked the Premier, Whether the Government had sent to England for an Inspector-General of Prisons for the colony; and whether the House will be afforded an opportunity of discussing the advisability of appointing one of colonial experience to such an office? He hoped the Premier would be able to answer the first portion of the question in the negative. With regard to the second portion, he might say he hoped, if it was still the intention of the Government to appoint such an officer, they would look for him in the colony. He thought the time was come when the Government might look amongst the servants of the colony, and find good and valuable officers who were deserving of promotion. He trusted the House would take that view, if it was necessary to make the appointment at all.

Mr. BOWEN had to say, in answer to the honorable gentleman, that, in pursuance of the statement made to the House, when the vote was taken last year, instructions had been sent to the Agent-General to consult with Judge Richmond, who was then at Home, and to ask the Inspector-General of Prisons in London to select a person well acquainted with the modern system of classification and discipline in the gaols of England. The instructions were sent Home some time ago, and the Government expected to get an answer any day as to what had been done in the matter.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a statement of the terms and cost of bringing out the steamer “Hinemoa”?

Mr. G. McLEAN said it would be impossible to lay the information before the House for some time yet. The drafts for expenses incurred at the ports at which the “Hinemoa” called were drawn on London, and until they got the complete accounts, it would be impossible to state the exact cost of bringing her out.

Mr. SWANSON asked whether the captain of the “Hinemoa” had not brought with him copies of the drafts drawn on London.

Mr. G. McLEAN replied that he had, but that to place these copies on the table by themselves would present a very incomplete account, and would not be at all satisfactory to the honorable gentleman.

GREY GORGE BRIDGE.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, What course they propose to take in reference to the accident to the Brunner Bridge, and the report thereon? A report and evidence in regard to this matter had been laid on the table from certain gentlemen known as the Commissioners of Audit. It was not for him to comment on that evidence, but he had formed his own opinion as to where the blame rested, and he would like to know what course the Government intended to pursue in punishing those who were responsible for the error.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the Government intended to have the bridge rebuilt as soon as possible; as a matter of fact, it was now in course of re-erection. As to the punishment of those who were responsible for the error, he could only state that the Engineer-in-Chief was the responsible person, and that there was no intention to punish any one. The inquiry that had taken place would lead to such steps as would prevent the recurrence of such an accident.

CROWN AGENTS.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, As the Crown Agents declined to have further dealings with Sir Julius Vogel, what provision they propose to make to secure the interests of the colony? It would be recollected by honorable members that during the present session a communication had been laid on the table from the Crown Agents, in which they stated their intention to decline to have any further connection with Sir Julius Vogel. That being the case, and as it was possible that the colony would have to dispense with the services of gentlemen whose aid had been so valuable to the colony in past times, he wished to know what provision would be made for imposing a check upon the almost uncontrolled powers which the Agent-General would have. By reference to the Public Debts Act, he found that the Agent-General had power to withdraw moneys from one bank and lodge them in another, and all that was necessary was that these cheques should be signed by a clerk in the Audit Department. This power involved great responsibility, and the handling of large sums of money; and it was absolutely necessary that some steps should be taken to protect the interests of the colony. Those were his reasons for placing the question on the Paper, and he trusted the Government would give a full and satisfactory answer.

Major ATKINSON said the Crown Agents had never refused to be associated with Sir Julius Vogel. It would appear that in their letter—he had that day laid on the table a telegram received from those gentlemen to the same effect—they refused to act with Sir Julius Vogel as ordinary Loan Agents, and not as Crown Agents. The telegram made that perfectly clear. That being the case, he presumed there would be no difficulty in the matter. If any difficulty should arise, it would be the duty of the Government to protect the interests of the colony; and he had no doubt they would be able to do so.

KAKANUI HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

Mr. HISLOP asked for leave to introduce this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER asked whether the Bill had been recommended by the Government?

Major ATKINSON replied that it had, but at the same time he wished to call the attention of the House to the irregularity which had taken place in the manner of the introduction of all these Harbour Board Bills. The conduct of the Government had been commented upon by many honorable gentlemen, and he wished to ask the advice of Mr. Speaker as to how the House should protect itself against this irregularity being drawn into a precedent. The Government, as the House was aware, brought down these measures in obedience to the strongly-expressed wishes of honorable members; but they desired now that a distinct opinion should be expressed that the irregularity on this occasion should not be drawn into a precedent. It was upon that point he sought the advice of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER said there was no doubt there had been great irregularity and some misunderstanding in regard to the introduction of these Harbour Board Bills. There were two points to be considered. Some were of the nature of private Bills, and some were of the nature of trade Bills. In addition to that, many of them were accompanied with provisions relating to endowments from the public estate. With regard to the private Bills, there was a proper course to be observed, which had not been strictly followed, though he hoped it would be in future. With regard to the Harbour Board Bills which were trade Bills, they can only be introduced through Committee of the whole House, and Bills which deal with endowments taken out of the public estate must go through the process of being recommended by the Crown, and being initiated in Committee of the whole House. He trusted the course that had been pursued this session in regard to such Bills would not be regarded as a precedent. Under the circumstances, looking at the fact that sixteen other Harbour Board Bills had been introduced, he would feel justified in putting the question, That leave be given to introduce this Bill.

Leave given, and Bill read a first time.

SUPPLY.

Major ATKINSON moved, That the Speaker leave the chair, in order that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SHARP.—Sir, I beg to move the following resolutions as an amendment to the motion. They are to this effect:—"That this House concurs in the opinion of the Executive Government that it is necessary the unproductive expenditure of the colony must be kept strictly within the ordinary income, and, with that object, deems it indispensable that the Civil Service of the colony should be re-organized, and the cost thereof substantially reduced. That this House feels great difficulty in dealing with the estimates so as to effect that object, and is satisfied that the necessary reductions can be most effectively and judiciously made during the recess by the Executive Government; and pledges itself to support the Government in giving effect to this resolution." I will not take up the time of the House very long in obtruding any remarks with reference to these resolutions; but I have to say this, that no one is more satisfied than I am that it is necessary that there should be some very great retrenchment in the public service of the colony. It is evident to all minds that the Civil Service is gradually growing and increasing, and has now attained to very large proportions; and if it is not checked and reduced, it will become an overbearing power in the colony. After the speeches that were made last night, more particularly the speeches delivered by the honorable member for Akaroa and the honorable member for Christchurch, it will not be necessary for me to take up the time of the House by calling attention to what is simply the result of the figures and facts which came out in those statements, and the financial statements made by the late and the present Premier. It must be evident to all intelligent minds that the state of the finances of the colony is such that something must be done to improve them. There is no doubt that the management of the pecuniary resources of the colony should be conducted as economically as possible—that we should adopt the course that would be followed in any well-conducted mercantile establishment—that is to say, the expenditure should be brought within the income. We all know, if this is not done in mercantile establishments and similar establishments, the result would sooner or later be bankruptcy or ruin. I am, however, of opinion, after hearing the debate of last night, that it is hopeless for this House to take upon itself the responsibility of saying in which direction retrenchment is to take place in regard to the Civil Service. It is so difficult for a member of this House, particularly so numerously constituted as it is, to take up a particular branch of the service, and say this officer or set of officers should be dispensed with or retained. The fact is, that the Executive alone, to my mind, should be responsible for making reductions in the departments, so as not to interfere with the service of the colony, because we are all perfectly agreed that the service of the colony must be kept up in an efficient state, otherwise the business will not be conducted in a satisfactory manner. I hope the Government will not consider these resolutions as being of a hostile nature. I have framed them in such a way that I think the Government may accept them, and that they will not dissent much from them. They will have the effect which this House desires, and that is to reduce the strength of the Civil Service. I believe that this House will support the Government in carrying out that object. For my own part, I conceive that it is not simply a question of reducing the salaries of officers. I have had a great deal of experience in the public service, and I say that it is not by reducing salaries that economy is best effected. My own belief is that reductions should be made more particularly in regard to numbers; and that by consolidating offices when they become vacant, a great deal may be done towards reducing the expenditure now incurred in connection with the Civil Service. I believe myself that if the Government would undertake this matter during the recess—undertake it in a proper spirit, in the spirit in which I bring forward these resolutions—a very great reduction could be made in the expenditure of the colony. Sir, I offer these resolutions to the House, and I hope that the House will consider them carefully, and will be induced to accept them.

Major ATKINSON.—The Government certainly will not be prepared to accept these resolutions in any spirit of hostility. They were entirely in accord with the views which the Government have already expressed, so that it is only reasonable that we should assent to them; because they will very considerably strengthen our hands in the work which we are prepared to undertake. The Government are aware of this fact, that the income and expenditure of the colony must be made to meet. They have pointed out, however, that this is not the work of a moment, that it is not the work of a month or two; it must be done cautiously; but they say distinctly that it must be done. We shall be prepared during the recess to take into consideration not only the question of the reorganization of the Civil Service, so far as it may be necessary with the view of reducing expenditure, but we shall consider our expenditure upon every other branch of the service which we now perform with the view of reduction; and if this House is really in earnest in desiring reduction, and if the country really means to have reduction, I take it there should be no great difficulty in doing it. The fear is, that when we really come to apply the pruning knife, honorable members will not be prepared to apply it. I have heard a great deal of talk this session about reductions; but has any honorable member asked for any gift for any person, and it has been refused? Have we not, on several occasions during this session, actually set the law at defiance to make gifts to widows of deceased persons? Have we not done that without any authority of law at all, and against, as I pointed out at the time, the rule which the House and the Government have laid down for their direction. Of course, the House has a perfect right to deal with each case upon its own merits; but I would remark that if the House is going to interfere in all these matters, it is impossible for the Government of the colony to say what the expenditure will be. I only point out these circumstances as indicating what is the tendency of the House; because I am afraid the same rule will be applied by honorable members when we come to review the Civil Service with a view to economy. It is perfectly certain that if this House and the country are going to insist that the Government should perform all the many functions which they do now perform, it is quite certain that the expenditure cannot be reduced to any great amount. I want honorable members to take that seriously into their consideration during the recess, because it is quite certain that many of the advantages which the public now enjoy will have to be curtailed if our expenditure is to be reduced as honorable gentlemen expect. I should like to say a word in regard to the Civil Service. There is no doubt it is a very large service, but there is also no doubt that it has performed an immense amount of work which this country has thrust upon it. If that work is to be maintained, there will be very little hope of reducing the service very much. There is also no doubt at all that the expenditure on our Civil Service is not in proportion to the work that it does, as compared with the other colonies and with the Home Government. There is no doubt about that. Our revenue departments collect money at a cheaper rate than is done in any other country in the world, and they are only a sample of the rest of the Civil Service. I may say that we have a large number of very efficient officers, and many of our Under Secretaries take not only a great pride in conducting the work of their offices efficiently, but also in conducting it economically; and therefore the Government will, I am certain, receive every assistance in the endeavour which they are going to make to reduce, if possible, the expenses of the different branches of the service. I must impress on honorable members of the House this fact, that if we really mean economy, we must be prepared to submit to more self-denial, and the country must be prepared to submit to more self-denial. I shall accept the resolutions on behalf of the Government with very great satisfaction, as an expression of the opinion of this House that they approve of and will support the Government in the course which they propose to adopt.

Sir G. GREY.—The resolutions now proposed to the House have taken me by surprise. I fear, Sir, that under these resolutions a political design lies hid. I gave notice yesterday that it was my intention to move a resolution of this kind. It would be one of a character which possessed some fibre and nerve in it, and really meant something; to which the Hon. the Premier answered, that if such a resolution was proposed, he would take it as a vote of want of confidence, and that, in fact, the Government would not submit to it. Well, to-day, to my very great surprise, an honorable gentleman, before I could possibly get up to move the resolution of which I had given notice, got up and moved these resolutions, which the Government accept in a friendly spirit, and which undoubtedly mean nothing at all. I now move, Sir, as an amendment to these resolutions,—“That, in the opinion of this House, the financial position of the colony imperatively requires the utmost economy in the administration of the public business, departmental and otherwise; and that to effect this, large reductions should be made in the estimates without delay.” I am justified, Sir, in moving this amendment by what we have had said to us to-day. The honorable gentleman, upon whose resolutions I move the amendment, stated in the most distinct terms, at the end of his speech, that large reductions can at once be made in the estimates. These were his words, as I wrote them down. I say he spoke what is perfectly correct, perfectly just, perfectly reasonable, when he said that, and I am in favour of these reductions being made forthwith. The Premier admitted the same thing, but he qualified his statement by saying that it could not be done in a month or two. Sir, if it cannot be done in a month or two, why did he not bring his estimates down prepared in a way in which they ought to be prepared? He knew perfectly well the financial difficulties of the country, and he also knew perfectly well that, if he pleased, he could have equalized the revenue and expenditure, but he did not choose to do it. Hence the present difficulty has arisen. I say that the estimates can at once be reduced by the amount of nearly £100,000 in addition to the reductions which the Government say they have already made, but which are reductions more apparent than real. I think the House should at once make these reductions. The Prime Minister also said that if the House was in earnest in insisting upon reductions being made, it could easily be done. If it can easily be done, why is it not done? That the House is in earnest was shown last night distinctly; and that the Government are not in earnest was shown with equal distinctness. They resisted every attempt made at reduction. The Prime Minister stated what is a fact when he said that if the House is in earnest these reductions could easily be made. These were his words. The House is in earnest. Let them be made at once, and they can easily be made within the next week or ten days. Then the Premier went on to give a proof that the House was not in earnest, by saying it cast certain expenditure on the colony in the shape of pensions to widows, and other expenses of that kind, which the Government had not proposed to make. The Government did intend that those votes should be carried out. If not, they had a majority to prevent it; and they knew it was their duty, as leaders of the House, to take a firm stand, and prevent any expenditure of which they did not approve. That was their duty, and they neglected it. I believe they were willing enough that this should be done, but did not wish to have the odium before the country of being apparently the persons to recommend it. I say that any Ministry, if they had been in earnest in deciding that expenditure should not be forced upon the country, would have refused to allow it, and would have made their offices depend upon their will being carried out. There could be no more fitting occasion for the Government to take up a resolute stand than that of preventing expenditure which they believed the revenues of the country were not capable of bearing. They say these increases indicate the feeling of the House, and they were certain honorable members would not permit them to make reductions in the expenditure. If they believed that, Sir, would they venture to make reductions during the recess? Every one knows they would not. They know perfectly well that a majority of this House will support them in reasonable reductions in the expenditure of the country; but they are unwilling to enter upon it at the present time. They know that making such reductions would cause unpopularity; and you may depend upon it they will avoid entering upon a course of that kind as long as this House will permit them. That, therefore, is another reason why the amendment I propose should be carried, that reductions should be made day by day as we go on, if the Government will not bring down new estimates containing some systematic reduction suited to the public service of the country. The Prime Minister added that the expenditure could not be much reduced, having first of all said that it was possible largely to reduce it; but he qualified his second statement by saying that if the expenditure was much reduced, conveniences must be curtailed. Sir, with ruin staring us in the face, are we not to curtail conveniences? Did ever a statesman talk in such a way before? When men's property is at stake, and public credit is at stake, should we hesitate because conveniences must be curtailed? If conveniences are to be curtailed, let them set an example. Let them reduce the salary of the highest person in the State. Let them reduce their own salaries, their own ministerial residences and gardeners. Let them do away with their Agent-General and his office in London, and at once save £18,000 a year. Let them curtail their conveniences, as they are pleased to term them, and they will find the members of this House are ready to do so likewise. Let them show a good example to the country, and this House will do it too. Let these reductions be carried out at once. Then the Premier spoke in high terms of the civil servants, and I believe with all justice in what he says. I believe the Under Secretaries take great pride in having their work done efficiently and economically, but the Under Secretaries of State are very bad persons to remodel the Civil Service. Each man necessarily attaches undue importance to his own department. It requires some person lifted above that level to look down upon it and see how reductions can be judiciously carried out throughout the Civil Service, so that the public service may not suffer while reductions are being carried out. I differ altogether with what the Premier says as to the cost of our Civil Service. I say no more enormous Civil Service exists in any country in the world than in New Zealand, and I say that no worse regulations for its guidance exist than those in this country; that no allowances of such great magnitude are made to Civil servants in any other country as are made here. If I am not mistaken, the Commissioners of Audit are allowed to travel about the country for half a year, or at all events for several months, and during that time they receive a travelling allowance of two guineas a day. Such an amount was never allowed in any country. A prince would not have an allowance of that kind made to him if travelling for months together. The whole Civil Service is, without exception, arranged upon a scale of extravagant expenditure that ought not to be allowed. We should have returns laid before us containing the fullest information upon all these subjects. I say at once, that many thousands of pounds a year could be saved without in the least interfering with the administration of affairs. It is quite unnecessary for the Commissioners of Audit to travel about in that way. The Commissioners of Audit in England do not travel about. The books, or accounts abstracts of these books, are sent to them, and they inspect them. I do not believe such an absurdity was ever heard of before, and I believe the Government themselves know perfectly well that such a system ought not to be allowed to exist. But I do not believe there is the least intention of making these reductions. It was but yesterday I proposed that a Select Committee should be appointed to investigate the accounts of the last two missions to England, and I was not allowed to have that Committee. What was there to hide? What was there to conceal? There was something. It was quite clear that the public were not to be allowed to have these accounts printed and laid before them. I say that until the accounts are laid before the public in a complete form, as they ought to be, and in the form in which they are laid before the public at Home, it will be impossible to reduce the expenditure of this country. I say that nothing but a public inquiry before the country, such as takes place in Committee of Supply, will lead to a reduction of the expenditure. This plan of leaving it to the Government to carry out reductions during the recess is wrong. If they intended to carry them out, why did they not do it during the last recess? They had plenty of time. Why not have done it at an earlier period of this session? Why did they not then get a Select Committee appointed to inquire into what reductions should be made, and make recommendations to the House? No. They wish to take the matter out of the hands of Parliament and into their own offices. If they are allowed to do so, they will do it most imperfectly, if they do it at all. I therefore hope the House will agree to the resolution, which I shall propose as an amendment to that of the honorable member for Nelson City, Mr. Sharp.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot move his amendment at present. There is already an amendment before the House, which must first be disposed of. The original question was, That I do leave the chair, in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply. Upon that, the honorable member for Nelson City has moved his resolutions as an amendment. If the House decides that those resolutions take the place of the original question, then they become a substantive motion, and amendments can be moved to them. If, however, the House rejects the amendment to the question that I leave the chair, the honorable member for the Thames will not be able to move his amendment to-day, because the House will have ordered that it will "now" go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Sir, I intend to support the motion of the honorable member for Nelson City; and I do so because I see very little chance of effecting any reductions in Committee of Supply. I do not believe honorable members are really in earnest in seeking reductions or retrenchment; otherwise the divisions would not have been carried as they were last night. As has been remarked by the Premier, a number of resolutions have been brought down this session by honorable members—and even by the honorable member for Nelson City himself—for grants to the families of deceased officers, of sums not authorized by law. Although the Government did their very utmost to call the attention of honorable members to what they were doing, yet, in spite of remonstrances, the Committee carried the votes against them. Without referring further to this point, I would suggest to the Government certain items in certain departments in which reductions could easily be made. It is to be hoped that, if the Government do take action, in accordance with this resolution, their action will not be complained of afterwards. Speaking of the Customs Department, I do not hesitate to say that the officers of that department are most efficient, and that the department itself has been exceedingly well managed; but great expense has been forced upon the Government by the opening of warehousing ports and ports of entry in places where they were not at all required; in some cases, the collections do not amount to the cost of maintaining these offices. This, in particular, is a direction in which the pruning knife might be applied; and I give the Government fair notice that, if they do not do so, I will come down with applications for ports of entry in two or three places in Otago; Blueskin, for instance, is quite as important a place as many others that have been created ports of entry. Then there is the Telegraph Office. Great saving might be effected here by cutting off all those stations which are found to give little or no return. I have not a list of the stations before me, but I know, from my recollection of past years, that some of them do not return more than £10 or £12 per annum, and it is too much to expect that the Government should maintain offices from which the revenue is so small. The only difference that will result from reducing the number of this class of offices will be that people will have to travel a little farther to despatch their messages—there will be one telegraph station in the district instead of two. Then when we come to the Postal Department, I find that it is possible there also to effect considerable savings. I would not limit the facilities for the despatch and receipt of letters any more than was absolutely necessary, but I am aware that in some instances the colony has to pay far too high for those facilities. Why, Sir, I know that in some instances the colony has to pay as high as 5s. a letter for carriage, in return for which it receives 2d. The postal subsidies might be considerably cut down, and, as a first instance where the principle of retrenchment might be advantageously applied, I may refer to the half-cost of coach services under the heading "Conveyance of Inland Mails," on page 46 of the estimates. There we find that close upon £2,500 is paid toward maintaining coach lines between Wellington and New Plymouth, Napier and Taupo, Taupo and Tauranga, and Foxton and Waipukurau. That is only half-cost; the other half appears on another part of the estimates. This item, I think, might fairly be reduced. Then there are a number of steamboat subsidies which might be done away with, such as the subsidy for a steam service to the west coast of the Middle Island. Hitherto that subsidy has been paid by the Province of Otago, and I presume has been taken over in consequence of the abolition of the province; but there is at once a sum of £4,000 that might be saved; and there is also the subsidy for a steam service to the east coast of the North Island, £2,200; the steam service between Wellington and Kaikoura, £400; and the subsidy for Blind Bay, £180, which might also be dispensed with. I might quote others, but they at least should certainly be struck off the estimates, or considerably reduced. We come next to the department of the Minister of Justice, and I think it will readily be admitted that the public of New Zealand expect too many facilities in the way of establishing Resident Magistrates' Courts, particularly in Native districts. There are far too many Resident Magistrates in these districts; and as part of their salaries is made up from the Native Department, I think it would be a good thing that the Minister of Justice and the Native Minister should consult together with the object of effecting reductions in this direction. As to the Volunteers, I think they can be dispensed with entirely; and I certainly will not be a party to voting a single penny for the Volunteers, especially in the Middle Island. They are not wanted there, and the money should be saved to the country. My idea on the subject is, that the children in the Government schools should be taught drill and the use of arms; they would be available hereafter if their services were required at any time, and might be called out as Militia. Then there are items for prizes for rifle-shooting, passages of Volunteers, ammunition, &c. Here is a sum of £5,000 which might easily be saved. I see, also, in the estimates, a sum of £450 as a preliminary item of expense on account of the new library.

Major ATKINSON.—That is struck out.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Yes, on reference to the amended estimates I see it is struck out; but I saw a motion on the Notice Paper of another Chamber, suggesting that competitive designs for a new library should be invited. Now I think we should put our foot down firmly, and refuse any such vote. If we invite designs, it will be said, "Oh, we have the designs, we might as well go on with the building!" I think the present library is quite sufficient for all purposes. There are many other directions in which the Government might curtail expenses; but the chances are that, if they attempt to do so, the members representing the district affected would get up and say, "Oh, why did you cut off a telegraph office in my district?" and so on. If the House is in earnest in its desire to effect retrenchment, honorable members should give the Government every assistance in their power.

Mr. STAFFORD.—There is one portion of the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson City which appears to me to be inadvisable, and that is, where it appears to me, by the terms used, the House would express an intention not to interfere with the estimates this session. Now, if I correctly interpret the feeling of the House, it is not altogether prepared to go so far as that. While I recognize that the Government are the persons most likely to make the reduction complete and effective, and that they should have time to consider the matter fairly during the recess, yet I think the Government has a right to expect the House to indicate, during the progress of the estimates through Committee, those directions in which reductions should be made, even if they are not effected by a vote at the moment. I should, therefore, like to see the resolution modified in that direction. The motion of the honorable member for the Thames, which is not yet before the House, is very similar in principle to that of the honorable member for Nelson City, except that it indicates that the House is prepared at the present moment to make reductions; and I am inclined to think that that is the most proper position in which the House can be put on this question. I think the House has not any right to say, "This is none of our business. We have nothing to do with cutting down estimates. We are elected to do other things, and we leave it to the Government to say what shall be a proper amount of expenditure." The honorable member for the Thames said the House was most anxious to cut down the estimates. I wish I could share that view, but I do not share it. I have had a great deal of experience of the action of the House on different occasions, and I know what members have done during the present session. I do not pretend that my knowledge of the feelings of members is so complete as that of the honorable member for the Thames, but I have seen no indication as yet of their desiring certainly to effect retrenchment. It seems to me that the tendency has rather been to add to the estimates than to reduce them. I speak of the House as a whole and not of individual members; and therefore I am sorry to say that I do not share the opinion of the honorable member for the Thames. I wish I could, because until the House and the country really is sincere, as the Premier said, we cannot have any large reductions made; and I know that this country is most luxurious. It has got into a habit of requiring that every sort of Government provision should be afforded to it, to an extent that does not obtain even now in the mother country. If four or five people get together in the head of a valley, they immediately petition for a post office. I know of men in the mother country, who own half a county, who have to send seven or eight miles to a post office for their letters. They do not expect to have their letters brought to their gates, though their tenants are larger in number and quite as worthy of consideration as a great many of the small communities in this colony which require to have a post office and a telegraph station, the latter a perfectly new luxury unknown to our fathers. I recollect that, when I was attempting to make reductions at one time, I was met with petition after petition and request after request from the honorable member for the district concerned asking me not to make them. Even in Auckland, when I dismissed a Resident Magistrate who had not had either a single criminal or a civil case in his Court for six months, I was met by a petition from the district, which pointed out that the very fact that there had been no cases proved how efficacious he was in preserving good-feeling in the district. Of eleven Magistrates I dismissed, in the course of fourteen months, three were put back by the House in following sessions upon direct motions; and so it was with other departments. It is all very well to say the country in concrete calls out for reduction; but whenever it is made to apply in any direction, there is an immediate protest from the people in the district, supported by those who represent that district in the House. Therefore I am utterly unable to agree with the honorable member for the Thames as to the great desire in the House and the country for retrenchment. Let us see what reductions will be proposed and carried by the House. I do not mean to say that there are not certain members in the House who are most sincerely anxious to make reductions and will be found voting for and supporting them, but I am speaking of the House as a whole. With regard to the amendment before the House, I should really like that part struck out which appears to indicate that the House will take no trouble in reducing the estimates. I do not think it is a proper position for the House to take up, and I think it would really reflect upon the House to say that it would not take its proper share in proposing reductions.

Mr. BOWEN.—I do not at all understand the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson to mean that the House should decline to enter upon the question of reduction. The words of the resolution are, "That this House feels great difficulty in dealing with the estimates so as to effect that object, and is satisfied that the necessary reductions can be most effectually and judiciously made during the recess by the Executive Government." All I can say is, that the Government, in stating that they agreed with the honorable member and accepted his resolution, did not mean that they would not be very glad to have the assistance of honorable members and their advice as to the reductions they thought should be made. There were some slight reductions made last night, and I have no doubt that, in going through the estimates, honorable gentlemen will point out matters which they think ought to be discussed, relating to the different branches of the service. The Government said they were prepared to meet the views of the honorable member for Nelson; but they certainly did not understand his resolution to mean that, because the greater part of the reductions could be best made after consideration and ascertaining what could be done in the way of amalgamation between the Provincial and General Government services, the House should at all give up its control over the estimates for the present session. I may say the Government look forward to make reductions for the most part in amalgamating services which have been conducted hitherto by the provinces with those of the General Government.

Mr. REES.—I have been assured just now by the honorable member for Nelson, who proposed the amendment, that there is no understanding betwixt him and the Government in relation to his proposition; but it so marvellously fits in with what fell from the Premier yesterday, that if there be no agreement or understanding between the honorable member for Nelson and the Government, it exactly meets the idea of the Government. If the Government are so anxious to promote economy, so anxious to decrease departmental expenditure, how is it that they have not done it hitherto? They have had long enough to do it, and they must have seen for a very long time that the finances of the country would not bear the enormous strain there is upon them. But, having left their important measures to the end of the session, they now, at the end of the fourth month of the session, say they will be prepared during the recess, when the House has risen, to consider the question of retrenchment. Why, during the time the House has been sitting they have had time to consider this matter. During the previous year, or during the two years previous, they did not choose to consider the position of the country. How is it that they have not been considering the question of retrenchment? And now, because honorable members seem inclined in Committee of Supply to take exception to certain votes, and attempt to make both ends meet by reducing the expenditure to an amount equal to the income, the Ministry turn round and say, "We will do the best we can during the recess." A great deal has been said in this House as to the necessity for continuing great public works, and of thus introducing a large amount of borrowed capital into the country, and the expenditure of that money among the people of New Zealand. We have it stated that it was a very wise stroke of policy to do that in 1869 and 1870, and that things were then at a very low ebb in this country. But in 1869 and 1870 the country was in no such position as we are in now. There was not the same difficulty in making both ends meet, and in keeping the Civil Service down, and in keeping the expense of the country within the revenue, small as the revenue then was. Why, during the last five or six years, nearly £600,000 a year has been added to the ordinary expenditure of the country. We hear a very great deal from members of the Government, as to the increased income of the country, but they never think of telling us at all as to the enormous increase of the ordinary expenditure. The numbers added to the Civil Service, the increase in salaries, the increase of departments as I might say, or at all events the addition of fresh branches to departments, are far more than equivalent to the increase in the revenue. The increase in the revenue has been attended by increased power of expenditure of the people; but the increased expenditure is an expenditure that must go on, because it is an expenditure which, to a certain extent, is demanded by the increasing wants of the people, and will be increasingly demanded. With the extension of settlement we shall require an extension of Government departments. What we want to see is that, while we meet the public requirements and the public wants, the Government shall attempt to only keep a sufficient number of employés of the colony to do the public work. The great desideratum, in fact, is to keep the moneys expended upon the public service within the bounds of the public revenues. Already the Government have had proposed to them two or three ways by which that could be done: but I think that the milk-and-water resolutions brought down by the honorable member for Nelson mean nothing. They mean nothing, and they contain no principle, or the shadow of a principle. On the other hand, they seem rather to incline to that which the honorable member for Timaru has characterized as taking the power out of the hands of the House, and intimating that honorable members should not interfere with the estimates as they passed through Committee. The honorable member for Nelson City says "No." The honorable gentleman should couch his resolutions in such language that they could not be misunderstood. I undertake to say that more than three-fourths of this House believed that was the intention of those resolutions. When I heard them read I thought the intention was to stop discussion in Committee upon particular votes, in order that the Government during the recess might do the whole of this work. If that be not their meaning, they have no meaning at all, because the Government have already stated that during the recess they would take these very steps. If therefore the honorable member for Nelson did not desire to go beyond that, and stop discussion in Committee on particular items, moving his resolutions is simply a waste of time, the blame for which will of course be cast upon the Opposition. The Opposition will be asked why they have obstructed the progress of public business. If the resolutions had not been brought down then, the estimates could have been sent back to the Government, the House could have proceeded to other business, and after the end of next week the Government could bring them down reduced as far as possible, even if some little violence, if necessary, had been used to bring the estimates within the bounds of the public purse and the public revenue. There might have been some sense in that, but there is no sense in the honorable member's resolutions. He might just as well have proposed as a solution of the difficulty a resolution that twice two makes four. I agree with that part of the resolution which says that economy should be practised; but I do not agree with the resolution in so far as it means that the Committee is not to discuss these items. There I am entirely at one with the honorable member for Timaru and other honorable members; and I do hope that no such idea will be promulgated either in this House or in Committee. My idea as to what an amendment should be would be one to the effect that the Government should be compelled to make their expenditure meet their income. As I said last night, I now repeat, that if the Government cannot decrease their expenditure, they must increase their income. They must impose taxation that will enable them to supply out of the current receipts the current expenditure. If we are to have £150,000 of Treasury bills issued on one side, and £150,000 of Treasury bills issued on another side, and this is to go on year after year, it will, as has been said before in this House, end in financial disaster. We cannot escape. It is just like a man in a race, going on hour after hour, increasing the stimulants he took until the time comes that they will not act, the body will not receive any more stimulants, and then he breaks down. We have thrown £40,000 or £50,000 upon this year which ought to have been paid last year. Last year we issued £250,000 of Treasury bills, we shall do the same this year and next year, but probably next year this will come to an end. Next year we shall find that we cannot go on any longer borrowing money, and then there will be taxation imposed on that which alone can pay taxation—property. Then we shall have a great outcry all over the country that property is being ruined—that it is being overwhelmed with taxation. I warn honorable members that this will take place. We ought to be prepared now to meet the difficulty. It will be worse to-morrow, it will be worse next year, it will be worse still the year after. It is the duty of this House, as representing the whole of the people, not to be put off with such resolutions as these, but to try what can be done in relation to the Sinking Fund, in relation to the increasing expenditure, and in relation to levying an income and property tax, so as to meet whatever deficiency there may be between the income of the country and the expenditure of the country. By so doing we shall create confidence in the administration. If we required to borrow any more money for our public works we should be more likely to obtain it, as the Home country would have more confidence in us. I saw a statement in the London Times to the effect that the New Zealand Budget was very satisfactory, and that there was a surplus revenue of £72,000. That was a sham. It was false; it was not the fact. It was not stated that there were £172,000 of Treasury bills outstanding; and the enormous amount of interest which we have to pay was not stated. This is going upon false pretences; and if we continue to go upon false pretences in money matters we shall come to grief in the long run. No man of sense would adopt such a course in regard to his own private affairs, and yet, in colonial matters, this is the course pursued by the Government. It is time to remedy the evil. I believe if the Ministry brought down a measure to impose an income and property tax, they would meet with the support of this House and the country. I believe they would have a large majority in favour of it, and that nine-tenths of the people, even the propertied classes themselves, would support them in such a proposal, because the people feel that the system now carried on is a sham and a snare. The Government should do that instead of accepting such resolutions as these. I am astonished at the honorable member for Nelson City bringing forward such resolutions, as they only put off the evil day. The Government could easily, under the three heads I have indicated, meet the deficiencies, and place the country in a prosperous position.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I do not think it would be right of us to go back to our constituents and say that we could not deal with this question and had relegated it to the Government of the day. In the first place, we do not know who the Government will be that will have the administration of affairs during the recess. If a system of parliamentary government obtained in this country, there are two courses which could be taken. The one course would be to direct the Government to take back the estimates and to indicate where decreases could be made, and how the expenditure could be kept within the income. The next course is to do that which I hope this House will do—namely, insist on making very large reductions in the expenditure. I do not think the resolution of my honorable friend is one which Ministers should accept. To tell the Government that this retrenchment can be made most effectually and judiciously in the recess, and to leave it entirely to the Government to make such retrenchment, is not, I submit, in accordance with the ordinary form of parliamentary government. Either we are satisfied or we are not satisfied. For my own part, I do confess that I am not satisfied with the existing state of things; I am not satisfied with the uncertain position of the Government, or with the position which we are now asked to accept, of relegating our duties as the representatives of the people to the Ministry in the recess. With regard to the first point, that of asking the Government to take back their estimates, I am quite satisfied that such a course will not be accepted by the House. The House is not prepared to put another Government into office. No doubt the Government have a very considerable majority, and any such attempt would be futile on our part. The only course we can adopt is to take this matter into our own hands, and deal with the question of reducing the expenditure—to form ourselves into a kind of Committee of Safety at the present time. The reason why we cannot take the usual parliamentary course is due not so much to the gentlemen on those benches as to others with whom they have been connected. The fact is that our whole parliamentary system has been disorganized by the state of things which has obtained during the last seven years. The Civil Service has also, to a large extent, been disorganized. We have allowed this demoralization of the service to take place by making politics a means of access to the service. This is a thing which I think has been striking at the root and sapping the usefulness of our Civil Service for some years past. It seems to me that the first step to be taken by the Government is this: Let us know who are going to be our Administrators in the future. That is a point which I think the House has a right to be informed on. The Government has for some time past been like the Old Man of the Sea, of whom we have read in our boyhood—the old man who could change himself into any form when you attempted to catch him or get hold of him—who could change himself into a bird, fish, or beast, or any form that occurred to him. You could get from him no forecast of the future, of anything that was going to happen, until you dealt with him with the utmost violence. I do not see, however, that there is anything to be done at the present time with the Government by violence. If we have the present Government deprived of what has been its head, I believe that it, on the whole, would meet the wishes of the House; but for us to pass a resolution relegating, to a body which we do not know will exist, the duty of determining during the recess what the expenditure shall be, is a course which, I submit, will not meet with the approval of our constituents.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I merely wish to state that I cannot approve of the resolutions proposed by the honorable member for Nelson City. The honorable mover of the resolutions said that it was useless for the Committee to attempt to reduce expenditure, or show the direction in which reduction could be made. What would be the use of a Committee of this House if it could not express an opinion as to the direction in which reductions should be made? The resolutions were such as every earnest supporter of the Government would be inclined to support. I do not see why the Committee should concur in the opinion of the Government. One resolution states that this House feels great difficulty in dealing with the estimates so as to effect reduction, and that it is satisfied that the necessary reduction could be most effectually and judiciously made during the recess by the General Government. We are asked to pledge ourselves to support the Government in giving effect to this. I agree with the very pertinent observations made by the honorable member for Avon as to that Government. What will be the Government during the recess? I would like to be informed on that point, because there is an impression abroad and in the House, caused by a statement of the honorable member at the head of the Government, that the Government will undergo a change—that there will be new members taken in, and that old members will go out, shortly after this House is prorogued. It is an important thing to consider, when that Government can ask us to surrender into their hands absolutely the duties which we should ourselves endeavour, at all events, to perform. As to making large reductions in Committee, I think that is quite out of the question. I believe the Government itself is the only body that can show where reductions can be made without impairing the efficiency of the public service. I think it is the duty of the Government to do that. It is the duty of the Government to consider the income, and so to reduce the expenditure as to bring it within the income. If this House attempted to incur further liability, it is the duty of the Government to steadily resist that attempt to this extent: to say, "We cannot permit it; it would be a dereliction of duty if we allowed it. We will give up the seats we occupy, and let other men take our place, rather than that we should incur liabilities which the ordinary revenue of the country cannot meet." That, I consider, is the position which the Government should take up. When the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government stated that this House during this session had set aside the law in voting moneys to individuals, and that he allowed it, I would ask him, without, I hope, any feeling of undue hostility to him, if he found he was doing his duty then.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I have no doubt I was.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Well, it does not seem to me that he took that firm stand which the custodian of the finance of the country should have taken. If he found that the voting of these sums of money would interfere with the equilibrium which should be between the expenditure and the income, it was his duty, I think, to say firmly that the Government would not allow it. The Government should take a firm stand on such occasions. I intend to move, as an amendment, that the last resolution should be struck out. I consider that it is quite unnecessary that we should pledge ourselves to support the Government. The House is not called upon to pledge itself to support the Government. It is not necessary that we should affirm by resolution that we are of opinion that the expenditure of the country should be kept within its ordinary income, and that we should relegate the duty of making reductions to the Government. I would like to see that resolution omitted. We can indicate our views without any expression of opinion respecting the Government of the day at all. I do not think it is necessary. I do believe the honorable member at the head of the Government is anxious to restore equilibrium in our finance; but I also think that he must have foreseen during the year that the income has not come up to his expectation, and that he should have made some preparation to reduce the expenditure. He should have done that before the House met. However, I am not going to argue that point now, and will merely say I think the House should express a simple statement of opinion that it is necessary the expenditure should be brought within the income. The amendment I shall move is to alter the resolutions of the honorable member for Nelson City so that they may read as follow:—"That this House is of opinion that it is necessary that the public expenditure of the colony must be kept strictly within the ordinary income, and with that object it is indispensable that the Civil Service of the colony should be reorganized and substantially reduced." I believe the honorable member for Nelson City is willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. SHARP.—I am willing to do so.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Could the resolutions of the honorable member for Nelson City be put separately?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the amendment to the question, "That I do leave the chair in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply," is carried, then I think I can put these resolutions separately, for I can easily perceive that some honorable members might like to vote for some portion of them who would not vote for the whole.

Mr. HUNTER.—Sir, I took no part in the debate last night; but one portion of the arguments used struck me so much that I should like to refer to it now. I mean the statements made that there had been a considerable reduction in the Customs revenue, which is, of course, the largest source of our revenue. The Hon. the Commissioner of Customs laid before us the night before last a comparative statement of the receipts for the quarter ending on the 30th September, 1876, and the corresponding quarter of the year 1875. I find that the receipts for the quarter ending the 30th September, 1875, were £312,471, and for last quarter £307,844 in round numbers. Last night it was stated that there had been a falling off in the Customs revenue for last quarter of £12,000, as compared with the same quarter of last year; whereas these figures show that the difference is only about £5,000. On looking into the matter further, I find that the returns for the last quarter were equal to the average of the two previous years. It is just as well that these things should be borne in mind. There has also been a constant increase in the Customs revenue for the last four years. In 1872, the increase was £81,000; in 1873, £152,500; in 1874, £223,000; and last year, 1875, when, no doubt, business was not as brisk as it had been in previous years, there was still an increase of £46,000. These are facts which should be borne in mind, and, when so much is said in disparagement of the credit and resources of the colony, they should be brought prominently forward. The honorable member for Auckland City East is not in his place, but he made reference to a recent article in the Times. I take leave to say that that journal is as well informed upon all such matters as the honorable member for Auckland City East, and I would go even further, and say, as well as any honorable member in this House. It is the leading journal of the world, and is always very cautious in the statements it puts forward. I venture to say that the statements made in that paper were founded on the Financial Statement sent Home from this colony, and that they can be borne out in every particular. I have stated over and over again, and I take leave to repeat it again, that the accounts published by the Government of this colony are clear and intelligible. There is nothing kept back in them. There is nothing charged to one year that should have been charged to another, but everything has been stated in a clear and candid way. The Financial Statement of the Treasurer, and the published accounts, have no doubt been before the writer of the money article in the Times, and upon them his statements are founded. He is a man as well able as any honorable member of this House to draw proper conclusions from them. Something has been said on several occasions about the advisability of imposing a property and income tax; that is a question upon which very widely different opinions are entertained. We all recognize that, if there is one result more desirable than another to obtain, it is to encourage the introduction of capital into the country, but nothing could have a more deterrent effect than this constant cry of "property, property, property," and the necessity for taxing it. I do not think due weight is given to the effect of making such statements. In the Colonial Treasurer's statement last year, prominence was given to that subject, and it was fully discussed in all its bearings. The honorable gentleman then said that, if it was shown to be necessary that this tax should be imposed, it would have to be done. I would point out now that under the new form of government about to be introduced it can be done to a very large extent indirectly. Great power is given to the County Councils to impose taxation, and we may feel assured that "property, property," will not escape when left in the hands of the ratepayers. The people in those Councils will have very large powers to borrow money and levy rates.

Mr. SWANSON.—And receive substantial endowments.

Mr. HUNTER.—The honorable member for Newton says "receive substantial endowments." They will no doubt receive substantial endowments in one respect. If they raise the money themselves, they will receive substantial endowments in proportion, and can spend it on the works they have to carry out. You cannot expect these works and improvements to be carried out unless the people pay for them. Take the experience of the mother country. There the local taxation almost amounts to the Imperial expenditure.

Mr. MURRAY.—About half.

Mr. HUNTER.—The honorable member for Caversham says half; but I think I could show by figures that the one almost equals the other. However, the power of raising money in this way is given to these County Councils, and I have no doubt it will be exercised as far as it legitimately can be. I have no desire that property should be unduly protected. It has its responsibilities. All I ask is, that there should be a fair application of taxation. The honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Stevens) made a very excellent suggestion last night, and one in which I agree thoroughly—that the system of laying by a sinking fund should be abolished. It is a system exploded in all modern finance. It has been recognized for many years past, by all persons who know anything of finance, that it is a most cumbrous and useless proceeding to be borrowing money, and at the same time attempting to pay off the debt. It is a very complex system, and to abolish it would be attended with great advantage. I do not agree with what the honorable member for Auckland City East said on the subject. It is a matter which must be dealt with by this House, and must in some degree be optional with the holders of bonds. I do not, however, see that they would be prejudiced in any way, and think the change could easily be made palatable to them, while the country would be relieved of a very heavy charge. With regard to the reductions and savings which have been dwelt upon last night and to-day, I think we must take into consideration, in any course we may adopt, the fact that four months of the present year have already passed, and that there cannot be any saving in regard to that portion of the year. And then, if you are going to discharge a number of the Civil servants, you must give them at least three months' notice. That is as little as they have a right to expect. I know that a clerk in any merchant's office in Wellington would think himself very badly used if he did not get that amount of notice. So that seven or eight months of the present financial year have to be provided for before any reductions can be made. That is a matter which must be considered. Then there is this other question, which must not be lost sight of: That a great revolution in the government of the country is taking place. The provinces are to be abolished, and the provincial servants will have to be compensated, or discharged, or absorbed in the General Government service. It is absolutely necessary that these matters should be carefully looked into when we are talking of retrenchment. It is useless for honorable gentlemen to come down and say the Government must make this and that reduction. It is not in the power of the Government to do it. It is a matter which will have to be considered very carefully when the provincial departments are taken over. That will be a very good opportunity for consolidating the services, and making such arrangements that next year this Government, or whatever Government may be in power, will be able to come down and show clearly what is the entire expense to the country of the whole of the Government departments. Then we shall really be able to see our position, and know whether our expenditure is kept within our income. With regard to the credit of the colony, and the statements that we should not go on raising loans, I said the other night, and I repeat it again, that as long as we can show that our accounts are kept in the manner in which they are at present—as long as they are intelligible to people who will take the trouble to investigate them—we shall be able to get all the money we require. In the money article of the Times of the 4th August last, it was stated that the rate of discount was 1 per cent., and that money at call could be obtained at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Is it to be supposed then that the colony cannot get any reasonable amount of money year by year if it is willing to pay 5 per cent. for it? It is to me unintelligible that any one could hold such an opinion. Something has been said about the new loan, and in favour of raising one million instead of two millions. I am one of those who think that it would have been better for the Government to have taken power to raise two millions instead of one million. It is clear from the Financial Statement that Government lean upon the £800,000 of guaranteed debentures: that is to say, that they hold them in such a way that they can be hypothecated or disposed of if necessary. I do not think it is advisable that there should be over and over again a recurrence to that sort of thing. I think it is better we should directly take up sums of money as we want them, and keep these debentures as a reserve. We could not get advances on the £800,000 for nothing, and if the whole amount which it was first proposed to raise were raised, it would only cost some £100,000. I would suggest that Ministers should think the matter over, as it is one which may come under consideration again. I believe myself that the Government should take power to raise the £2,000,000, and use it or not according to circumstances and the state of the money market.

I will follow up what I have said about the Customs revenue by one remark: that presuming the Customs revenue for the following three quarters reaches the amount for the last quarter, and that is the average for the eight preceding quarters, it will then show a surplus of something like £5,000 over the amount which the Premier has taken credit for in his statement.

Mr. WASON.—I regard the resolutions of the honorable member for Nelson City, and also the suggestions of several other members, as of a most cowardly nature. I quite concur that the House is not in the humour to make reductions of a sweeping sort. Why, Sir, the honorable member for Akaroa, and the honorable member for Avon, who talk so loudly about reductions, would be the first men, if any reductions were proposed in the salaries of any official, to say, "Oh, don't; he's got a wife and four children," or a grandmother, or a great uncle, or something of that sort, "to support." Even when I proposed a reduction in the vote for the library, in which case there was no grandmother and no great uncle on whose behalf to exhibit a tender care, those gentlemen opposed it. I, for my part, listened with great pleasure to the Supplementary Financial Statement delivered by the Premier the other evening, a statement which was such an immense improvement upon the weary waste of words we were treated to at the beginning of the session. I listened to it with great pleasure, because it placed the financial position of the country in a clear, lucid, and straightforward manner, and I shall be quite satisfied if I, as one having a considerable personal interest in the country, and as representing a large section of the community, hear nothing more detrimental urged against the permanent condition of the country than was urged in the speech of the honorable member for Akaroa. The honorable gentleman went into the figures in a manner that did him credit, and argued them out in a way that seemed perfectly satisfactory to himself; but then the finances of a country are affected, as are the appearances of a city by the orbs that move above us, by the view you take of them. For instance, if an outsider were to come to Wellington and see the sun shining, the sky clear, and everything coulour de rose, he would say, "What a beautiful place!" But let him come here at two o'clock in the morning, when there is a south-east gale blowing, a drizzly rain, and the stars not shining, would he not say, "What a dirty, murky hole this is!" I do not like our financial system; I do not like these Treasury bills; I do not like the idea of subsidizing local bodies either out of land revenue or Consolidated Revenue; but I want to see something better placed before me before I cry down the system we have. These gloomy predictions remind me of an occurrence that took place at the first dinner I attended at a public school. The choice of joints was limited to a leg of boiled mutton, and one little boy cried out, in a shrill voice, "I don't like boiled mutton." "Very well," said the master; "you may not like boiled mutton now, but perhaps you will like it for tea; and, if you don't like it for tea, you may like it for breakfast." That is the view I take of the matter. We must be content with what we have got until we can get something better. I will not bark unless I intend to bite. For that reason I shall not expatiate upon the delinquencies of the Government, but will look upon the matter from a more rosy point of view than other honorable members have done. The honorable the Premier, contends that he has a surplus of £58,953 with which to terminate the year, but this sum will, I suppose, be equalized by the supplementary estimates down to zero. Now what we have to deal with is an estimated deficiency of £57,113 upon the Land Fund. I arrive at that amount by deducting the surpluses of the wealthier provinces, amounting to £89,480, from the estimated deficiencies of the insolvent provinces, amounting to £146,593, leaving, as I said, a deficiency of £57,113. That is a fair way to look at it. People in England do not recognize the petty local distinctions we maintain here. They simply look at the position of the whole country as it stands. Now, let us look at the position of the colony from this point of view. There is, it is said, a deficiency of £57,113; but let us give the cards another shuffle. Suppose the Government take over the departmental expenses, how will they stand? Let us deduct from their account the sums proposed to be given to Municipalities from the Consolidated Fund. They amount to £75,000, and adding to that the £48,000 to be paid to the Road Boards from the Land Fund, we have a sum of £123,000 which is fairly chargeable on property, for it is to be spent for the improvement of property and for no other purpose whatever. Now, if we deduct from that sum the estimated deficiency of £57,113, we have a clear surplus of £65,887. The Premier may, I think, fairly count upon that as a distinct surplus with which to commence the year; and I wonder if the honorable member for Akaroa would dare, even if he were Colonial Treasurer, to propose an income tax simply for the improvement of property. I do not object to a property or income tax provided it is raised for the purpose of doing away with some direct taxation; but the proposal to impose a property and income tax while a considerable amount of income is being expended at the present time is, I contend, absolutely preposterous. I do not believe, as long as there is a single acre of land to be sold, that the members of this House will submit to it. Then the honorable member for Akaroa went out of his way—I do not know what he was thinking of at the time—when he had the audacity to compare New Zealand to countries like Egypt and Turkey. Why, Sir, this is a country which has the finest climate in the world; a country which has gold fields, wheat lands, and natural productions in abundance; a country which grows wool second to none in the world; and yet the honorable member dares to compare it to countries such as Egypt and Turkey—downtrodden countries which—

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—If the honorable gentleman will allow me, I will set honorable members right as to what I said. He clearly misunderstands me, or wishes to misrepresent me.

I said that our lack of accumulated savings placed us in an analogous position; and I carried the comparison further by comparing this country to France, which had accumulated savings. It was solely that point—the accumulated savings—upon which the comparison was founded. I took care to say, and I said it after much thought, that I had no fear as to the future of this country—that its resources and the energy of its people would carry it through. When I spoke of the results that followed the want of accumulated savings I spoke of three countries—Egypt, Turkey, and Spain.

Mr. WASON.—I was certainly under the impression that the honorable gentleman compared New Zealand with Turkey and Spain. I am not so sure about Spain, but I am sure the impression left upon the minds of honorable members was that a distinct comparison was made—a sort of comparison that is often made by members in this House and generally throughout the country—with Turkey and Egypt. Why, Sir, I would like to know when Turkey ever borrowed one cent to be spent in reproductive works? Never. All the money they ever borrowed went to maintain harems, building ironclads, and raising armies.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—What about the Suez Canal?

Mr. WASON.—The Suez Canal was constructed by the French and English; but, for that matter, I would as soon see New Zealand compared to Egypt as to France. The honorable gentleman alluded to the hoardings—I think that was the term he used—and said that the indemnity incurred by the invasion of the Germans into France was paid entirely out of the hoardings or the savings of the people. That statement, if I may be allowed to say so, is at variance with every fact. The loans necessary to meet the expenses of the war and the indemnity payment were raised by France in every market in the world. I have been at the trouble to ascertain what taxes were imposed upon the French people during the war, and I find that upon alcohol the duty was raised from 90 francs to 150 francs per hectolitre, the duty upon strong beer was raised to 3 francs 60 centimes per hectolitre, and the duty on small beer was doubled. An annual tax of 60 francs was placed upon billiard tables. The duty on coffee was raised from 1 to 1½ francs per kilogramme; 60 centimes was placed upon every pack of cards; and upon every subscription payable to any club or society a tax was levied equal to one-fifth of the subscription. Many other fresh duties and taxes were imposed and levied, for the purpose of paying the interest upon the enormous loan which had been raised, I say, in every money market in the world. Now, I want to know how the honorable gentleman can possibly say that the indemnity paid by France was raised by private subscription amongst the people. Such a statement is absolutely and entirely at variance with fact. The money was raised by taxation, as those figures will show, if the honorable gentleman will only take the trouble to look at them. I, for my part, do not see the slightest necessity for alarm in any way whatever. It is perfectly true that the price of wool is lower than it has been for some few years past, but it has been lower than it is now. But besides wool, we have a large grain export. We are more dependent upon our grain now than upon our wool; and a large fall in the price of grain would tend more to create depression in this country than a heavy fall in wool. What was the state of affairs before grain became a large export? You could buy land anywhere for a mere song; but now you cannot buy it under £7 or £8 per acre. And look at our gold fields. Look at the Kumara rush. The gold fields generally are in a healthy condition, and this one rush will tend greatly to increase trade. Therefore I say this is no time to look at the dark side of the picture, and absolutely ignore the bright side. What surprises me more than anything else is, that during all the financial discussions we have had this session, all the rows, if I may use the term, have been created by honorable members representing those localities which have absolutely nothing to lose, but everything to gain, from the proposals of the Government. They have made such a row, indeed, that I am reminded of Lover's story of "Handy Andy," who dressed himself up in a woman's clothes, and, being assailed rather rudely by a rough boor, kicked up a great row about his virtue. That is the position of those honorable gentlemen who oppose the Government, who have nothing to lose and everything to gain. They try to obstruct the Government in every way in their power.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I did not intend to speak upon this question; but one or two remarks the honorable member for Coleridge has just made suggested to me that it might be well to remind the House to what cause the present condition of Egypt was attributable. I will read a short extract from a speech of a gentleman who was in a position to know what I think will be of interest to the House. Mr. Cave, in the House of Commons, stated the causes which led to the financial condition of Egypt, and, I think, some of them existed under a late reign in this country, and they have not altogether disappeared yet. After remarking that the Khedive of Egypt was a most intelligent ruler, and the resources of Egypt very great, Mr. Cave said,— "He is however obliged to work with the instruments which custom and tradition have handed down to him; to employ officials whom he cannot trust, and whose object is to enrich themselves as rapidly as possible, and so to insure against their uncertain tenure of office. Consequently he endeavours, as many others have done, to manage everything himself, which rulers of far greater bodily activity would entirely fail to do; and, though his knowledge of detail is extraordinary, it is difficult for him to see what it is everybody's interest to conceal. At the same time he is too prone to throw himself into the arms of hardly more disinterested foreign advisers, who press upon him schemes of various kinds, some good, some crude and ill-considered, but most involving heavy expenditure, an undue proportion of which goes into the pockets of those advisers who are often identical with, or closely allied to, the contractors who carry out the works, and the financiers who find the means. Loans at ruinous rates; bonds renewed on terms still more ruinous; supplementary contracts, in which, for obvious reasons, the Khedive is as much at the mercy of the contractor as the English Post Office used to be in respect of the great steamship companies when contracts were to be renewed—all these have eaten out the resources of the country. The Khedive is of a sanguine disposition, easily impressed with new ideas, which uncontrolled power and impatience of restraint lead him to realize without proper deliberation. Those around him are afraid to tell him the truth. It is most rare for him to find his ideas combated or corrected."

I think that even from Egypt, the much-despised Egypt, we might learn a lesson in this House. While I have the attention of the House I would like to congratulate honorable members on the happy period having arrived when the financial debate has culminated. It has been perfectly piteous to behold the wrapt countenances of honorable members who have been brooding over this debate for the last four months, and have now brought it to a birth. We have it before us, and what is it? We are told we heard great facts and truths from the honorable member for Akaroa, and I am sure that when we have had time to consider those facts and figures we shall thank him. But these are before us in the statements made by the Government. I think the honorable member for Christchurch (Mr. Stevens) threw out an idea by which we might get a sort of bastard stock, and that, I think, was the only original idea thrown out in this debate, which I, at any rate, had the ability to discern. What the value of the idea may be I am unable to say, but I think if we were to issue stock at 5 per cent. it would not be saleable at all in the colony at anything near par. The honorable member for Christchurch dissents. I do not wish to discuss the matter with him, because I have not the ability to do so, and I was merely alluding to the fact that this seemed to be the only original idea we had been favoured with. Of course I would not undervalue the exhaustive speech delivered by the Commissioner of Customs, which was a kind of third financial statement of the Government, and has been promised to be circulated amongst us, but I have not been able to get a copy yet. No doubt as far as the figures went it was accurate and comprehensive, but it did not at all set aside the fact that the electors of Otago were tempted last year with the statement that under abolition £150,000 would be available for roads and works in that province. The statement of the Government that this was based upon a provincial estimate does not excuse them for adopting it, for they ought to have looked into it and seen whether it was justifiable. The fact remains that Otago was tempted with a promise of £150,000, as the result of abolition, for roads and works, and instead of that being the case, the statement before the House shows that £1,200 will be available for six months. I hold that at the end of twelve months, instead of there being £2,400 to credit, there will be a debit of £20,000. Anybody who is at all aware of the present state of the land sales in Otago, and of the great amount of land looked up in leases and not bringing in much rent, must know that the estimate for land revenue for the next twelve months is fully £20,000 in excess of what the result will prove to be. If the Government congratulate themselves that any deficiency will be made up by the increased price going to be put upon the land, I can assure them they are making a great mistake. The increase in the price will stop the sale of land, and will not increase the proceeds by a single halfpenny. The settlers in the interior of Otago, without railways and decent roads, are struggling with difficulties that are almost overwhelming at the present price of land, and they cannot pay an extra price of 25 per cent. The effect of the Government proposals, if carried will be to reduce the land revenue of the province by a very material amount, and I venture to say that at the end of the half-year, instead of there being a surplus of £1,200, there will be a debit of £10,000. I did not intend to address the House upon the question, for we have had an exhaustive debate, and I am not at all able to cope with it.

Mr. GIBBS.—In seconding the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson City, I do so in all sincerity and without any regard to what the Government might think of it, and with the feeling that attempts to make reductions in Committee of Supply are, as far as my experience teaches me, very seldom successful. I believe the duty of making reductions can be better performed by the Government than by the Committee; but I have no idea of giving up the privilege which I, as a member of this House, hold, and which I am prepared to act upon by supporting the honorable member for the Thames in any reductions he may propose which I think will be expedient. I am quite prepared to support some reductions in these estimates; and the honorable member for the Thames will find me supporting him in any reductions which I think are reasonable and for the good of the country. The fact of these resolutions passing will not prevent—and I do not think are intended to prevent—the Committee from considering reductions in items. I simply rose to explain that seconding the resolutions will not in any way prevent me from supporting any proposed reduction that may be submitted in Committee.

Mr. THOMSON.—We have heard a very able speech from the honorable member for Coleridge, delivered in his best style. He commenced by telling us that he looked upon the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson and the proposed amendment of the honorable member for the Thames as cowardly. I understood him by that to mean that this House was not in earnest in its desire to retrench; and that sentiment was given expression to this afternoon upon two or three occasions, so that in this respect the honorable member is not original. What does it mean? It simply means this—and it is most cowardly to insinuate things without coming straight out with them—that because a number of gentlemen in this House considered that the honorarium they had been in the habit of receiving was not sufficient, therefore they were not in earnest in regard to retrenchment.

Mr. WASON.—I was not alluding to the honorarium in any way whatever. It was not before my mind.

Mr. THOMSON.—I accept the honorable gentleman's remark; but that will not prevent me going on with the observations I intended to make, because that statement has been repeated over and over again. Just suppose that this House had not been in the habit of receiving anything at all, and that the members had thought it was desirable they should receive something, and had taken steps to get, say £50 each put upon the estimates, the very same charge would have been made. It is altogether wrong and unworthy of members of this House, some of whom may happen to have very long purses and can come here and serve the country gratuitously, to be always insinuating such things. Then the honorable member for Coleridge referred to my honorable friend the member for Akaroa. He seemed to have a set speech made up, for he rushed headlong, as it were, at that honorable member. I was sitting beside my honorable friend yesterday when he spoke. Certainly his figures were not very interesting, and at times the House was very thin indeed, but I did not see anything wrong in the speech of the honorable member, and he did not appear to me to take such an extremely gloomy view of the country. He seemed to me to bring out nothing new. The facts and figures he gave have been before the House for the last four months. The honorable member for Coleridge would make us believe that there was nothing wrong: that wool might perhaps be a little down, but that we have grain to fall back upon. At the same time I noticed that he divided the provinces of New Zealand in a very remarkable way—into solvent and insolvent. That is not a very nice remark to go abroad, and if the honorable member wished to convey an idea as to the excellence of the financial position of the country, he should not have spoken of the provinces of New Zealand as solvent and insolvent. The honorable gentlemen then favoured us with his views in regard to a property and income tax. He told us that we must not have such a tax, and that there never would be such a tax until every acre of land had been sold. I daresay the honorable member was right. I believe that the large landowners would be very unwilling to agree to a property and income tax as long as there is any land to be sold. I may say I was sorry to hear that remark made by the honorable gentleman, because it shows that an endeavour will be made to sell the lands of the country, which will pass away without any population being settled upon them, into the hands of large capitalists. We were treated to a dissertation on the three countries of Spain, Egypt, and Turkey. I think the allusion of the honorable member for Akaroa to these countries was perhaps not so very happy. But, in what respect did he compare this country to Egypt and Turkey? The comparison was quite correct. It was this: that in these countries, as in ours, there is no accumulated capital. That is quite true. Where do we go to get our loans negotiated? Do we not go to the Home country? It is there we go for our money. It is quite true that there is no accumulated capital in this country, and the remark is true as regards Egypt, Turkey, and Spain. Then with regard to France. The opinion with regard to France is that there is any amount of money there,—that the people are extremely frugal and industrious. The system that prevails in France is a system of small holdings cultivated by the owners of these holdings. For centuries the French people have been hoarding up money. Everybody knows that. During the three years ending 1873, £171,000,000 was raised in France by taxation, and £200,000,000 was borrowed. Now, could the former amount of money have been raised except the people were extremely industrious, and had accumulated a large amount of savings? I cannot see very well the bearing of these remarks on the question before the House; at the same time, as these matters have been alluded to, it is only fair that members should reply to them. Now, to come to the real question before the Committee. It seems to me to be this: whether the estimates are to pass very much as they are, the Government in the meantime giving their assurance that during the recess they will go over these estimates and endeavour to reorganize the Civil Service and reduce the expenditure, or whether we shall take action this session with the view of reducing the estimates. That seems to be the question before the House. The honorable member for Nelson City says this: "Well, I have thorough confidence in the Government; I know that they will do what is right; I know that the moment our backs are turned they will retire to their rooms, and go very carefully over these estimates: they will consider the items that may be reduced, and they will come forward next session and show that large reductions can be effected. Therefore I for one am willing that the estimates should pass this session very much as they are."

MR. SHARP.—No.

MR. THOMSON.—I am glad to hear the honorable member say "No," because that is the way I understood him. What does the honorable member for the Thames say? He says we should begin now; we should endeavour to do what we can this session in regard to reducing the public expenditure. The honorable member for Port Chalmers proceeded to indicate the direction in which he thought that retrenchment might go even this session, so that I was a little astonished to hear him say that he intended supporting the resolutions of the honorable member for Nelson City. The honorable member proceeded to show how retrenchment could be effected. He said we could reduce the number of ports of entry. I put it to the honorable gentleman whether that could not be done this session as well as next session. He then directed attention to certain subsidies to steamers on the West Coast and steamers on the East Coast. Could he not take action this session to reduce those subsidies or to set them aside altogether? I think it would be as easy to do so this session as next session. Suppose we took action next session, three or four months' notice would require to be given, and such notice can be given as well this session as next session. Then, again, the honorable gentleman said that there were too many Native Magistrates in the different districts. I do not pretend to know very much on this matter, but I take it, on the authority of the honorable gentleman, that there are too many Native Magistrates. Surely it is as easy to clip the wings of those Native Magistrates this session as it will be during next session. Then there are the Volunteers. Why not strike that expenditure off this session? I believe that the item for the library is already struck out. Then, with regard to the Forests Department, I believe the Legislative Council have thrown out the Bill; but I hope the £10,000 will not be spent in the way proposed, as it might as well be thrown into the sea. I think the Government should take back these estimates and go over them carefully, and then indicate to the House the items in which they consider reductions might be made. I know quite well, from the experience I have had in legislative matters, that it is almost impossible to get items reduced or struck off the estimates as brought down, so that if the Government take back these estimates, we may reasonably expect that, if reduced, they would be passed by the House, and in this way a considerable reduction might be effected. I have given the honorable member for Port Chalmers, credit for what he has done, and I am now going to give the Government some credit. I believe that there is no person who has not some redeeming point about him. Now, I sometimes speak pretty hard against the Government, but when I say hard things against the Government, I believe what I say, or I should not say them. I believe the Government are sincere in the desire to reduce the estimates, to some extent at all events; but it is a matter to them of extreme difficulty. The Government are brought very much in contact with the Civil servants. Look at the conduct of the Government this session in respect to the Civil servants. The proper place for the Government to sit would be in the centre of this Chamber. They sit at a corner of the Chamber, and there happens to be a door where they sit, and the Civil servants are continually coming in, and the more important the question before the House the greater the number of Civil servants at the back of the Government benches; and what are these Civil servants doing when they are there? We see them continually whispering to the members of the Government. If any matter happens to be before the House of which the Commissioner of Customs has charge, then there is a gentleman behind him telling him what to say as it were, and how to answer the various questions that may be brought up in the House. Then, again, take the Minister of Justice. If there is a question before the House especially belonging to his department, we find one or two gentlemen at his back whispering to him, taking notes, and giving him information as to what should be said, and what information should be brought before the House to contradict the statements which have been made. And the same remark applies to the Premier. When he has charge of any matter, there are one or two gentlemen behind him whispering to him, and telling him what to say, so that there can be no doubt that the members of the Government are under, I may say, very great obligations to the Civil Service. We all know that the Civil servants have very great power in this House. They have influence with many members of the House, either of themselves or through their friends, so that it is a matter of very great difficulty to reduce their salaries. We all know that when we are under obligations to any person, we are, to say the least of it, actuated by kindly feelings towards that person. Take, for instance, the case of the Government and the present Agent-General. It is said that the Government are under very great obligations to that gentleman with regard to many matters that have come before the House. If we put all these things together, it must be very evident that it is a matter of very great difficulty to do anything in the way of retrenching the cost of the Civil service. I think one way of getting over the difficulty of all this prompting which goes on, and which is so great an annoyance to the House, would be for the Government not to sit so near the door. It would be a very great improvement if they would come to the middle of the House and sit, say, where the mace is now placed. They would not then be under so many obligations as they are now under to the Civil servants for information on all subjects, and we could hear them better when conducting the business of the House. It is really a matter of very great difficulty at present to understand what those honorable gentlemen say, some of them speak in so low a tone of voice. And then, in regard to understanding the figures they quote. We had a speech last night from the Commissioner of Customs, who gave us a great array of figures, which he said had reference to the Province of Otago; but, I think, it would be very difficult for any honorable member to say what was the nature of those figures. We are now speaking about retrenchment; but there is one little matter which would not cost much, and which would be a great assistance in enabling members to understand figures given in that way. We might invest in a black board, and then the Commissioner of Customs, instead of pronouncing in an inaudible voice certain figures with regard to Otago, could take a piece of chalk and write them down on the board; we might have some chance of understanding them. Then again, it has been said that we are not in earnest in regard to the subject of retrenchment. But I say that many honorable members have brought under the notice of the Government in years past the desirability of keeping down the number of officers. It has been pointed out to the Government that the day would come when it would be necessary to dismiss many of the Civil servants. There are many members in this House who have had experience of Provincial Councils, and who know that Provincial Councils have had to retrench more or less, and that retrenchment is a very difficult thing to carry out. We are just commencing it this year, and I think we cannot commence it one day too soon. But, Sir, it will not end here; it will not end this year; it will not end next year. The process must be a gradual one, and we may expect for years—I may say for many years—petitions coming up to this House bearing on the injustice and the apparent injustice that has been inflicted upon members of the Civil Service in consequence of their having been dismissed, or of their salaries having been unduly reduced. I do not think, therefore, that it can be said with any degree of truth that this House, as a whole, is not in favour of reduction. We have also had references to the present financial condition of the colony. I am not going to enter into that subject at all. I am not going into any critical address regarding the finances of the colony. That is a very difficult matter indeed, and one has really very little heart in trying to make himself acquainted with the financial condition of the colony, because the figures that are presented to us are for ever changing, and what we are told is the truth at one time turns out to be—I was going to say falsehood, but I will not say that, but fallacious, on another occasion. Last year a paper was circulated in this House showing that the provinces were going to be a great deal better off under abolition than they were under the old provincial form of government. I have not taken the trouble to turn that paper up in Hansard and the Blue Books, but I know it was stated that Otago would be many thousand pounds better off under the new system than under the old. But what do we find this year? We have had another Financial Statement, and I should like to know why the great expectations which were held out to Otago and the other provinces, that they were to be so much better off, have not been fulfilled?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, they have.

Mr. THOMSON.—I hold in my hand the Financial Statement delivered a few evenings ago. Perhaps the honorable gentleman has not seen it. I will refer him to page 7 of that document, on which appears a table in which it is stated that the great Province of Otago will have, for six months, out of the whole of her land revenue, a sum of £1,244 5s. 7d. That is the whole of the money available out of her land revenue for six months.

Major ATKINSON.—She would not have had one halfpenny if she had remained a province.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is a mere matter of opinion, and my opinion is the very opposite. My opinion is, that if Otago was allowed to go on as in the past, she would have a great deal of money to expend. We are told that the counties are to have the expenditure of the money. No doubt they are; but does any one think that the counties will tax themselves except for works in which the taxpayers in those counties are specially interested? The moneys which the counties raise will be chiefly required for the maintenance of roads and bridges, and all that the great Province of Otago is to have for half a year to open up the country for settlement is the princely sum of

£1,244 5s. 7d. When the honorable gentlemen on those benches make statements they say, "We will speak in round numbers; we will drop the shillings and pence, but the correct figures will appear in Hansard. I do not drop this 5s. 7d., for it would appear that the shillings and pence are now to be of great use. £1,244 5s. 7d. is all that is to be available for the great Province of Otago for half a year out of her land revenue. I wish to state that distinctly in the House, and I hope some of the people of Otago will hear of it, and know that the whole of her land revenue has been swamped except £1,244 5s. 7d. If you wish, Sir, to know what will be available for opening up the country for settlement in the Province of Otago during the year, you have just to multiply that sum of £1,244 5s. 7d. by two. That is the fruit of abolition. If there are any Centralists in Otago—and I believe there are very few—I think their eyes will be opened when they come to see that the whole of their yearly land revenue is swallowed up except £1,244 5s. 7d. multiplied by two. I am not going into the question of the counties. I did not speak upon the County Bill when it was going through Committee. But I have my own opinion in regard to this counties question, and that opinion, which is now generally shared in throughout the country, will be more and more entertained. I believe the whole thing is an absurdity—a farce; and the people will see that in its full force by-and-by. We are told that the counties can tax themselves and borrow money; but it should be remembered that the ratepayers have not a great deal of money in their pockets at the present time. Wool and grain, as has already been stated, are low in price; and we cannot expect people, in the present state of things, to tax themselves to any very great extent. Of course, the Government say they must tax in order to obtain the subsidy of £2 to £1; but where is the £2 to £1 to come from? Numbers of people seem to think it will drop from the moon, or come from some other mysterious source; but they will of course find out by-and-by that the £2 comes out of the same pockets as the £1. As I have already said, I am not going to make a critical speech; but I must congratulate the Government on having a very staunch supporter in the honorable member for Nelson City. We have been accused over and over again of wasting the time of the House; but I should like to know who has been wasting the time of the House during the last few days? We have come to the House on several occasions lately with the express object of getting through some particular business, and it has been intercepted just in the way the business has been intercepted this afternoon. We came here expecting the House to go into Committee of Supply; but instead of that, we are called upon to discuss a matter which has occupied a whole afternoon, and may yet occupy a considerable amount of time. The Government is responsible for this, although of course they will say, "Oh, we are not responsible or answerable for this discussion; we have had no connection with the honorable gentleman; we are as innocent as the babe unborn;" but the honorable gentleman is a supporter of the Government, and if they had asked him to withdraw it, he would without doubt have done so. I think the Government should be thankful that there is a party in the House which is really willing to assist them in reducing the estimates, for they have really a very thankless and difficult task to perform. Take the case of a factor in the management of an estate. If he wishes to reduce the expenditure on that estate, he can do so much more effectually if he has instructions from the squire to that effect; but without these instructions, the servants might feel disposed to argue the matter with him, and he would find impediments thrown in his way. Now, the Government can reduce the expenditure with a far better grace if they have the approval of this House, and there is no doubt that approval will be readily accorded. Some persons are of a more hopeful temperament than others, and it is well that it is so; but when we come to speak of the prospects of the colony at present, all must admit that they are not cheering. The honorable member for Nelson City admits this; and the Government, by accepting his motion, admit it. At the same time, we all feel hopeful of the country, and must have a firmer feeling in its future, if there is a Government at the helm who will administer the affairs of the country economically, and reduce the estimates so as to bring the expenditure within the ordinary revenue of the country.

Mr. LUSK.—I have no desire to prolong this debate, which has already extended beyond the limit which the honorable member who moved the resolution expected it would reach. At the same time, remarks have been made in the course of the debate, and more especially by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, which render it imperative that the members who constitute the Opposition in this House should express some opinion upon the matters which have arisen out of the discussion upon this motion. It is unfortunate that the resolutions were placed before the House in their present shape, and I am convinced that the Government, now that they have seen their effect, are of the same opinion. I have no doubt the Government would be glad to be excused from the act of the officious friend who has stepped in and done them this injury; because it cannot be pleasant to the Government to find themselves exposed to the close criticism which must naturally take place before such a resolution could be allowed to go to the vote. It seems to me to have been a work of supererogation on the part of the honorable member for Nelson City to bring forward such a motion. The temper of the House has been very plainly shown—it was shown last night—but that temper was not the temper attributed to the House by the resolution of the honorable member. It not only went so far as to say that we considered retrenchment exceedingly desirable; it went the length of saying that we intended to lend a hand ourselves in carrying out that system of retrenchment, which we thought necessary; and if the resolution meant anything, if the terms in which it was couched in the least degree represented what the honorable gentleman meant to express, it meant that those who voted for it should abdicate the functions with which they are charged, and leave them in the hands of the honorable members who sit on the Treasury benches. It meant that we were prepared, having tried on the previous evening to reduce the estimates and failed, to give up the struggle, and say, "By all means let the Government do the best they can between this and next year." For my part, I am not prepared to abdicate the functions I was sent here to fulfil. It is the duty of this House to consider these estimates in detail: that is why they are presented in this form. It is our duty to criticise them, and, if necessary, to cut them down. Conceiving that to be my duty, I do not thank the honorable member for Nelson City for expressing in my name any opinion contrary to that belief. But while I think the honorable gentlemen has entirely misconceived the temper of this House, I also think he intended to do the Government a service. He meant to do what they wished him to do; and as an ardent supporter of the Government, he wished to step in between them and the chance of prolonging the session by criticism of the estimates. If he had such an intention, the experience of this afternoon must have shown how completely his object has been frustrated. The discussion of the resolutions has occupied several hours, and has not advanced matters a bit. I do not think, however, that it has been altogether a waste of time. It is a desirable thing that members should be brought face to face with the question, whether they are prepared to effect reductions or not, and whether they see any desire on the part of the Government to make reductions. I confess that the remarks of the Premier do not at all impress me with the idea that he is prepared to effect any very great reductions in the cost of the public service; and that impression was gathered, not from the words he actually used, but from the careful manner in which he guarded himself against making any strong assertions in favour of reduction. He guarded himself, with a sort of proviso that it was very likely he would not be able to carry out his ardent wishes. That is exactly the position the honorable gentleman occupies. He would like to cut down the expenses of the country, but he would like to do it in such a way that the Government would not be rendered unpopular. In that respect he is, of course, like other Governments. No Government likes to render itself unpopular. But there are times when the part of the Government, and the part of any honorable member who takes the helm of affairs, should be to cast away those personal considerations which naturally lead a man to shrink from unpleasant duties, and to consider only what is necessary for the public welfare. I think that the honorable member, if he thought only of the present state of the finances of the colony, and thought not at all of the question whether the members of the Civil Service and the numerous friends of those members would like what he proposed to do—if he had had the singleness of purpose demanded by the present state of affairs—would not have been so careful to guard himself at every turn by suggesting that perhaps he would not be able to do very much after all. The time has come, if I at all understand the state of our finances, that there must be no half-measures in such matters as this. I do not say it is possible for a Government, at a moment's notice, largely to cut down the expenditure of the country; but I do not admit that the Government is placed in that position at all. It appears to me an absurdity to look upon this Government upon the Treasury benches as a new Government. I cannot admit it, although it has nominally a new head. I cannot admit that the Government is any other, for such purposes as this, than the Government that had been in office for many months. I ask, who are the members that form the Government now? Are they not practically the same men who have been at the head of the departments for a year past? Is it not the case that the Premier has been practically the head of several departments of the Government for more than a year, and that the Minister of Justice has occupied the same position for more than a year that he now occupies? Is it not the case that the Minister for Public Works is exactly where he has been for some years past? Is it not the case that the Native and Defence Minister is the same man as before? Then how can these honorable members come to this House and ask for an indulgence which might be claimed by a new Government stepping into their seats in the middle of a session? The thing appears to me to be a mere sham. If those honorable members will confess to this House that only when this session was far advanced had they any idea whatever that the finances of the country were in a bad state, that they had a conception that they were over-running their means, and that their expenses were greatly in excess of their income, and that such a knowledge was reluctantly forced upon them by the Opposition, we might be ready to say that their ignorance, however culpable, was some little excuse for the request they now make. I do not consider, from anything I have heard, that they are prepared to admit this. They have never admitted that they were in this state of blissful ignorance of the condition of the finances of the country. Up to this time they have said they knew all about it, and their eyes were open when they brought down estimates which were very much in excess of the revenue of the country. This prevents me from feeling any security in relegating this question to the Government, and leaving them to act upon these resolutions during the recess. The Government have, not for one year, but several years, gone steadily on in a career of increasing extravagance; and is it possible that this House and the country can with confidence hand over the matter to them, and say, "We are sorry you have hitherto been so extravagant, and that you have proposed to spend so much money, but we believe that, before next year, you will turn over a new leaf"? I have no confidence in anything of the kind. I believe that, if this House does not do it, the Government will not do it. I am confident of that in my own mind. When the Premier stated to-day that the Civil Service of the Colony of

New Zealand was the cheapest Civil Service in the world, and not only the cheapest, but the most zealous and efficient, that honorable member made it perfectly clear to every unprejudiced mind that he had not the very first element of mind which would induce him to apply those stringent measures which are necessary to bring our expenditure within our means and our income. I am certain of this, because if our Civil Service is the cheapest, we can hardly expect that he will greatly decrease that already very economical administration. The honorable gentleman, when he said that, was using a figure of speech, one of those poetical figures of speech which will not bear reasonable criticism. Sir, there is no country, I believe, in the world—to put it in the same general and brilliant way as the honorable member—where the Civil Service is so extravagant as it is in the Colony of New Zealand. I am not now speaking simply in poetical figures, for I have taken the trouble to ascertain whether what I am speaking was strictly true or not. I can assure the honorable member that if, instead of using those ready and broad figures of speech, he will take the trouble to investigate the facts, he will find that, instead of being the cheapest, it is the dearest Civil Service, I think, almost in the civilized world. Yes. The honorable member laughs; but I fear it is in this case the laugh of ignorance. If the honorable member knew what the facts were, instead of laughter, it would cause him some little shame to think he should have come to this House and made, in his position of Premier of this colony, an assertion so wide of the facts. The fact is, as I have already hinted, that the Civil Service is not only extravagant in proportion to our means, but it is absolutely enormously extravagant in proportion to the expenditure of other colonies and other countries. I have not had time, since the honorable gentleman made that assertion, to go through any large number of the financial statements of other countries. However, in every case in which I have done this, I have found my impression on this matter to be fully borne out by figures. I will give the honorable member one or two instances, since he appears to be now anxious to collect facts. I will give him the instance of the neighbouring Colony of Victoria. I think he will admit that Victoria, with a population double that of New Zealand, and its wealth enormously in excess of that of New Zealand, may very fairly be looked to as an instance of a country which could hardly be expected to have cut down its expenditure on departments to the very lowest possible limit consistent with efficiency. It is quite reasonable that a very wealthy colony should be more liberal in this respect; and it is equally reasonable that a colony struggling with difficulties, and admittedly in a bad financial position, should exercise very rigid and stringent economy. I find that in Victoria the expenditure of all departments for salaries is not only proportionately less, but almost literally less, than the expenditure of this Colony of New Zealand. That will, no doubt, surprise honorable members, and I will confess that the extent to which it is the case surprised me. But still the fact remains. I will take the figures I am about to use from the last Financial Statement of the Treasurer of Victoria. It shows, in regard to the Customs, a department the Premier was very anxious to know about, that the expenditure in Victoria upon all sorts of salaries connected with the collection of the Customs revenue is somewhat short of £48,000, and the expenditure for salaries connected with the Customs in New Zealand for the year was something more than £42,000. The revenue which is expected to be collected in New Zealand with that amount of expenditure is something short of £1,250,000, while Victoria will collect nearly £1,700,000.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—Ours is much cheaper.

Mr. LUSK.—I think, if the Commissioner of Customs will consider, he will see it is not much cheaper.

Mr. G. McLEAN.—There is only one port in Victoria.

Mr. LUSK.—Does the honorable member imagine there is only one port in Victoria? If he knows no more about the ports of Victoria than that, he is much less fit for the position of the Commissioner of Customs of New Zealand than I thought he was. There are far more ports in Victoria than one; and not only is that the case, but an inland branch of the Customs has to be kept up on the border between that colony and other colonies, which very largely increases the expenditure; and that is not the case in New Zealand. Such a remark, coming from the member of the Government specially charged with and who ought to be specially informed upon such subjects, is but one other thing that makes one feel doubtful about leaving these matters in the hands of the Government. In New South Wales, the expenditure on the Customs Department is £35,000; and for Customs salaries ours is £42,000. They collect, or rather did collect, until the other day, when they very largely cut down their Customs tariff, as much or more money than we can collect; and I presume the cutting down of the tariff could not have enabled them to greatly reduce the establishment. These two colonies, in collecting the revenue, set us an example we should do well to follow. I think the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government and the Commissioner of Customs will do well to learn the lesson: it may be of some use to them, and may induce them in future not to laugh when any suggestion of economy is made. I might go on to point out that the same statement is true with regard to the Postal and Telegraph Departments, and, strange to say, it is also true with regard to the Legislative Department. That may certainly surprise some honorable members, but it is the fact, that even in the matter of the Legislative Departments, those colonies, larger and more populous and very much richer than ourselves, do not expend so much money by a good deal as we do. I have not mentioned the honorarium paid to members for the simple reason that I do not know what it will be this year in New Zealand. I put that on one side, and take the mere cost of the establishment, and ours is the most expensive of the three.

Sir, I do not wish to weary the House by going at length into these matters. I merely want to impress this upon the House and upon the Government because I heard the Premier make a statement, which led me to think that the real position of the colony in these matters had never entered into his calculations. Now I find that the honorable member at the head of the Government has accepted, with a readiness which is almost affecting, the motion proposed by the honorable member for Nelson City. He is very willing that this House should say to him, "We really do not feel equal to reduce these estimates: we will be exceedingly glad if you will do it for us next year." There is no Government I have heard of that would not like to have this implicit confidence placed in it. Nothing can be more pleasing to the Government's feelings than that; but at the same time nothing can be more unfair, nothing can be more unjust, to the Government than to treat it in that way. I was really astonished at the shortsightedness with which the honorable member at the head of the Government was willing to accept a little momentary relief, a little ephemeral peace, at the hands of the House, to be undoubtedly revenged upon him next year when this House met, and found how little he had been able to do to fulfil the trust reposed in him. An honorable gentleman who has lately sat down drew a parallel between this case and the case of an agent for the proprietor of an estate; but if he had gone further and pointed out that, if the proprietor of the estate really wished large reductions to be made, he would indicate where these reductions were to be made, and so would make it a matter of duty on the part of the factor to reduce the expenditure, he would take the burden of responsibility off the shoulders of that factor, then he would have more fairly drawn a parallel between the case of the Government and that factor. If we see fit, as I trust this House will see fit, to ask that large reductions shall be made, not generally over all the estimates but in particular directions, such, for instance, as those already suggested by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, then the Government will not only be acting with the moral support of this House, but will have an immense amount of odium taken off their shoulders, which they would not have taken off them if they were to act as suggested by the honorable member for Nelson City. I am tender of the Government's feelings. I am very anxious indeed to take off from the Government that weight which might press somewhat heavily upon them, seeing that they are so anxious to tell us that they are a very young and inexperienced Government. I am anxious not to cast a severer weight on them than the necessities of this colony necessarily place upon them. I want them to feel their responsibility. I want them to feel as I do, that these are no times for half measures. They have admitted that we were in a very bad financial state—that the colony was in a state which we can scarcely characterize in the plain terms which might be used by those who had less interest in its well-being. I say, when we find ourselves in that position, and when the Government admit that position practically, I wish to see the Government really facing the difficulty, and joining with us heart and hand in reducing the expenditure within the limits of the income. That, I conceive, is the duty of the House. I conceive it to be our duty, in going through these estimates, not to be frightened at every turn by the Government saying, "We are really afraid that we shall not be able to carry out this reduction." I conceive that the duty of any Government is, above all things, to keep their expenditure within their income, and a Government that cannot keep its expenditure within its income is a Government that ought not to be on the Government benches. The reply made by the Premier, I believe, last night to the honorable member for the Thames, was one which showed a singular want of appreciation of the position which the Government should occupy. Already, on a former occasion, I stated that it was clear, from the Government's own figures, that they were in the position of having a large deficiency of income to meet their expenditure; and, if the honorable member for the Thames would select the amount which was shown by the Government to be deficient, and would request the Government to reduce their estimates by that amount, he would really do a thing which this House could not intelligently resist. This House, by passing these resolutions, will only be stultifying itself. This House must call upon the Government to reduce its expenditure within the limits of its income. I can fancy some honorable members saying that the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches are the only saviours of the colony for the next twelve months, and that therefore anything that would press too heavily upon the shoulders of the Premier must be avoided at all hazards. I shall be prepared, in common with other honorable members, to relieve the Premier of the unpleasant duty of cutting down the expenditure generally, by endeavouring in this House to reduce expenditure by every possible means, and supporting every proposal for a reduction where it is not absolutely certain that a reduction cannot be made, until we have left these estimates in such a position that the revenue of the colony will be able to meet its necessary liabilities. I think, if this is the outcome of the discussion that has taken place—if this is the feeling left in the minds of honorable members after hearing the discussion of this matter—the proposal of the honorable member for Nelson City (Mr. Sharp) will be by no means thrown away. We shall have, I believe, cause to thank him for having called our attention to our duty, although he called our attention to it in rather a left-handed manner. I can only say that it is not from any desire to oust the honorable member from the present proud position he occupies as head of the Government that I would cut down these estimates; but it is from a feeling that no honorable member of this House can honestly, and in a manly way, face his constituents, if he feels that he has to go back to them and say that he has voted estimates of expenditure in excess of the income which he expected to see the country receive this year. He would have to say to them, in fact, that he has been a party to an act of bankruptcy on the part of this colony. And no amount of glossing it over, no amount of talk of Treasury bills and financial arrangements, will make any real difference in that position, or will relieve any honorable member who places himself in that position from a degree of self-reproach which I, for one, would be sorry to have cast upon myself. Sir, I shall be exceedingly glad to see the honorable member for Nelson City withdraw this resolution, which I think is very uncalled-for; but, if he does not see fit to withdraw it, I, for one, will be prepared to vote against it.

Sir G. GREY.—I propose to add this amendment to the resolution before the House: "But that this House is entitled to know what Ministry is to be appointed during the recess, who are to compose it, and what offices they are respectively to hold, in order that, in voting large supplies for the public service, this House may know to whom the expenditure of those supplies is to be intrusted." I believe, in proposing this amendment, I am meeting the wish which has been very generally expressed in this House—a wish so entirely reasonable in itself. The House finds itself on the brink of a very great precipice. I would like to point out that, whether an actual arrangement was made or not between the Government and the honorable member for Nelson City, it is quite certain that the resolutions which he has brought forward, traverses the resolution I intended to move, and must have fallen in entirely with the views and wishes of the Government.

Mr. SHARP.—I wish to say in explanation that I was not aware of any resolution the honorable member was about to bring forward. The only person I spoke to was the honorable member for Akaroa, who told me that he was informed by the honorable member for Rodney that he was not certain whether the honorable member for the Thames was going to bring forward any resolution or not. I therefore thought it right to bring forward my resolutions.

Sir G. GREY.—I am entirely satisfied with what the honorable gentleman has stated: I am simply explaining my own position. I intimated my intention to bring forward a resolution. The Premier answered me, and said the Government would not accept it, but would look upon it as a vote of want of confidence—that it would be a Ministerial question—and that is the difficulty that has been avoided by the resolution the honorable member has brought forward. I was saying that the House stands really on the brink of a precipice, rather a remarkable one, and one of very great danger to the country. It must be seen by honorable gentlemen that by the time the next session arrives those funds which are still available must be almost if not entirely exhausted. The Premier says that during the recess they will consider the subject of the reduction in the expenditure. A similar thing was said last session. I do not myself place any faith in the promises made. Another thing is that the resolution I propose will show that we do not know upon whom such promises would be binding. Continually a new Government is presenting itself, or the same gentlemen in new suits of clothes. One time the Premier presented himself in the dress of the Colonial Secretary. The Minister of Justice retained the same garb that he has now. Others of the Cabinet changed their garbs. Now we have the Premier dressed in robes of another kind—appearing in another character. He says this Ministry is a new Ministry, and we have been told—positively informed—that during the recess, immediately we are got rid of, this Ministry is to be changed. We are told distinctly that the Native Minister is to go, that the Minister for Public Works is to go, that the Colonial Secretary is to go. How many more we do not know; and who are to take their places we know not. When this House meets next session, and its finances are in a much worse position than they are now, as must undoubtedly be the case, it will be infinitely more difficult to make reductions than it is at this moment. To meet our financial position at that time, we shall have to make much larger reductions than now, and we shall have to make those reductions in a less considerate and merciful manner; for we shall not have the funds then at our disposal to do that justice to those whose offices we may think it necessary to put an end to, which we should be able to do now. Not only that, but we shall probably then have to make reductions in public works which ought to be carried on—to make reductions of many kinds that we should very unwillingly have recourse to, and enormous unpopularity and odium must attach to the persons who carry out those reductions. These persons must be the successors of the Government on those benches, who intend to slip out of the thing. They cling to office as long as they have anything to expend, but they know that if they wish to cling to it longer they will not be allowed to do so, and they know perfectly well that there will be a great difficulty to get men to fill the places they hold, and face the difficulties that must surely accrue next year unless reductions are now made. I think that no more unfair proposal was ever made before to any Legislature as that which the Government are now making. They come down and avow that they have had at their disposal enormous sums of money—sums of money which no other colonial Ministry in times to which history reaches have had at their disposal. During that time they might have made reductions with the greatest possible ease; they might have remodelled the Civil Service, and prevented the difficulties in which we are now involved; and they took no steps to do so. Last session this subject was brought under their notice, and the same allegations were made then as now; but, during the recess which has just passed, no reductions, to any extent, have been carried out. During the four months that we have been in session no reconstruction of the Civil Service has been thought of or proposed; no single effort has been made to equalize the revenue and the expenditure. The same blind faith in money continuing to fall in has animated those honorable gentlemen from the first moment they took office to the present time. All who know anything of human nature must be well aware that all spend-thrifts who embark in a career of borrowing believe that they will always be able to borrow. That infatuation has actuated the honorable gentlemen who fill those benches, and I say that if they are allowed to hold office until next session without having carried out those reductions which ought instantly to be made, the country will be involved in much greater difficulty than it would have to meet if reductions now take place. Reductions at the present moment need not be of that painful character which they must hereafter be. I believe that in many branches of the public service reductions could be made which would inflict no injury on any individual. I believe those reductions would enable the public works to be carried on with greater efficiency than now—that there need be no cessation in public works; that no check need be given to the prosperity of the country; that we should insensibly glide into a new state of things, in which, our revenue and expenditure being equalized, there would be a fair prospect for the future of the country, and it might meet the crisis which is coming with the least possible difficulty. But I feel confident that, if we do not instantly begin to act upon that principle, great difficulties and reverses must take place. There are other reasons which make me think it is our bounden duty to have an explicit statement from Ministers as to what the constitution of the new Ministry is to be before we intrust them with further funds. I say this: that great discontent prevails amongst the Native population—much wider-spread discontent than honorable members of this House are generally at all aware of. I say that we entered into a pernicious system of buying off attacks, of bribing Natives to remain in peace, of assenting to cruel murders being committed in our very midst, and of continuing to pension and bribe the people who, on our actual frontiers, protect the murderers who have fled to them. I say disgraceful concessions have been made to people who were sheltering these murderers, and the inevitable result will be that, when these bribes cease, and the money to pay these bribes no longer exists, we shall be exposed to very great danger from these persons, whose acquiescence in our apparent state of peace we have purchased by means which we must all regard as disgraceful. That is another difficulty we have to meet, and it is encumbered with this further difficulty: that a great part of the Native discontent originates from the present Native Minister having purchased, while Chief Land Purchase Commissioner of the Government, large tracts of valuable land from the Natives for himself at most inadequate and unfair prices—purchases I believe not yet completed. In the province in which he lives there is yet a widespread discontent amongst the Natives, not only in regard to himself, but also in regard to other individuals, some of whom are now involved in legal proceedings with the Natives in regard to tracts of land. I say, if it is intended to put in the Government any individual implicated in such transactions, a great wrong will be inflicted upon the Native race. I trust the Government have no such intention. If they have, I say, not only will wrong be inflicted upon the Native race, but also upon the European race, by increasing the feeling which exists in the Native mind against some Europeans in this country, and so probably complicating affairs much more than at present. I believe the House is not generally aware that at this very instant bodies of Natives in arms in the Province of Napier are refusing to obey the orders of the Supreme Court, have taken possession of land in defiance of that Court, and risked lives in doing so. Officers have been sent up to stop these proceedings, but they have been obliged to retire without doing anything, and leaving the Natives in possession of the land. Therefore, I say, the greatest care must be exercised in the choice of the person who is to succeed the present Native Minister, if he is allowed to leave the colony before all these questions are cleared up. That forms an additional reason why we have a right to know who are to be the future Ministers appointed during the recess. The Government themselves have told us that they intend to make a change, and having made that announcement, they should have taken us into their confidence altogether, and completed their declaration. Therefore I rest my claim to the justice of this resolution upon two facts. Firstly, our financial position is such that we ought not to authorize the large powers contemplated by the resolutions proposed by the honorable member for Nelson City, Mr. Sharp, and the large funds being voted by this House in the form of supplies for the public service of the country—we ought not, I say, to trust such powers and such funds in the hands of persons with whom we are utterly unacquainted. What knowledge have we that the new Ministry will even be members of this House? As was done in the case of the Minister of Justice, a Magistrate may be taken from some bench in the colony and at once made a Minister. As was done in the case of the Colonial Secretary, some public servant may be taken from his office, and at once made a Minister, representing no one in the country, having no claim upon any constituency, no claim upon public confidence, and unknown to this House, which would not even have power to impeach him or to punish him; because the loss of his Ministerial office simply secures him a retirement on an ample pension. I say we ought not, with such a chance threatening us, to trust the powers we are asked to give to the Ministry until we are told who they are to be. And then, again, I say in the second place that, in the interest of the Native race and of the European race also, we ought not to trust the funds to be raised for the Native Department and the enormous powers over the Native race, given through the Native Lands Court, and by the power of appointing Native and European Magistrates in various districts, Commissioners of various kinds to witness papers, and by the power of appointing interpreters—I say we should not give an influence of that kind over a race entitled to our protection, and we should not give power of that kind in the interest of the European race to some unknown person, to be selected after this House is got rid of. Why not tell at once who the new Ministry are to be? Why should not the Government at once—as I trust they will do—acquiesce in this resolution, which I now propose, as an addition to the first resolution moved by the honorable member for Nelson City?

Major ATKINSON.—I have no desire to take up the time of the House, or to prolong this discussion. The House, no doubt, is weary of it, and desires to proceed with the business of the country: my remarks will, therefore, be brief. My only object in rising is to say that the Government intend to support the motion as originally brought down by the honorable member for Nelson. I need hardly say that they disagree entirely with the amendment proposed by the honorable member for the Thames. The House has already been made aware of the direction in which the Ministry will advise His Excellency during the recess; but of course neither the Government nor the House can be absolutely certain as to the changes that will take place, because His Excellency may see fit to call to his counsels some gentleman other than myself. That, however, is a matter which rests entirely with His Excellency. As to who are to be my colleagues, the House has already been informed that certain members of the Ministry have expressed a desire to retire from the Government; and, should I be in a position to name their successors before the end of the session, I will certainly do so. But no gentleman who might join me would have the confidence of the honorable member for the Thames. If I were to say that the honorable member for Clive had consented to take the place of the honorable member for Christchurch (Mr. Richardson), I do not think the honorable member for the Thames would have any greater confidence in my Government. However, I shall, if I am able, inform the House what changes are likely to be made; and, if I cannot, I shall have to ask the House to extend that confidence which it has already reposed in me, and I am perfectly satisfied that it will do so. If not, it will be the duty of the House to signify its desire, and I shall obey it.

Mr. HODGKINSON.—Before we agree to the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson City, I should like to have more information than I am at present possessed of as to the ability and the readiness of Ministers to carry out its objects. As to their ability, after what has taken place during the past twelve months, I am not strongly impressed with it. I cannot have forgotten that the present Premier, with his usual impetuosity, on one occasion last session threw a statement at the head of the leader of the Opposition, to the effect that the enormous saving of £370,000 was to be effected by the constitutional changes. The colony was to be that much better off. Now, however, that amount has altogether disappeared, and, this session, we are told that there is barely enough money to carry on the public service. As the honorable member for Clutha said, the figures of the Government go through so many forms that they become a perfect puzzle. They assume all the changing aspects of the kaleidoscope. So that I do not think the House can be satisfied as to their ability. Then as to their willingness. We have no evidence of that. On the contrary, their actions point in the opposite direction. We have seen them appoint a gentleman to the office of Agent-General in the face of a strong feeling in the contrary direction. That did not inspire me with much confidence in their willingness. There is one thing that would inspire me with confidence in their willingness, and that is, that they should bring down a self-denying Act to reduce their own salaries to the extent of 25 per cent. That would be conclusive proof of their desire to retrench; but, so far as I am aware, nothing of this sort is contemplated. For these reasons, stated very briefly, I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. Montgomery's amendment put and negatived.

The resolution was consequently agreed to.

Major ATKINSON.—I move, That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee of Supply.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I wish to take this opportunity of a full attendance of honorable members to call the attention of the Chairman of the Reporting Debates Committee and the House to an arrangement which is not satisfactory if it is the practice, and, if it is not the practice and is but an isolated case, where the debates of this House appear to be very much misrepresented. I am alluding to what appears in the last number of Hansard, No. 30. At page 3 in that number, it will be seen that the Education Boards Bill is brought under consideration. This is what appears:—

"The House went into Committee on this Bill. Clause 5.—Who to be members of Board."

Then it goes on to say that—

"Mr. J. E. BROWN proposed, That the name of Thomas Williamson Hall, Esq., be added to the 5th subsection of the clause."

The House will be well aware that that was not the proceeding as it took place in Committee. The proceeding in Committee was that the honorable member for Timaru moved that two gentlemen be added as members of the Board. Then the Chairman of Committees ruled that the names should be put separately, and that they could not be put separately unless upon a distinct motion. The honorable member for Tuapeka moved that the name of Mr. Belfield be not agreed to, and this motion was put to the House and carried on the voices. According to the report it appears that the motion was a substantive motion instead of an amendment. A great injustice is done to the honorable member for Timaru and others who voted against Mr. Hall's name being added, although they were anxious that he should be on the Board; they only voted against him because the House had previously negatived another name. I wish to draw the attention of the Chairman of the Reporting Debates Committee to this practice, for apparently it is a practice. I do not like to assume that the report is other than according to the regular way of reporting; but, obviously, if this practice is adhered to, great misrepresentation may be made to appear in the pages of Hansard. I therefore draw the attention of the Chairman of the Reporting Debates Committee to this matter, and I hope that in the interest of the true record of the debates of this House, he will consider the question as to whether it could not be remedied.

Mr. BALLANCE.—Do I understand the honorable gentleman to say that the report has been corrected by some of the speakers, or that the reporting staff have erred in reporting the proceedings incorrectly?

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I do not say that anybody has tampered with the report; I assume that it is the ordinary practice of reporting proceedings in Committee. If so, it is a practice which leads to evident misrepresentation.

Mr. BALLANCE.—I beg to call the attention of the House to an arrangement come to at the last meeting of the Reporting Debates Committee in reference to Hansard. It was then decided that all questions of privilege relating to the reporting the proceedings of this House should in the first place be referred to you, Sir. I thought that a very proper arrangement. If you think proper to take any action, you can refer to the Committee or to the Chairman for advice on the subject. This is the first opportunity I have had of mentioning this matter. I think it right to explain to the House that it was clearly laid down that all matters should be in the first place referred to yourself, and further action taken, if necessary. I am not prepared to say whether this report is correct or not, but the first thing that should be done in the matter is to communicate with the Chief Reporter. It is quite possible that an error might have been committed; but I take leave to say, and I am sure honorable members will agree with me in this, that the reports in Hansard are on the whole remarkably correct, and that there has been very little reason for complaint. It is an extraordinary circumstance that the report of this particular debate should be incorrect. I am quite aware that in several instances honorable members have taken the liberty of completely altering the character or meaning of their speeches in Hansard. I do not know that the reporting staff are responsible for this, but it has been the practice, and it has become far too frequent. I draw the attention of the House to it, that the matter may be fairly considered and some action taken in regard to it, because it is utterly impossible that these reports can be a fair record of what takes place in this House if honorable members are allowed to alter their speeches as they think proper when proofs are submitted to them. A case occurred the other day. The honorable member for the Thames, on the question of the Imprest Supply, stated that he hoped the finance of this country would fall into such a state that the Imperial Government would appoint a Commission for the purpose of investigating it. The honorable member for Avon made allusion to the statement, and I think severely criticised it. There is no reference to it in the published speech of the honorable member for the Thames, but there is a reference to it in the speech of the honorable member for Avon. It appears exceedingly absurd that the honorable member should make distinct reference to the matter, and that the honorable member's speech to which the reference was made contains nothing about it. I say that this sort of thing stultifies the Hansard reports. This statement was either struck out of the proof, or omitted in the report of the speech.

Sir G. GREY.—I think I did not strike it out of the proof; I have no recollection of having done so. My desire would be that it should be left in. I will look at the proofs, as I cannot imagine how such a thing could take place.

Mr. BARFF.—In dealing with the matter now before the House, I trust honorable members will not be led astray in regard to the special case which occurred in connection with the speech of the honorable member for the Thames. It is simply a fact, as has been said by the honorable member for Wanganui, the Chairman of the Reporting Debates Committee, that as a rule the reports of the debates are strictly correct, and I may say that the Hansard is strictly correct; but I trust that no action will be allowed to take place on the part of private members that will prevent Hansard from being a reliable record of our proceedings. I say that the last two numbers of Hansard have been privately tampered with by some person or persons in a most disgraceful manner: I say so most unmistakably. This has been done not only on the occasion to which the honorable member for Mount Ida has referred in connection with a portion of the debate being struck out in regard to Mr. Belfield's name. That is not the only case. Let any honorable member turn to No. 29 of Hansard, in which a question of privilege is reported, and let him compare the report in Hansard with the very accurate, although necessarily condensed report which appeared in the New Zealand Times of that question of privilege, and he will see whether some honorable gentlemen's names and their speeches have not been struck out of the report of that debate altogether. As a case in point, I may refer to the honorable member for Selwyn, Mr. Fitzroy. That honorable gentleman informs me that he had no slip of his speech sent to him. I remember distinctly the remarks that honorable gentleman made in regard to the Timaru Herald. I remember he said something to the effect, as reported in the morning paper and the two evening papers—I believe, at all events in the New Zealand Times—that it was almost absurd to take any notice of what was said by the Timaru Herald, as the people who lived near it took no notice of it at all; that those who knew it best thought it rather a compliment than otherwise to be referred to in it in terms of disapprobation. We find nothing of that in Hansard. The honorable member for Selwyn informs me that a proof of his speech had not been sent to him. I have been informed by an honorable member, whose name I do not recollect, that in a proof which he had received, the name of the honorable member for Selwyn did appear; that his speech was there reported. I wish to know why that speech and a certain speech made by the honorable member for Wai-kato, the Postmaster-General, were excised? I have compared these things very carefully, and other honorable members have done the same. I say that the House will be laughed at if we are to have an inquiry into a question of privilege, or rather two questions of privilege, the one following the other, which culminates ultimately in an apology which I would rather have thrown myself over the edge of the wharf than have made, if it is found that the apology appears in a form which seems rather to glorify the hero of the occasion than otherwise. These are things that really require attention. And then, what do we find? When we refer to the last number of the Timaru Herald, we find that the honorable member who made that apology laughs at us—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is now travelling beyond the question.

Mr. BARFF.—Sir, I am referring to a question of privilege in this interference with Hansard, which is supposed to contain a correct record of our proceedings, and I am trying to show that in the last two numbers these reports are not correct. I do not wish to travel beyond the question, and I trust that if I do, you, Sir, will check me. I was referring to the fact that, on reading the last number of the Timaru Herald in the library, I find a letter from "Our Own Correspondent" at Wellington, relating in a very condensed form—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I hope the honorable member will not now discuss a question of that kind.

Mr. BARFF.—I believe an honorable member speaking to a question of privilege is allowed a great deal of indulgence.

MR. SPEAKER.—No doubt, a certain amount of indulgence is allowed to an honorable member when speaking to a question of privilege; but his remarks should be confined to topics pertinent to the particular breach of privilege. I do not think it is at all in accordance with parliamentary usage that the honorable member should graft upon a question with respect to the reporting of the debates in Hansard remarks as to what may have appeared in the Timaru Herald.

MR. BARFF.—I was only endeavouring to save the time of the House, because the two things are so intimately connected that it must follow that, before many days, or perhaps hours, are over, we must raise this other question; and I was desirous of informing the House of the facts of the two cases as bearing one upon the other. That was the point of view in which I looked at it; and I think, in a question of privilege where two matters are bound up together, it would be better to take the two together rather than separately. If I am not at liberty to refer to this other question, I bow to your ruling, Sir. At the same time, I may say that a large number of members say that it is not their intention to let the matter drop. The whole is the outcome of certain publications in the Timaru Herald in connection with what took place on the particular occasion in the House. I now ask whether I shall be in order in referring to the first portion—that is, the outcome of the action of this House on the first question of privilege.

MR. SPEAKER.—I did not understand the honorable member for Mount Ida to raise this as a question of privilege.

MR. DE LAUTOUR.—I did not.

MR. SPEAKER.—I think, under the circumstances, the honorable member for Hokitika would do wisely not to introduce a question of privilege now. If there be a question of privilege, it would be better to raise it on some other occasion.

MR. BARFF.—The question will have to be raised as a question of privilege sooner or later; but as you, Sir, think it should not be raised now, I will not do so. I am not going to express an opinion as to whether the members of the Reporting Debates Committee are well acquainted with what reporting should be or not. I know the Chairman has had some experience, but of the other members I know nothing. I hope the Chairman of that Committee, at all events, and if there are any other persons on it who know anything at all about reporting, that they will take such action as to prevent the prostitution of Hansard to the basest purposes.

MR. PYKE.—If honorable members will listen for a moment to what I have to say, they will see that this debate is entirely unnecessary. There was no division whatever taken upon the question of whether Mr. Belfield should or should not be a member of the Education Board; and as the only reports of proceedings in Committee are those in which divisions take place, all mention of the particular matter referred to by the honorable member for Mount Ida was omitted from Hansard. There can therefore be no laches in that respect by the Hansard reporter, as he was only following the usual course. I trust that will satisfy the honorable member for Mount Ida.

MR. WAKEFIELD.—I think there has been something like an imputation cast upon me of having altered a Hansard report.

MR. BARFF.—I have not thrown out that imputation at all. All I say is that the reports have been tampered with. I did not mention the honorable gentleman's name at all. It might have been some other member.

MR. WAKEFIELD.—I can only say I have never seen No. 29 of Hansard at all. The remarks I made with respect to the question of privilege were, I suppose, reported, but I have never seen them. I beg to say, Sir, that I never alter the Hansard reports, and never intend to alter the Hansard reports while I am in the House. If the honorable member will go with me to the library, I daresay he will find all my proof slips unopened in my pigeon-hole. I never see or alter them, and what I said on the occasion referred to will appear as reported by the Hansard reporter, without having been seen or altered by me in any possible respect.

MR. FITZROY.—Having been specially referred to by the honorable member for Hokitika, I think it is right to say that, through some cause or another, I never received a copy of the report of my speech on the occasion referred to. I believe it was accidentally omitted, and consequently not sent to me.

The House then went into Committee of Supply.

CLASS I.

Executive Departments, £23,688 7s. 6d.

MR. REES called attention to the item "Under Secretary (also Clerk of Writs, &c.), £800," and wished to know why there was an increase of £100 in the salary of this officer.

Major ATKINSON explained that there was no increase in the salary. This officer had previously drawn £700 a year as Under Secretary, and £100 as Secretary to the Cabinet. It had been found necessary, however, to relieve him of the duties of Secretary to the Cabinet, and another gentleman was appointed to that office at a salary of £50, he holding at the same time the offices of Confidential Clerk to the Treasury and Secretary to the Premier.

MR. REES said that, under the circumstances, there was an increase of £50 at all events, and he objected to that. At the very time when the House was supposed to be making reductions, the Government were making increases.

MR. LUSK wished to know why other Under Secretaries received £600 a year, and this officer £800.

Major ATKINSON said this particular officer was the Under Secretary for the Colony, and had greater responsibility.

MR. MURRAY moved that the item, Registrar-General £550, be reduced to £500, the sum paid last year. There was no necessity for increase, particularly as the census was not to be taken so frequently as hitherto.

MR. REES observed that there were several increases under this vote. The first clerk in the Accountant's Office, the chief clerk in the Record Office, the chief clerk in the Receiver-General's Office, were each to get £25 more, and in fact there was a general increase of salaries. They had just placed a resolution in the hands of the Government declaring that the estimates should be recast for the purpose of effecting reductions, and ten minutes afterwards they were presented with proposals which went exactly in the reverse direction. He supposed the gentlemen who voted for the resolution would also vote for these increases.

Major ATKINSON hoped they would, because the officers alluded to were thoroughly efficient, and were paid less than they would get in any merchant's office.

Mr. SWANSON was rather inclined to doubt that. If these officers could get more in merchants' offices, they would probably be found there.

Mr. REES neither knew the officers nor their duties, but he knew that the finances of the country were in such a condition that it would be difficult to find money to carry on the Government. He hoped members who voted for the resolution of the honorable member for Nelson City would not make a sham of it.

Mr. BARFF was one of those who believed that true economy consisted in employing efficient officers and paying them a fair salary. If that course were adopted, they would get a superior class of men, who would be attracted to the Civil Service. It was not wise to strike £10 or £20 off the salaries of individual officers. The real question was, were there not a great many more Civil servants than there was any necessity for? They heard much about the expense of an official in an outlying district; but the fact was that officials in outlying districts were generally well looked after, and did their work well. If they did not, they were soon found out. It was in Wellington, where there was a whole host of officials, that the inefficiency of incapable officers escaped detection. His chief objection was directed to the army of officials to be found in Wellington, some of whom might easily be dispensed with. As to the Registrar-General, he would point out that there was one way in which the statistics might be rendered much more valuable and interesting, and that was by showing what amount of work was done by the Civil servants, instead of telling them how many hens and ducks there were on a man's property.

Mr. LUSE pointed out that these estimates really proposed an increase of £4,181 in this one department, in spite of all their talk about reductions and retrenchment. He desired to know whether this was caused by the abolition of the provinces and the taking over of officers, or by an increase of the salaries of those officers who had been in the department for a series of years. In the latter case, he should strongly oppose the increase.

Mr. FITZROY asked the Premier to explain the item for extra clerical assistance.

Major ATKINSON said extra clerical assistance would be required during the year, in consequence of the changes about to take place. An additional number of clerks would be necessary to carry on the proper administration of the departments.

Sir G. GREY said that if the House considered its position, it would decide that no increases should be made. He believed that a complete reform of the departments was about to take place, and no increases should now be made. Next year Ministers would come down with their recommendations complete, and the House would see that the officers and the service were well paid.

Mr. MONTGOMERY thought the Ministry were the best judges as to the number of persons to be employed. He would ask the Premier whether he thought a reduction could be made in the expenditure of these departments during the recess, because the estimates showed an increase of 20 per cent.

Mr. REYNOLDS thought it should be left to the Government to decide what reductions were to be made. These duties required to be performed by competent men, who must be paid fairly. To keep good men, they must pay good salaries. A good deal of the work done by extra clerks was in preparing returns asked for by members of the House, many of which returns were unnecessary. He would repeat a remark he had made previously, that he did not think many members were in earnest about retrenchment. For instance, the honorable member for the Thames had on the previous evening moved that a salary should be increased.

Sir G. GREY said the resolution by which the House had decided that a reduction should be made by the Government during the recess was only carried that evening. The matter had now entered upon a new phase, and that was why he objected to increases being made.

Mr. REES thought the honorable member for Port Chalmers was not in earnest as to retrenchment, for he seemed willing to agree to increases up to £100 being added to salaries. As to the Committee not deciding upon the items, he understood the Committee of Supply was appointed to vote supplies, and that supplies were not voted beyond the money the colony had to pay away. By the estimates, honorable members would see there were increases of £50, £100, and £200 a year. As representing a constituency which never asked anything from the House, which had to pay heavy taxation and got nothing back in exchange for it but the performance of the mere ordinary functions of the Government, he had a right to see that no increased burdens were placed upon that constituency to pay increased salaries, when the House had ordered that a decrease should be made in the cost of the public service. Instead of a reduction the Government had made an increase of £4,000 in one item and £10,000 in another, making an increase in the class of £14,000. If the increases were voted, with what grace could the Government set to work during the recess to cut down the salaries again?

Mr. BRANDON thought this was the usual sessional discussion upon the estimates. Honorable members always said there should be economy, and the departments should be inquired into; but it was always left to the Government, and they came back next year with matters in the same condition. He saw no means of altering that state of things, unless the House appointed a Commission to inquire, during the recess, into the working of the various departments, and report to the House next session.

Major ATKINSON said there could not be any great reduction in this class; but there were several items in it which he thought could be reduced.

Mr. MONTGOMERY would like to know whether the Government would agree to a reduction being made in this class now. He was averse to granting increases; for it would be difficult for Ministers to make decreases afterwards.

Mr. ROLLESTON was of opinion that the only way in which Parliament could get control over these departments would be by Act. The Civil Service Act of 1866 was not found to be very workable, especially in the organization of a large department like that of Public Works. If they had an Act, he would be perfectly satisfied to leave it to the Government to decide what reductions could be made in accordance with the Act or regulations under it. It did seem a very sad thing that the time of forty or fifty persons should be taken up in discussing whether £25 should be taken off the salaries of public officers. This matter should be dealt with not by a Commission, but by the Government. It was not in the administrative departments that they could expect retrenchment. They should begin retrenchment by striking off the luxuries in which they indulged, by doing away with subsidies to steamers running up and down the coasts, and expense of that nature. It was beneath the dignity of the House to interfere with small departmental details. They would lose tenfold on every reduction they made on the salaries of officers, and would create discontent in the public service. Although the Civil Service was not in the condition it might be in, no beneficial effects would result from reducing the salaries of deserting officers by £10 or £20—men who were struggling to maintain themselves and their families in a position of respectability.

Mr. W. WOOD concurred in the opinion that there were a great many costly luxuries that might very well be dispensed with—amongst others, the Native and Defence Departments. He thought the Civil Service might be considerably reduced. If fewer men were required to do the work, they could do it; but they would naturally expect extra salary for the extra duties they were called upon to perform, and that would be the time to consider any increase. There were many ways in which the present large expenditure on the public service could be curtailed to a very considerable extent, and the indications of a falling revenue rendered it absolutely necessary that they should seriously consider the desirability of retrenchment without further delay.

Mr. REES did not propose to reduce the salary of any officers. If the Government were obliged to keep up an enormous Civil Service, let them tax the country to meet the expenditure, and let it not be met out of borrowed money.

Mr. SWANSON moved, That the item "Under Secretary (also Clerk of Writs, nil), £800," be reduced by £100.

Mr. LUSK said it would be inconvenient to reduce item by item. If they attempted to do so, the result would be that no reductions would be made. He thought it would be better if the honorable member for Newton would propose a reduction of the total sum. He had taken considerable trouble to find out what increases had been made in the different departments, and he found they were as follow:—In the Colonial Secretary's, £1,047; in the Treasury, £1,150; in the Audit Office, £725; and in connection with the Registrars of Marriages, Births, &c., &c., £840; and in other Executive Departments, £369: making a total of £4,181. If the honorable member for Newton would withdraw his motion, he would move that the total be reduced by a sum of £2,000. That could easily be done, because he had taken out what appeared to be increases on account of provincial work, which did not amount to half the total increase. The honorable member for Port Chalmers said that the extra clerical assistance was required chiefly to supply returns called for by the House.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. LUSK accepted the assurance of the Premier that it was not so, and the estimates showed it; because the chief amount for extra clerical assistance was in the Treasury, from which very few returns had been furnished.

Mr. SWANSON would withdraw his amendment with pleasure in favour of that of the honorable member for Franklin.

Major ATKINSON would like the Committee to understand distinctly that a very large amount of work would be thrown on the departments by the changes that were coming into operation. The whole arrangement of the elections for the counties, and all the correspondence with the Road Boards, would have to be conducted by these departments. If the Committee made a large reduction in these estimates, he would point out that there would very likely be no saving at all, because the work must be done, and, if necessary, the expenditure must be charged as unauthorized.

Mr. REES thought that, under those circumstances, it would be of no use making a reduction. As the Premier said that the work would be paid for out of the unauthorized expenditure, it was clear that, whatever vote the Committee came to, the money would be spent.

Mr. SWANSON did not think that was likely to occur. There were persons watching these votes just as sharply as the Premier or the Committee, and, if those who were expecting to get this money found that the Government could say to them that they had not got it, they would be quite ready to do the work for the salaries they now got. The whole of the time of these men was at the disposal of the Government, and he knew that a great many of them did very little. No doubt some of them were overworked; but there were a great many who, even during the session, went about doing almost nothing at all.

Mr. LUSK had had experience of pressure being brought upon him in the smaller affair of the Provincial Council, and he had found it very wholesome and very advantageous to himself to be able to say that no money had been voted. He could then, with good grace, refuse many things that otherwise he might not have refused. His knowledge that the Council had refused so much money made it a matter of very great anxiety to him to keep the expenditure within the income, and he hoped that the vote by the Committee on this occasion would have the same effect upon the Government.

Mr. Murray's amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GIBBS noticed that, under the head of "Extra clerical assistance," the sum proposed to be voted was £1,085, and there were other amounts for provincial services to something like £800. That would make very nearly the £2,000 which the honorable member for Franklin desired to reduce the vote by. He would point out that the extra clerical assistance would no doubt not be employed if not absolutely required, but the rest must be voted.

Mr. MONTGOMERY did not see how the work could be done for anything less than was put down here, and the effect of reducing it would be to put the expenditure on the unauthorized expenditure. The whole increase upon the salaries was about £500, and the Committee might vote to reduce that; but he could not vote for a reduction of £2,000 in the face of the statement that it would be put upon the unauthorized expenditure, if necessary.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY thought it would be a pity to force the Government into a vote that they must disregard. If the proposed reduction were £500, he would vote for it, because it would show that the Committee wanted retrenchment, but he could not vote for a reduction of £2,000.

Mr. BRANDON said that, if the vote were reduced by £500, and Ministers then found that they could not carry on the work at a less amount, they would fall back upon the unauthorized expenditure. The real question was this: "There are so many clerks in the different departments; can you reduce the number of the establishment or not?" It should not be a question of reducing salaries. Men must be paid for their work, and of course, the longer they remained in the department, the more salary were they entitled to. If the Government could not carry on with the proposed reductions, and had to fall back upon the unauthorized expenditure, it would be perfectly absurd to reduce the vote. The House could not now do otherwise than refer the matter to the Ministry to see what retrenchment they could carry out. If next year they said they could not make a reduction, and the House was not satisfied with that statement, then the House must, as before suggested, appoint a Commission to inquire into the whole matter.

Mr. BURNS thought it was generally a mistake for the House to meddle with salaries at all. If they could manage to get rid of some officers, that would be the proper course. He noticed that some of these salaries were added to, while others were reduced, and he would like to know from the Premier why that was the case. There was, for instance, a new appointment in the Colonial Secretary's office, of an Assistant Under Secretary, who received £450 a year, while the Chief Clerk, who last year received £350, was put down this year at only £250.

Major ATKINSON explained that the officer who was to receive £450 this year, received £350 last year, when he was Chief Clerk. Through the unfortunate illness of the Under Secretary, this officer had performed the duties of Under Secretary during a great part of the year, and performed them in a very efficient manner. No appointment had yet been made of Clerk under him. It might be necessary to make this appointment when the provinces were taken over; and, if it were so, the appointment would be given to some provincial officer.

Mr. ROLLESTON hoped, when vacancies occurred, that the first opportunity of filling them would be given to deserving provincial officers.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes.

Question put, "That the vote be reduced by £2,000;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY moved, That the vote be reduced by £500. He had no desire to see the clerks underpaid; but if the amendment were carried, it would be a lever in the hands of the Government, and would assist them to reduce the vote, which he believed they could do without any difficulty.

Major ATKINSON said he would not object to the amendment if there was a distinct understanding that the £500 should be taken off the whole vote, and not off any particular salary.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY desired that the £500 should come off the whole vote, as stated by the Premier.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as reduced, £23,888 7s. 6d., agreed to.

Stamp Department, £4,185, agreed to.

Printing Department, £12,423 10s.

Mr. MANDERS asked explanation as to the sum of £1,172 for the binding branch. He noticed that under another class there was a sum of £800 for binding and printing. As regarded the department generally, he did not think it was so well managed as it might be, but perhaps that was owing to the want of accommodation. He hoped the Government would give the matter consideration during the recess.

Major ATKINSON said that the £800 was for binding Haward and other books for the General Assembly, as well as for some printing.

Mr. BARFF noticed, with respect to the Printing Committee and the Reporting Debates Committee, that those gentlemen who had any experience in connection with those matters had been carefully excluded from those Committees except in one or two instances. On the Reporting Debates Committee there was only one gentleman, the honorable member for Rangitikei, who knew anything at all about reporting. Any one else who had any practical experience about it was excluded, and he believed the same applied to the Printing Committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS would inform the honorable member that the Printing Committee had nothing at all to do with practical printing. The duty of that Committee was to ascertain and advise Mr. Speaker what documents should be printed.

Mr. SHEEHAN pointed out that there was an increase in this vote, and would like to ask why it was necessary.

Major ATKINSON said the printing had very greatly increased, and that had, in part, been caused by honorable members having so much printing done.

Item, £12,423 10s., agreed to.

Store Department, £1,150.

Mr. HAMLIN asked for an explanation as the vote Inspecting Officer, £200.

Major ATKINSON said the officer had not yet been appointed. It was thought that one might have to be appointed to take over stores belonging to the provinces; but no appointment would be made unless it was necessary.

Item, £1,150, agreed to.

Geological and Meteorological Department, £3,835.

Mr. MURRAY would point out that in addition to this sum there was the salary of the Director of Geological Survey, £800, which made the total £4,135. He would not move for a reduction, but would point out to the Government that this was an item on which they might, he thought, make a reduction of 50 per cent.

Major ATKINSON would undertake that the matter should be looked into very carefully, to see if any reduction could be made.

Mr. BARFF thought the item should be struck out altogether, because the department was worse than useless. He was sure the country did not benefit in any way by the meteorological observations. It would be far better to hand over the Museum to the people of Wellington, and let them take charge of it as the people did in other parts of the colony. He did not believe the Museum was in as good a state as it was six years ago. As the general public received no benefit from the department it should not be kept up, and he would move that the whole of the item be struck out.

Mr. REYNOLDS said the proper course would be to vote the item this year, on the distinct understanding that it would not be voted again. The Government should take the matter into their consideration during the recess, so that they might place the Wellington Museum on the same footing as the other museums throughout the colony.

Major ATKINSON hoped that the Committee would not confound this vote with that for the Wellington Museum. The vote was for the geological survey of the colony, which was a matter of immense importance both to the mercantile community and for scientific purposes.

Mr. BARFF admitted that the department might be of great use to the colony if properly conducted; but it had not benefited the colony to the extent of a single sixpence.

Mr. SHRIMSKI would support the vote. He trusted the Government would see their way to handing the Museum over to the town of Wellington. This was done in other parts of the colony.

Sir G. GREY would not like to see this department done away with altogether. No doubt the honorable member for Hokitika felt somewhat disappointed at not being able to carry his motion for the establishment of a School of Mines. He (Sir G. Grey) would like to see a School of Mines established in the colony in connection with this department.

Mr. BARFF did not oppose this item in consequence of not being able to carry his motion for the establishment of a School of Mines. He had previous to that matter being dealt with indicated his intention to oppose this Geological Department, which served no useful purpose whatever. The opinions given by the officers of the department had been found to be erroneous, and had not been verified by absolute facts. He pointed out on one occasion, that there were indications of the existence of gold in the outskirts of Wellington. The head of the department said that it was impossible; but in less than twelve months afterwards gold was found in Baker's Hill. A School of Mines would be of far more advantage to the colony than having a number of men who did not practically comprehend the science which they professed to understand.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE said the existence of the Geological Department was almost an absolute necessity, and would be of immense value to the country at large. There was a first-class analyst, who had already rendered good service to the country. The department would be of very considerable advantage in connection with agricultural as well as mining pursuits; and he would support the vote as it now stood.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought the opposition to this vote was of a somewhat unreasonable character. It was necessary that this department should be maintained. He thought the Government should strike out the item for the Museum. Wellington should support its own museum, as Auckland, Canterbury, and Otago supported their museums.

Mr. SWANSON would like to be informed of the benefits received from the money expended on the Geological Department. He knew that the progress of the Thames Gold Field had been retarded through the head of the department telling a number of gentlemen in Auckland to keep their money in their pockets, as there was no gold at the Thames. That foolish advice had the effect of preventing people with money assisting the miners and others to develop the resources of the Thames.

Mr. REYNOLDS said his remarks applied to the Museum. The honorable member for Newton asked what there was to show for the Geological Department. He could tell the honorable gentleman that the people of Otago had had experience of the gentleman at the head of the Geological Department, and had not received anything for an expenditure of some £16,000; nor had any benefit been received by Otago for his services since he had held a position in Wellington. At the same time, he did not argue that it was advisable to do away with the Geological Department; but he did say that the Museum should be handed over to Wellington, and be dealt with in the same way as the museums in other provinces.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought the test of the usefulness of the Geological Department was not whether it was correct in having stated that gold would be found in a certain place or not. He looked at the general results, and at the great knowledge of the geological features of the country which had been obtained through this department. The head of the department had visited his district, and the result was that a large amount of useful information with regard to the geological formation of that part of the country was obtained.

Mr. W. WOOD did not think the Committee should too readily arrive at the conclusion that this department was not conferring good on the country. He would not like to see the vote struck off the estimates; but when honorable members considered the many substantial advantages which Wellington received from being the seat of Government, it was fair for the House to consider whether the expenditure for this department should take place in Wellington, or whether it would not be judicious to remove the whole establishment to a place where these officers would be in communication with other gentlemen who could greatly assist them in their work. It would be far more complete, and would cost much less, if removed to Dunedin, where the Professors of the University could consult with these gentlemen, and where a School of Mines might be established in connection with the department.

Item, £3,335, agreed to.

Electoral Department, £4,895.

Sir R. DOUGLAS wished to ask, with regard to the Returning Officer for Marsden, whether the Government would be willing to have him removed to a more central part of the district than that at which he now resided, which caused great inconvenience to the people.

Mr. BARFF wished to ask a question with regard to the Revising Officer for Nelson, Marlborough, Canterbury, and Westland, whose salary was £225. The Government would remember that at the commencement of the session he made a complaint to them in regard to the conduct of this gentleman at the Revising Court in Westland. He wished to know now whether the Government had taken any steps to correct the mistake then made, or whether any communication had taken place on the subject with the Judge who presided over the judicial district.

Major ATKINSON was not aware that the honorable gentleman had made any charge against this officer; but, if he would do so in the usual official course, it would be attended to.

Mr. SEYMOUR wished to call attention to the same item. In former days, the Revising Officer in Marlborough was a gentleman of the legal profession living in the province, and the business was conducted properly; but since the office had been held by a gentleman who performed these duties all round, it had been very different. On two occasions, the Court was not held on the appointed day. On the first occasion, it was not held till two days after, and consequently a great many persons were put to much inconvenience in attending on the day appointed, and finding that there was no Court. On the last occasion, in June or July, the Revising Officer arrived in Marlborough once more on a day later than that appointed, and held no Court at all. He wrote to him (Mr. Seymour), saying he had arrived, but that having to proceed immediately to Nelson, he could not hold a Court. Consequently a number of persons who put in their claims to vote were not placed on the roll. Would it not be better to revert to the old system? Persons could be found in the province who would perform the duty properly, and then the Courts would be held at the proper time.

Major ATKINSON said that the Judges appointed the Revising Officers, and not the Government. The Judge had been communicated with, and was endeavouring to make other arrangements, in order that what the honorable gentleman complained of might be remedied.

Mr. W. WOOD called attention to the item for the Returning Officer for the East Coast, who also received from the Native Department £350; travelling expenses, £50; telegraphic, £25; and postal, £10. This gentleman had evidently many duties to perform, as it appeared on the estimates before them; but he had been in Wellington in the early part of the session, and he (Mr. Wood) was surprised to find in the evidence he gave before a Select Committee, that there were no white people in his district and very few Natives. This officer must therefore have comparatively little to do, and it was evident that if there was much to do he was not the man to do it. He was strengthened in this opinion by the fact that this gentleman remained in Wellington for six weeks or two months after he was wanted.

Mr. BOWEN pointed out that the honorable gentleman was not referring to the right officer. This was not the Returning Officer for the East Coast Maori District.

Captain MORRIS said that all the Committee had now to consider was £20 for this officer's duties as Returning and Registration Officer. All the other money he received belonged to other departments, and should not be considered at that time.

Mr. SHEEHAN was glad to see that no sum was put down for a Returning Officer for the District of Rodney. During the last elections this officer not only canvassed the district against him (Mr. Sheehan), but also appointed deputies in ten or twelve polling-places from known supporters of his opponent. He felt it a very hard matter to fight under these circumstances, but time had softened his feelings. However, all he wished to say was that the practice of appointing these petty Returning Officers in remote districts was not a good one.

Mr. BOWEN asked the honorable member to mention the name of the Returning Officer he had referred to.

Mr. SHEEHAN said the name of the gentleman was Murray. He was also Coroner for the district, and that might account for his desire to "sit" on him (Mr. Sheehan). Under the circumstances he had narrated, the officers necessarily became partisans; and the fact that a person had to fight the Returning Officer as well as his opponent was somewhat disheartening. There was one other point he wished to refer to, and it was this: At present the Revising Officers heard objections, but allowed no costs in cases where the objections were frivolous. A man might challenge a whole electoral district, and, although it might be proved that the objections were utterly groundless, not one penny of expenses was allowed. People were objected to; and when they got to the Revising Officer's office, they were laughed at by the objectors. This was a state of things which should be remedied.

Mr. BARFF said the case he had mentioned was infinitely worse, because the Revising Officer ruled that the objector need not even be present.

Mr. LUMSDEN said there were several Revising Officers on the estimates, for whom no salary was provided. He supposed, however, that the necessary items would be found elsewhere. What he wished more particularly to call attention to was, that there were circumstances connected with the last election for Wallace which were very improper. He chanced to be a voter in that district, which was between forty and fifty miles from Invercargill; and when he went to record his vote, he found that the polling-booth was not opened until three-quarters of an hour after the hour specified by law. In England, that would have been sufficient to invalidate the election, and he mentioned the case in order that the Government might see that proper officers were appointed; the neglect in this case arising, he believed, from the fact that the Returning Officer was a deputy and not a paid officer. He had an objection to these unpaid irresponsible officers.

Major ATKINSON said there were many districts where the Resident Magistrates were appointed Returning Officers, without additional salary.

Captain KENNY, in furtherance of the remarks of the honorable member for Wairau, pointed out that no provision was made for the district of Pelorus, which was peculiarly situated. It would be very difficult for the settlers to attend the Revising Court either at Picton or Blenheim; and he trusted the Government would make the necessary provision.

Mr. W. WOOD mentioned the case of a Returning Officer on the East Coast, who displayed his partisan proclivities by giving a Maori £5 to obtain votes, with instructions to be given to his confrères as to how they were to act.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said there were two sides to the case cited by the honorable member for Rodney. If expenses were given against the objector where the objection was bad or frivolous, they ought to be given, on the other side, where the objection was good.

Mr. BOWEN reminded honorable members that the Revising Officer had power to give costs where the objection was frivolous.

Mr. REYNOLDS said there was no doubt an alteration in the law was required. The honorable member for Dunstan was objected to on one occasion, and was put to some trouble to prove his right to be on the roll, although there was no doubt as to his possession of the necessary qualification. There were a number of other cases in which an energetic Good Templar figured prominently as an objector: in fact, he had objected to any one who was known to drink a glass of beer, and put many people to a great deal of unnecessary trouble. He hoped the Postmaster-General would come down with an amendment of the law next session.

Mr. PYKE said he certainly was objected to, as stated by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, but he was not struck off. He was, however, dragged out of a sick-bed, and compelled to appear at the Revising Court to sustain his claim; and when he got there, the person who objected said he knew nothing about the matter—that he had been instructed by some one else to object to the name! The matter was treated with a laugh, almost a sneer; and when he applied to the Revising Officer for costs, he looked upon the application as a joke. But a great many citizens of Dunedin were actually struck off, not because they were possessed of no qualification, but because they did not appear at the Revising Court to answer to these objections; and they did not appear, because the notice was insufficient. An advertisement was inserted in the newspaper, but a notice should be sent to each person objected to; and the objector, if he failed to make good his objection, ought to be compelled to pay fair costs.

Mr. GIBBS said the rolls became encumbered with a great many names that had no right to be there, and it was only right that facilities should be afforded for their removal. He thought the way in which the duties of the Revising Officer were performed required attention. In his district the Revising Officer advertised that he would attend on a certain day, but he failed to do so. The revision took place in Nelson, and was a formal thing altogether: in fact there was no revision at all. The names of those who were objected to were struck off because they would not travel so far to attend the Court.

Mr. SWANSON was of opinion that if costs were allowed, it should be seen that the objector gave security for their payment, otherwise a man who was not worth a farthing might be put forward to object, and it would be in his power to cause people to travel a long distance to prevent their names being struck off. Security ought to be given for payment of costs should the objection not be sustained. The whole matter of making objections really wanted carefully looking into. His own impression was, that it would be better to burn all the electoral rolls and begin anew upon another basis.

Sir G. GREY thought the remarks used by some honorable members were very strong arguments in favour of manhood suffrage; and he would claim the support of certain honorable members in favour of the Manhood Suffrage Bill he was about to bring forward.

Mr. REES believed that the whole system of registration in the colony ought to have attention paid to it. He thought there was not a single district in which there was not a great amount of dissatisfaction, because some few persons were left on the roll who ought not to be there, and some were struck off who were entitled to a vote. The consequence was that at every election dummies voted to a greater or less extent. Perhaps the granting of manhood suffrage would stop this to some extent; but if the Bill of the honorable member should not be carried, the Government ought to pay some attention to this subject, which struck at the very existence of the House. In cases where the votes polled by candidates were nearly equal, the gentleman who came to the House might not be the representative of the bona fide return of the district.

Item, £4,895, agreed to.

Crown Lands Department, £7,172 5s.

Mr. MONTGOMERY wished information as to the first item, which showed an increase of £100, and the amount for contingencies was raised from £200 to £1,200.

Major ATKINSON said the salary in the first item had not been increased. Until this year, £400 had been charged upon loan, but now the amount was divided, and half was placed on these estimates. The sum for contingencies had been increased to £1,200, because the department would now be reorganized, and he was not in a position to say what appointments would have to be made. Therefore it had been necessary to take the vote in the form proposed. The other sums included in the item were consequent upon taking over the provinces.

Item, £7,172 5s., agreed to.

Inspection of Machinery, £2,000.

Mr. FITZROY desired information as to the duties of the Chief Inspector. He had been informed that the boiler lately taken out of the steamer "Taranaki" was in a very dangerous state, and he would like to know why the inspecting officer had not attended to his duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the Chief Inspector this year received the same salary last year, but he drew £50 from the Native Department. This officer had to inspect steamers trading on the coast. The state of the boiler of the "Taranaki" had come under the notice of the Government, and they were making inquiries about it. He might say the department was rather more than self-supporting.

Item, £2,000, agreed to.

CLASS II.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

Department of Justice, £1,175, agreed to.

Crown Law Office, £2,160.

Sir G. GREY would like to know whether the Bills were drafted by legal gentlemen or not.

Major ATKINSON said that some Bills were drafted by legal gentlemen who were not Government officers. Bills had been drafted by one of the Commissioners of Audit.

Mr. REYNOLDS thought the office of Parliamentary Draftsman ought to be filled up. He objected to the Government giving out Bills to be drafted.

Sir G. GREY agreed with the honorable member for Port Chalmers. The drafting of some of the Bills introduced this session was of an extraordinary character. There was an understanding come to last year that the office of Parliamentary Draftsman should be filled up, and they were told that a Draftsman would be appointed in the colony.

Mr. BOWEN said the Government had endeavoured to obtain a Draftsman in the colony, but it was found impossible to get a competent person in the colony for the sum voted.

Mr. REES said the member of the legal profession would not be required to spend all his time in drafting Bills. A Parliamentary Draftsman would not be required, unless the laws were to be consolidated. A Commission would have to be appointed for the purpose, and the Draftsman would do the work under their instruction.

Sir G. GREY would like to know what effort had been made to secure a Parliamentary Draftsman in the colony. It was not a proper thing to employ Civil servants in work of this kind. It was not intended that they should be employed at such work. Their whole time should be given to the discharge of the duties of their office.

Major ATKINSON said it would have been a relief to the Government, if they had been able to find a suitable person for the position of Parliamentary Draftsman. The appointment was one of importance, and the Government felt that they could not be too cautious in the matter.

Mr. LUSK said the Government had not been fortunate in the selection of the person who had drafted some of the Bills submitted to the House this session, as they were, to say the least, rare specimens of drafting. It would be found that the Courts, six months after the passing of the Acts, would be called upon to decide as to the meaning of the words contained in those Acts. That arose from the system of not employing legal gentlemen to do legal work.

Item, £2,160, agreed to.

Supreme Court, £8,292 10s.

Mr. REYNOLDS drew attention to the item, under the head of Otago, of "Sheriff (also £150 from Native Office), £350." There was not the slightest necessity for a Native Office in Otago; and as the Sheriff had very little to do, he would suggest that he should supply the place of the additional Resident Magistrate that was required in Dunedin, and also attend to Native matters, without receiving any additional salary.

Mr. BOWEN promised to look into the matter, and see whether the proposed amalgamation of offices could be effected. He would endeavour to make that arrangement which would be most economical, and, at any rate, find work for the officer in question.

Mr. LUSK said there was an increase of about £900 in this section, which he observed was mainly in the first item, "Expenses of Circuit Courts and Court of Appeal, £1,600." Last year the amount set against this item was only £900.

Mr. BOWEN said the vote of last year had to be exceeded, and the amount now set down was calculated on what had been found to be necessary.

Mr. W. WOOD said that the sum allowed to the Sheriff and Resident Magistrate of Invercargill for travelling allowances—namely, £25—was absurdly low, considering the extent of travelling which had to be performed. This officer had to go to the Matura, to the Bluff, and also to Riverton and Winton constantly, and he hoped the Government would see their way to do him justice in this respect, as he had been a long time in the service.

District Courts, £5,720.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked information as to the item of £600 for the travelling expenses of Judges. It was an increase.

Mr. BOWEN said the vote was really necessitated by the travelling expenses incurred by the Judges. A considerable portion of it was for the expenses of Judges travelling in the gold field districts of Otago and Westland.

Mr. LUSK drew attention to the sum of £150 for the District Judge, Nelson. That officer was also Resident Magistrate, and this appeared to be an increase.

Mr. BOWEN explained that, when the Judge of the Supreme Court was removed from Nelson, it was found desirable to appoint the Resident Magistrate, who was a professional man, to act as District Judge, and he was given a small increase in his salary for performing the extra duties.

Mr. REES said the arrangements for the sittings of the District Courts in the Province of Auckland were not at all satisfactory. At the Bay of Islands neither the Supreme Court nor the District Court sat, and many cases which were beyond the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrate had to be taken to Auckland, a distance of 150 miles, causing great inconvenience, loss of time, and expense. In criminal cases, the expense of taking prisoners and witnesses to Auckland was very serious. If it was arranged that the District Court should sit there with extended criminal powers, it would be highly advantageous to the district, and would be a great saving, for the cost of conveying prisoners and witnesses would be ten times as great as the travelling expenses of the Judge. The same remarks would apply to Tauranga, which had been greatly neglected in this respect.

Mr. BOWEN thought the complaint of the honorable member was very reasonable. He was aware there was a difficulty in respect to the Bay of Islands and Tauranga, and he would endeavour to see how far it could be met by a Judge travelling to those places.

Sir G. GREY said if the consideration of that department had not been hurried upon them at that hour of the morning, he would have pointed out that he believed, by making an alteration in the constitution of the Supreme Court, and adding to the number of its Judges, the District Judges might be done away with altogether, and a considerable saving might be made. The inconvenience in reference to the Bay of Islands, Tauranga, and other similarly-situated districts would by such an arrangement be got over, and justice be brought within the reach of every man. At that late hour, he would not enter upon the matter; but he was confident that very great improvements might be made.

Mr. HISLOP noticed that there was nothing on the estimates for the Clerk of the District Court at Oamaru. When the Clerk of the Resident Magistrate's Court was appointed to act as Clerk to the District Court, it was understood he would receive some additional remuneration. He thought the constitution of the District Courts might be altered so as to make them of much more service to the country. It had happened that in Invercargill the Supreme Court and the District Court had sat within a day of each other, and there was only one case in each. He also thought sufficient jurisdiction was not given to the District Courts; and it would be a great advantage to the public generally if they were given the option of bringing a case into the Supreme Court or the District Court within certain limits.

Mr. BOWEN said, with regard to the Clerk of the District Court at Oamaru, there was great justice in the claim made, and a small sum had been placed on the supplementary estimates for him. It was proposed to alter the districts of the District Courts in the South. Since the railway had been open to Timaru, he had been in communication with the Judge of the Supreme Court at Christchurch, who would probably be able to hold quarterly Courts at Timaru. If that were done, it would obviate the necessity of a District Court Judge residing there, and it would give the present District Court Judge more time to attend to the Courts further south.

Mr. SHRIMSKI would like to know why Oamaru, a town much larger and of a great deal more importance than Timaru, should not also have sittings of the Supreme Court held there, instead of having only a District Court.

Mr. BOWEN did not think there was any question of dignity in the matter. It was a question as to how the Courts could most conveniently and advantageously be held at those places.

Mr. SHEEHAN hoped the Government would endeavour to carry out the intentions of the Act of 1872 or 1873, to the effect that only members of the legal profession should be appointed to District Court Judgeships.

Mr. BOWEN explained that during the last two years all the Judges appointed to the District Court had been members of the legal profession.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought, if increased powers, both in civil and criminal cases were given, to the Judges of the District Court, it would be a great saving to the country. The amount saved in the matter of the travelling expenses of witnesses would be something enormous. Some three or four years ago a District Court Judge was appointed at Napier, and there was also a Resident Magistrate at the place. But it was understood that the District Court Judge should also do the duty of Resident Magistrate. However, a promise to that effect which had been given to the Committee had not been carried out, and for a time both officers remained. Ultimately, the Judge of the District Court, who had really nothing to do, was removed. The position of the matter at present was this: The gentleman who now held the office of Resident Magistrate intended to resign his appointment at the end of the present session, and the whole of the legal profession in Hawke's Bay were anxious that some competent person should be appointed to act both as Resident Magistrate and District Judge. If that course were adopted, it would be a great saving to the country, and would prove of very considerable convenience to the residents of Hawke's Bay.

Mr. BOWEN stated the Government hoped to be able ultimately to make such an arrangement, and inquiries had been instituted with a view to the course alluded to by the honorable member.

Mr. REES would point out to the Minister of Justice that the extended powers under the District Courts Act had not been extended to Judge Fenton in respect to Auckland, the Thames, or Waikato. He could only try cases in which the amount sought to be recovered did not exceed £100; and he could not try any criminal cases. The Minister of Justice would do well to consider this matter, because the profession had noticed it upon several occasions. The absence of the extended powers he referred to was greatly felt in the out-districts, such as Waikato and the Thames.

Mr. BOWEN said, if the extended powers had not been granted to Mr. Fenton, it was in consequence of an oversight. Mr. Fenton had not applied for any further powers, or they would have been granted; for he was certainly a Judge to whom any necessary powers would have been given if application had been made.

Mr. LUSK asked explanation with reference to the word "fees," set opposite the bailiffs in some districts, and he noticed that a sum of £150 was put at the bottom of the list for "Bailiffs' fees as above."

Mr. BOWEN said there had been an endeavour as much as possible to get rid of the system of paying bailiffs by fees. Most of them were now paid by salary; but it was found at present impossible, in some cases where there was not much work, to fix a salary which would be equivalent to the work done; and bailiffs, in these cases, were paid by the fees recoverable upon the processes they served. The £150 set down would, it was estimated, cover the whole of these fees. The fees had to be voted in a lump sum, because when received they were paid into the Treasury, and had to be repaid to the bailiffs.

Item, £5,720, agreed to.

MAPS.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN desired to move, without notice, That the maps of the counties lying on the table of the Council be removed, because they were not correct.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said that the honorable member would require to give notice of his motion.

The Hon. Mr. ACLAND drew attention to the fact that there was another plan on the table which the Council had declined to receive.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN said he wished to make this motion on that account. The maps he referred to were incorrect. The other day he was refused permission to place a map on the table, on the ground that it was incorrect.

The Hon. the SPEAKER ruled that the honorable gentleman should give notice of his motion.

WELLINGTON DEBTS BILL.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that in the year 1871, the Provincial Government of Wellington found itself in financial straits; and in that year there was passed the Wellington Debts Act, which authorized the raising of a sum not exceeding £85,000, for the purpose of discharging certain liabilities of the Provincial Government which were specified in that Act. The bonds were made payable at a date not later than the 31st December, 1876—at the close of this year. The security which the province offered for the aid the colony afforded them in this matter, was a block of land in the Manawatu district, containing 229,000 acres. The Act of 1871 provided that in case the proceeds from the sale of this block of land were at any time insufficient to meet the payments for interest and principal on account of the loan, the deficiency, whatever it might be, should be made a charge against the Province of Wellington. At the close of the year 1871, an arrangement was entered into with a body known as the Colonist's Aid Society, for the purchase of a block of land in the Palmerston district containing 106,000 acres of land, at a price of 15s. per acre. The history of that transaction would be found recorded in the Appendix to the Journals of the House of Representatives for 1872, paper D. No. 11. Bills for the payment of the purchase money of that block were given by the Colonist's Aid Association, the terms of the maturity of these bills being respectively—for one-third of them, the 1st April, 1877; for another, the 1st April, 1879; and for the other third, the 1st April, 1882. The transaction being concluded, and the bills handed over to the Colonial Treasurer, the provincial authorities felt themselves absolved from further liability on account of "The Wellington Debts Act, 1871." Since that time, payments had been received on account of the proceeds of that block amounting to nearly £16,000, and these sums, as they were received, having been invested at interest, had accumulated, and now amounted to nearly £18,000. The currency of the debentures terminating at the close of this year, before the securities provided for the payment of them matured, it had been found necessary to make provision for a further borrowing, for the purpose of repaying the debentures when due, and in order to give time for the maturing of the securities and the obtaining of funds necessary for the complete discharge of the debt, about which, he was glad to learn, there was little doubt. It was proposed to apply the £17,000 which was now in hand to the discharge of debentures to that amount, and to borrow the difference between that sum and the £75,000 at present outstanding to meet the coming liability; and that was the authority which was proposed to be given by this Bill. The fact of a reduction in outstanding liabilities in this way was so new, and would, he was sure, be received with so much satisfaction by the Council, that he thought no difficulty would be found in securing its assent to the arrangement which was proposed to be made. The currency of the securities which were proposed to be issued was fixed, and the 4th clause provided,—

"The bonds, debentures, or other securities issued under the authority of this Act, whether the same shall be an original issue or a re-issue or renewal, shall be made payable in the amounts and in the manner mentioned in the Schedule hereto."

Honorable gentlemen would observe that the first instalment of the bills was due on the 1st of April, 1877, and they would note that the time fixed for the payment of that first instalment had been extended by arrangement for another year, and instead of the year 1877 the year 1878 had been fixed for the first payment. The necessity for that had arisen from the plea of the Association that the opportunity of employing their people upon public works in the neighbourhood, which they expected to have had afforded to them, had not been given to them at a sufficiently early period as to place them in funds to meet their engagements as they had expected. The currency of the bonds which were proposed to be issued to the extent of £58,000, would terminate at the respective dates specified in the schedule. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the honorable gentleman would perhaps be kind enough to inform the Council whether this money was to be raised in this country or in England.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said the peculiarity of the arrangement would prevent its being done out of doors. It could be conveniently arranged by the investment of funds at the disposal of the Government; so that the whole transaction would be carried out in the colony.

Bill read a second time, considered in Committee, reported without amendment, and read a third time.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL BILL.

* The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that between the time of the introduction of the system of responsible government into this colony and the year 1866, the Attorney-General was a political officer, a member of the Executive Council and of the responsible Government. During that period, inconvenience was from time to time felt, owing to the fact that, among elected or nominated members of the General Assembly, there were few gentlemen of the legal profession who were qualified to hold the office of Attorney-General. So that, as a matter of fact, the working of the constitutional system was greatly impeded by the circumstance that it was found difficult for parties on either side always to be sure that they could obtain a gentleman of sufficient standing and high qualifications willing to occupy the position of Attorney-General in Parliament. For that and for other reasons, in the year 1866 it was decided that the Attorney-General should cease to be a political officer, and to be a member of the Executive or of either House of the Legislature. From that time until within the last few years, the office of Attorney-General had been filled by one gentleman who, at the end of that long period of service, was raised to the highest judicial position in the colony. The office of Attorney-General had not since been filled. There was an understood pledge given by the Government, in another place, that, before the office was again filled, the Assembly should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion whether or not the time had arrived when the office of Attorney-General might again be made a political office. This was the question which was embodied in the Bill of which he was now moving the second reading, and which had already passed in another place. It provided for the repeal of the Attorney-General Act. It proposed that the Governor might appoint an Attorney-General, and it also contemplated the possibility of his being or not being a political officer as circumstances might render desirable, and as, in point of fact, the will of the Assembly itself would practically determine. It provided, finally, that nothing in the Act should authorize the appointment of more than seven members of the Executive Council.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said there were two distinct points of view from which it was desirable they should consider this Bill, and to both of these considerations he would venture to invite the attention of honorable members. The first consideration was as regarded the political influence attendant upon the change proposed in the Bill; and the second was the effect of the proposed change upon the judicature of the colony. The latter was the more important of the two considerations that weighed on his mind in the decision he had come to with regard to the Bill; but before noticing it, he would first refer to the other point. In considering the political influence of the proposed change, it was fortunate that they had not to fall back upon mere theory, but had the advantage of having proved in the past the working of both systems. For the last ten years the Law Officers of the Crown had not been political appointments in the ordinary signification of the term, and the consequence was, that when it had been necessary—and it had very frequently been necessary—to call for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon any particular point, they had with the greatest confidence received that opinion, and he did not know a single occasion on which such opinions had been called into question. It could not for a moment be doubted that, had those gentlemen been political officers, or had the Attorney-General for the time being occupied a ministerial position, the respect and confidence in which those opinions had been deservedly held would not have been entertained for them. It had been said that every lawyer who conducted his own case had a fool for his client. The same simile showed that it was impossible for any man, however clear his intellect, to be entirely uninfluenced in the consideration of a case in which he was immediately concerned—it was impossible for him to proceed to its consideration without more or less of bias; and if the Law Officers of the Crown held political offices, it would be impossible for them, in the consideration of the various matters to which their attention might be invited, not to labour under the influence of this bias. They could not but regard the various questions referred to them more or less under a political bias. Their opinions would not be so reliable as would otherwise be the case, and the opinions that they might from time to time give would not be received with the same amount of confidence. They had an illustration of this in what had only very recently taken place. There was no doubt whatever that the honorable gentleman who recently filled the office of Attorney-General was one of the shrewdest lawyers in the whole community; and yet there could be no doubt that his judgment became so far biased by the political position he held, that the opinions he gave were not such as they had reason to believe they would have been under other circumstances, and had he been altogether free from that bias. Certainly his brethren of the legal profession had almost unanimously arrived at a different conclusion to that which the Attorney-General did. Then, as regarded the past, it might fairly be assumed that it was desirable that those whose opinions were from time to time called for, as the Law Officers of the Crown, should not labour under the bias which must necessarily attend those holding political offices. At the same time, the experience of the past showed that where the office became political, the judgment became more or less biased, and it was impossible to rely upon the decisions given under such circumstances as would otherwise be the case. But his main objection to this Bill was based upon what would be its consequences upon the judicature of the land. It was recognized in England that the Attorney-General had a presumptive right to a vacant Judgeship or Chief Justiceship. In England there was, perhaps, very little objection to that rule. The Attorney-General of England must be a man of mark, not only as a politician, but in his profession; and though he might not possess all those qualities which most eminently fitted men for judicial positions, yet it was certain that he would possess to a very great extent the confidence of the profession to which he belonged, and that he would be, as a lawyer and as a man, above the ordinary run of his peers. He thought, however, that the system which prevailed in England could not with advantage be introduced into this colony. Nevertheless, whenever in the colonies the Attorney-General was a political officer, that system was introduced and was acknowledged. Only recently, there was a vacancy in the Chief Justiceship of South Australia; and upon this plea, that the Attorney-General had a prescriptive right to that position, the Attorney-General of the day was appointed by the Ministry. Within the last few days they must all have seen in the telegrams a notice that in Victoria public attention was being directed to this same subject, and that strong feeling was being elicited in favour of some change. In the strife of parties, it was not only possible, but a matter of extreme probability, that cases might arise where persons occupying the position of Attorney-General would be entirely unfit for the high and important office of Judge or Chief Justice of this land. If persons of such a character were appointed to such a position in consequence of their political influence, they might depend upon this, that the character of our judicature would be lowered, and there would not be for the future the same confidence in its integrity, in its high character and impartiality, as there had been in the past, and as it was desirable should be maintained in the future. Before the Council did away with the existing law, it ought to provide for this case—it ought to provide how a Judgeship or the Chief Justiceship should be filled up in case of a vacancy arising. He hoped the Council would on these grounds postpone the second reading of the Bill for this session. Let them treat it as they treated the Forest Bill—a Bill which they considered faulty. He regarded this Bill as one of the utmost importance. From the mere point of view of the Attorney-Generalship, he attached no importance to it; but from the other very high considerations to which he had invited the attention of the Council in connection with its influence upon the judicature in the future, he did attach the very highest importance to it. Upon that ground, he hoped the further consideration of the Bill would be postponed for the present session. As an amendment to the motion of his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary, he begged to move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL desired to ask the Hon. the Speaker's guidance in the matter of procedure. A report was brought up from the Petitions Committee that day, recommending that, on the order for the second reading of this Bill, a petition which had been referred to the Committee should be read to the Council; and on that ground the Petitions Committee made no report on the subject. He simply wished to remind the Hon. the Speaker of that report. Of course, it was for the Council to say whether or not the petition should be read.

The Hon. the SPEAKER thought that was the proper time for reading the petition.

The CLERK then read the petition.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE asked how the petition came into possession of the Council. He could hardly understand how the Council should have permitted a document of the kind, reflecting as it did upon the Legislature of the colony, to be received without some comment. He observed that in the early part of the petition reference was made to the immoral conduct of the Parliament, or terms to that effect were used, and the whole tone of the petition appeared to be exceedingly improper. He would have voted against its being received, had he heard it read at the time.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said the petition was presented in due course, was received by the Council, was remitted as a matter of course to the Petitions Committee; and when it had sent in its report, so far as that was concerned, the petition was in order.

The Hon. Major RICHMOND asked that the report of the Committee might be read.

The report was accordingly read.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said they had had the advantage of hearing read the document which the Committee thought might assist them in their deliberations, and which had not assisted him at all, as he entirely dissented from all it contained. With regard to the Bill, he would support his honorable friend in his amendment, for the simple reason that, however convenient at the present time, or however much confidence they might repose in the gentleman who, in all probability, would be the first Attorney-General appointed under this Act, they must not forget that the appointment would be a shuttlecock of politics; and it would be exceedingly unlikely that they would at all times have as able a member of the profession in that place as the gentleman he had alluded to. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had pointed out how they might affect the judicature of the country. He (Colonel Whitmore) would say something as to how it might affect the political character of much of their legislation. The Government were bound, to a very large extent, to be influenced and guided by their Attorney-General in the Bills they brought down; and if they had some trumpet lawyer, who did not understand his profession, but who was nevertheless a man of weight in politics, there was very great danger that the Government would be exceedingly ill-advised. Whereas, on the other hand, if the Government paid sufficient salary to secure the services of one of the most eminent gentlemen of the legal profession, they could at all times depend upon an unbiassed opinion on any subject which the Government might submit to him for his advice. Taking another ground than that, he objected to hurriedly passing this Amendment Bill, which would wipe out the deliberate result of the experience of members of Parliament for many years, before the Act of 1866 was brought in.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES thought it was a matter of regret that the petition which had just been read had not been more carefully scrutinized before it was received by the Council; because, clearly, it testified to nothing more than the unbounded self-esteem of the writer, and his general idea that the appointment of an Attorney-General under this Bill would demoralize that gentleman, by bringing him into contact with members of the Assembly in whichever House he might sit; and that it was not desirable he should have private practice, the probability being that his possessing that privilege would tend to the diminution of the practice of other members of the Bar. The honorable gentleman who had moved the amendment had dwelt principally upon the injurious effect upon the Bench which the passing of this Bill might lead to, and had referred to instances which had occurred in other colonies to bear him out in the expectation that such might be the case; but he thought he might refer to our experience in this colony as to the effect upon the Bench of having political Attorneys-General, during the longest part of our history under responsible institutions. As the Colonial Secretary had stated, in moving the second reading of the Bill, from the earliest days of the colony up to 1866, the Attorney-Generalship was a political office, held, first of all, by a member of the Government for the time being, and subsequently, when the Constitution Act came into operation, the Attorney-General continued to be a Minister and one of the members of the Executive until 1866. He did not think there was anything in their experience, during the period in which the Attorney-General was a political officer, that would lead them to entertain any apprehension of such an appointment exercising an evil influence on the Bench. If they looked back to the gentlemen who were members of one or other House of Representatives during that period, and who held the office of Attorney-General, they would find that among the most distinguished men—or, to speak more correctly, those who ranked amongst the first of the then political men—were those gentlemen who held that position during the whole of that time. They found amongst them the names of Mr. Sewell, Mr. Fox, Mr. Gillies, Mr. Whitaker, and Mr. Prendergast, who also continued to be Attorney-General under the new system.

AN HON. MEMBER.—Mr. Swainson.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said Mr. Swainson was Attorney-General before the Constitution Act came into operation, and continued to be Attorney-General only till the first Government was formed under the Constitution Act—the Government which consisted of Mr. Stafford and Mr. Richmond, with Mr. Whitaker as Attorney-General. They ought rather to draw from their own experience than to apprehend any evil consequences from the experiences of other colonies. He saw nothing in their own experience to lead to the apprehension that there would be any injurious effect in the office being a political one; for up to the year 1866 the Bench undoubtedly occupied a position not less distinguished, not not less possessed of the public confidence, than the Bench did now; and in stating that, he did not in any way intend to reflect upon the present constitution of the Bench. On the other hand, he might say that the confidence of the public in the Bench had not been in any way diminished since the year 1866. If the holding of the office of Attorney-General as a political office was calculated to have a deteriorating effect upon it, or to lessen the respect in which the Bench was held, surely it would have been felt during the period when the office was so held, or at a subsequent period, when an appointment was made to the Bench. He did not think any honorable member would contend that the appointment in any way had tended to lessen the respect in which the Bench was held, and he thought the example they could draw from the experience of the mother country could in no way lead to the conclusion that the tenure of this office as a political one would be likely to have that effect, for they knew that for a very long period the Attorney-General in the United Kingdom looked to immediate promotion to the Bench after a vacancy occurred. He did not think such was always the case in this colony; that it had been so at a certain period he was aware, but he did not think it had been always so; and he apprehended that the confident expectation that such promotion would follow the appointment, could only occur in very exceptional circumstances henceforward. He had expected that some dis-appointment would have been expressed that they were still limited to the number of seven Ministers. If a new Minister, or rather one of the Ministers, was to have the new designation of Attorney-General, he feared that alone would not induce him to relinquish the harder seats in another place for the softer cushions of the Council, so that they would soon be in the position which his honorable and gallant friend Colonel Whitmore deprecated, of having the Government represented by only one member. He thought, before the Bill passed out of the Council, it might probably be improved by making such an addition as would admit of an increased representation of the Government in the Council.

* The Hon. Mr. HALL said part of the reasons which induced him to vote for this Bill had been so well expressed by the honorable gentleman who had preceded him, that he would trouble the Council with very few remarks; but as he was a member of the Government when the Act of 1866 was passed, he thought it right to say, that although at that time it was desirable that the office of the Attorney-General should be a political one, the position of affairs had so very much changed that he thought now, not that it was indispensable that the office should be a political one, but that it should be open to the Government to make it a political one if they found it necessary. At the time of the passing of the Act of 1866, there were but two legal gentlemen in the other branch of the Legislature, Mr. Brandon and the late Mr. Borlase. Now, the number of lawyers in the other House was very much larger. At that time, if the Government had been under the necessity of selecting an Attorney-General in the House, their choice would have been very restricted, but now things were very different. The number of professional men in the House of Representatives was large, and the amount of professional learning which was brought to bear upon questions under discussion was very much larger than formerly, and therefore he presumed the Government felt that it was exceedingly desirable that they should be assisted by a professional gentleman on their own bench. He thought there was very great force in that argument, and that the Government at present was under a very unfair disadvantage, deprived, in the presence of so many professional men, of the assistance of a legal colleague in the person of the Attorney-General. Therefore, for the proper conduct of parliamentary business, if for no other reason, he thought the time had arrived when it was desirable they should revert to the arrangement which had prevailed during the greater part of their constitutional career, namely, having a political Attorney-General. He hoped honorable members would bear in mind, not only the manner in which the Government business was to be conducted in that Council, but the manner in which it was to be conducted in the other branch of the Legislature. To his mind, this appeared to be the strongest argument that could be brought forward for the proposed change, —namely, that it was almost necessary for the proper conduct of the Government business in the other House that there should be a legal gentleman upon the Government benches. He hoped the Council would not think lightly of that necessity, and would not throw any impediment in the way of what appeared to be the wish, not only of the Government, but of a large majority of the other branch of the Legislature. For that reason he would vote for the Bill. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had requested, and he thought in that request was supported by the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, that the Bill might be deferred until next session, in order that they might not pass it until some distinct provision had been made with regard to the appointment of Judges. He did not see the necessity for that. There was no necessity for postponing this Bill on that account, because it was in the highest degree improbable, in the first place, considering the changes which had lately taken place on the Bench, that there would be a vacancy very soon; and in the second place, if a vacancy did occur, he thought it was in the highest degree improbable that the gentleman who would most likely be appointed to the office of Attorney-General, if this Bill passed, would put in a claim to a Judgeship. Therefore the danger apprehended by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse was, to his mind, altogether a visionary one. If Parliament thought it desirable next session to make some different provision to that which now existed, and the necessity for which he did not himself see, in regard to the appointment of Judges, it would be open for it to do so, and the passing of this Bill would not preclude it from doing so. He, for his own part, considering what had taken place with reference to the appointment of Judges in this colony while they had a political Attorney-General, did not see any great necessity for a change. For these reasons, and considering the very weak arguments which had been brought forward against the Bill—they had been a mere plea for delay, a delay which must be productive of very considerable embarrassment—he trusted honorable members would not hesitate to read the Bill a second time.

* The Hon. Captain FRASER was sorry the Hon. Mr. Hall had made out such a bad case for the Government. He said the law was all against him, or what was tantamount to that. He (Captain Fraser) was in favour of a non-political Attorney-General. If there was a political Attorney-General, his opinions would have an involuntary bias. Being a partisan, his judgment would naturally be biased. The late Attorney-General gave an opinion on the 1st December, 1874, which would never have been given by a partisan Attorney-General. He said he saw no room for doubt about the abolition of provinces being ultra vires; but as there were doubts expressed, he recommended the Government to apply to the Law Officers of the Crown in England; and if they did not take a favourable view of the matter, the Government should have a Bill brought in. Would any partisan Attorney-General have done that? It was very much to be regretted that the Government did not take the advice of the late Attorney-General on that occasion. It did not much matter who they had as Attorney-General in this country, because the people of New Zealand would make very good Roman Catholics. No matter who was appointed to office,—if they took an ordinary lawyer from an ordinary firm and made him Attorney-General, his opinion would be considered infallible. If they took a clodhopper and put him on the Government benches to-morrow, words of wisdom would be expected to fall from his lips. He would vote for the postponement of this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that, from his experience of the Attorney-General as a political officer, he must say he was distinctly in favour of the office being a non-political one. It must be known to the Hon. the Speaker, and to everybody else who had had experience of Attorneys-General, when holding portfolios in the Government that, out of respect and friendship for their legal colleague, when they really wanted a clear unbiassed view of their legal position on any question, they had recourse, not to their colleague, but to the Assistant Law Officer. That was invariably the case—speaking at any rate of his own experience. Of course he could understand very well that in another place the assistance of a gentleman accustomed to plead all sorts of things before all sorts of audiences might be of great advantage to the Government; yet he had often known political Attorneys-General who landed their colleagues in complications which they probably would have escaped had they not had the assistance of so ingenious and able an advocate as a political Attorney-General. Of course his honorable friend's experience might have been different. He might have found that assistance from his legal colleague which he (Mr. Mantell) did not find. He had no reason to complain on any occasion of not having received the most kindly and ready assistance from Attorneys-General; but, at the same time, he was quite conscious that in getting opinions from them, he was getting an opinion from politicians who took a particular view of a public question, and he preferred, for his own sake, to get legal opinions which he had no reason to suppose were dictated by any such influence. As to the petition read to the Council, he had only to state that it was a petition that the Council itself saw fit to refer to the Petitions Committee, and that that Committee was perfectly right in suggesting that the course laid down in such cases by the Standing Orders should be adopted. Of course, it had its defects, like every other petition. It showed a certain amount of the idiosyncracies of the writer, and which, no doubt, to those who knew the gentleman—he had not that pleasure—were by no means unexpected. At the same time, he did not see any trace of its being meant to show any disrespect to the Council or the Government. He was sorry the Hon. Mr. Hall should have changed his opinion since 1866. He thought the course then taken was a decidedly proper one. Prior to that time, it was necessary to have Attorneys-General as colleagues who held very considerable positions. For instance, Mr. Sewell, if he remembered aright, was a member of

Mr. Fox's Ministry, and during the latter part of the time he held office as Attorney-General without being a member of the Cabinet, and without taking any political responsibility. However, Mr. Sewell's opinions, they all knew, were excellent and ready, and—well, they were Mr. Sewell's opinions at any rate. They were opinions which did not meet with the general concurrence of his learned brethren. The Hon. Mr. Hall said it did not follow as a matter of course that the Attorney-General would be entitled to claim a vacancy in the Bench. However, he (Mr. Mantell) thought that the other members of the legal profession could not think he would be acting justly towards his learned brethren if he accepted office without stipulating for any Judgeship that would fall vacant during his tenure of office. Even if he did not contemplate the possibility of accepting promotion himself, he would make the stipulation, on the plea that he did it in justice to his learned brother who might succeed him as political Attorney-General. He quite agreed with the Hon. Mr. Hall, that the assistance of a legal member of the Government in conducting debates was very valuable; but he did not think it was necessary on that ground that the gentleman should hold a legal office. He imagined that the gentleman's law would be just as good, and his guidance would be just as efficient, if he were called Postmaster-General, Commissioner of Customs, or anything else. If they wanted the assistance of a skilled pleader in the other House of Legislature, let them avail themselves of his services; but it did not at all follow that he should hold a professional office. He had known cases in which medical gentlemen had been of great use on the Government benches; but still they did not on that account create the office of Doctor-General, or anything of that sort. They might, when they developed a little more propriety, and a little more of that morality which was so frequently mentioned in the petition just read, require a reverend gentleman; but they would not necessarily appoint him to some new ecclesiastical office, and establish an ecclesiastical department under him. It was not necessary that a legal member of the Government should hold a professional office; and he should be very sorry indeed if the Council consented, at any rate without further consideration, to pass this Bill, respecting an Act which was very well considered, and had had a good effect.

* The Hon. Mr. J. JOHNSTON, referring to what had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Menzies, who had cited in support of the Bill the experience of the past, said he was inclined to think that the past had given no experience. The Judges, with the exception of recent appointments, were offered and accepted their Judgeships in England. No deaths had occurred, and until the retirement of the late Chief Justice, no opportunity occurred to an Attorney-General to claim his prerogative; therefore experience could not be said to have shown that the elevation to the Bench of a political Attorney-General had worked well or otherwise. If it could be conceived that his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary should, by some operation in another place, have to be removed from the position he now occupied, and that the Opposition occupied the Ministerial seats, he could fancy there might be the appointment of an Attorney-General who, if he claimed the high office of a seat on the Bench in the case of the death of any of the present Judges, might not be satisfactory to the country; and he thought such a view as that should not be lost sight of. He did not think it followed necessarily that all those who were made political Attorneys-General should, in the eyes of the country, be of that distinction to merit a seat on the Bench.

*The Hon. Dr. POLLEN hoped the Council would not accept the amendment of his honorable friend Mr. Waterhouse, and refuse to allow the Bill to be read now a second time. The argument which his honorable friend had based upon what he was pleased to call the prescriptive right of the Attorney-General to any vacant Judgeship had been answered sufficiently by honorable members who had already spoken on this subject. He (Dr. Pollen) denied that any such prescriptive right existed in this colony, or could fairly be pleaded in support of such a claim; and if it could be pleaded, he denied that any Government could relieve itself of the responsibility which devolved upon it for the appointments that were recommended to be made by it to the Judicial Bench of the colony. As a matter of fact, several vacancies in the Bench occurred before the passing of "The Attorney-General Act, 1866," but none of the Attorneys-General who were then in office availed themselves, or thought of claiming for themselves, any prescriptive right to be placed upon the Bench; on the contrary, when a vacancy occurred, one of the holders of that office, Mr. Sewell, recommended that an application should be made to the judicial authorities in England to select and send out a fitting person as a Judge. And when a vacancy occurred during the time that his honorable friend Mr. Whitaker was Attorney-General, he did not set up any prescriptive claim for that appointment. The only occasion when an Attorney-General in this colony had been raised to the Judicial Bench was in the case of Mr. Prendergast; but his claim to that position was not based upon any prescriptive right, such as that which the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse referred to, but upon the specific promise which was made to him as one of the conditions of his accepting the office of Attorney-General in 1867, that he should have the first vacancy that occurred on the Judicial Bench. The other inconvenience which his honorable friend Mr. Waterhouse pointed out was this: that in case of there being a political Attorney-General, the House of Assembly would be deprived of the independent and unbiased advice upon local questions which they had hitherto received. The appointment of a political Attorney-General would not deprive the country or the House of Assembly of the assistance of the permanent Law Officer of the colony. There would still be a Solicitor-General and a permanent officer to whom the House of Assembly could have recourse in the future as they had had in the past; and supposing for a moment that a political Attorney-General would venture to imperil his reputation as a professional man by giving a biased and misleading opinion for political purposes, there would always be behind him an officer to whom the Assembly could have recourse, and who would be beyond the suspicion of party bias. There was another view of the question which ought to have some weight, and which he hoped would have some weight with honorable gentlemen—and that was, that the passing of this Bill may enable the Government to make an arrangement for having an additional Minister in the Council, a desire for which was expressed with a great deal of unanimity on a recent occasion. The Hon. Mr. Hall had pointed out that, in the conduct of the Government business in the Assembly, where there was now such a large infusion of what he might call the legal element, the Government were constantly placed at great disadvantage from the fact that they had nobody by their side who could take up and immediately dispose of a legal argument. It was not always possible for a layman to do that; and the consequence was very great embarrassment, obstruction to business, and confusion, where such power did not exist on the part of the Government, and where it did exist on the other side. He hoped the Council would not forget the fact that this Bill had been passed with a very large measure of concurrence in another place; and that, in dealing with this question, it would not put the mere convenience of postponing it for another year in opposition to the views which had been expressed there, by the passing of the Bill, as to the necessity for the change which was proposed to be made. He again expressed the hope that the Council would not accept the motion of his honorable friend, but would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

DUNEDIN WHARVES AND QUAYS BILL.
On the motion, That this Bill be read a third time,

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he was not in the habit of taking exception to third readings. He generally liked to fight a Bill on the second reading; and if he was defeated then, he contented himself with the action he had taken on that occasion, and did not seek to combat the Bill any further. It so happened, however, with reference to this measure, that he was unfortunately absent when the second reading was under consideration; but there were circumstances connected with this Bill of such a character that, when it was proposed to be read a third time, he could not content himself without stating the reasons which influenced him to give a vote against the measure. He might state that the proposition to endow the Harbour Board with property of the character referred to in the Bill was, under ordinary circumstances, a proposition which would meet with his concurrence. He thought it right that Harbour Boards should have reserves that were set apart for the purpose of quays, and that the profits arising from such reserves should be devoted to harbour improvements. He likewise recognized that in the case of Port Chalmers there was a great work to be done, and that it was of essential importance that the Harbour Board should be endowed with sufficient funds to perform those works efficiently. But there were two ways of doing a thing—a right way and a wrong way; and his objection to this Bill was simply that the wrong way had been adopted. They should not and they ought not altogether to ignore the history of this Bill. It was introduced into the other branch of the Legislature by a gentleman whose name stood at the head of it, Mr. Stout, for one particular object. At the time the Bill in the regular course of business was called on, that honorable gentleman was away. It was usual upon such occasions for the Bill to lapse till the honorable gentleman in charge of it was in his place to see it through the House. In this case, however,—

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL rose to a point of order. He thought the honorable gentleman could not refer to the proceedings in another place.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he was merely alluding to an historical point, to facts which could not be controverted, facts which had now passed into history, and were as much the history of this place as anything that had taken place in the town during the last month.

The Hon. Mr. HALL would submit that the same might be said of almost every proceeding in another branch of the Legislature, even during the present session, and down to a late period of the previous day, or that morning. They were all matters of history.

* The Hon. the SPEAKER said it was an acknowledged principle in parliamentary law that no notice should be taken of any debate in another House during the same session.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE would then put a hypothetical case. If a Bill were introduced into the other branch of the Legislature by one honorable member for one specific purpose; if that honorable member happened to be away from his place at the time that Bill was called on;

if then another honorable member, adverse to the Bill, rose in his place, took charge of the Bill, against the ordinary rules of Parliament, and entirely reversed the object of the Bill, so as to give it an absolutely different meaning: would that be considered a right mode of proceeding, and would the second branch of the Legislature—the conservative branch of the Legislature—be justified in regarding it as a right course of proceeding? If such a course were adopted, would it not be essentially within the duty of the conservative branch of the Legislature to impose some delay, however right the Bill might be in other respects? His objection to this Bill was based upon a feeling of this sort: that, however right the Bill might be in itself, or however desirable, the right mode of introducing it into Parliament had not been adopted. Under these circumstances, it was desirable that some delay should be interposed, in order that the measure might pass through Parliament in a more fitting and becoming manner. Simply for that reason, he would oppose the third reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES thought the first remark the honorable gentleman made explained altogether the rest of his observations. He was quite certain that if the honorable gentleman had been in his place during the time the second reading was discussed, and still more if he had been in the Waste Lands Committee when it was considered there, he would have seen that there was no reason to raise the objections he had just started. Every member of the Council now knew that this land was originally granted for the purpose of wharves and quays; but after a time, because there was no Board to administer the endowments, and because all accommodation for the purposes of wharves and quays was provided by the Provincial Government, this reserve, among some others in the city of Dunedin, was given over to the Corporation. Some of the reserves were invested in the Corporation, who had absolute power over them. Others, including the one in question, were given over to the Corporation simply for management. In the Ordinance whereby the management was given to the Corporation that was distinctly stated, as was also the purpose for which the grant was made. Since then, however, this particular reserve had been found to yield a good rental of between £300 and £400 a year, and the Corporation not very unnaturally supposed that they could more usefully apply that rental than the Harbour Board which was subsequently formed. They found that, inasmuch as a railway cut through this reserve, that the land was reclaimed, and that more was about to be reclaimed, the reserve could never be used for wharves and quays. It was true the land could never be used for that purpose, still it could be made a most valuable and useful endowment for the Harbour Board to form wharves and quays elsewhere. These two great powers could not manage the matter between themselves; and in the interests of the Corporation, this Bill was brought in to secure the reserve for that body. Naturally enough, the Harbour Board, on proving to the other branch of the Legislature the purposes to which the land was originally destined, secured the alteration of the Bill in such a way as to devote the land to the purpose for which it was originally intended. He did not see that the honorable members in another place or in the Council were in any way more to blame for the particular view they had taken of the matter than any man of the community would be in defending himself against another man of the community who thought that the money in the first party's pocket could be more usefully applied by himself. Those who supported this Bill would be very much in the same position as a man who defended himself against one who desired to pick his pocket. The Bill, as it now stood, restored the reserve to the purpose for which it was originally destined. In the Waste Lands Committee, the schedule was found to be defective; and in order that there might be no mistake on that point, the schedule was altered, and that which was now attached to the Bill was copied from the Crown grant. That, he thought, was the most conclusive proof that the present object of the Bill was the right one.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL was not going to enter into the merits of the Bill. It appeared to him that the only reason why they were asked by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse to throw it out was, that the manner in which its early stages were conducted in the House of Representatives did not meet with his approval. Now, he ventured to suggest, it was not for the Council to inquire how the Bill arrived at that branch of the Legislature in a particular form. All they knew of it was that it was submitted to them, and had undergone consideration. The honorable gentleman seemed to object to the Bill, because the promoter in the other branch of the Legislature was not in his place when it was called on for second reading, and because it was then taken charge of by some other honorable member, and certain alterations were made while it passed through Committee. He did not wish to go into the merits of the question; but he desired to say that if they were to review everything that took place elsewhere, they would find themselves in a very difficult position in regard to a great many measures.

The Hon. Captain FRASER had been influenced all along by the fact, that some time ago the Legislature gave power to the Municipal Corporation of Dunedin to borrow a certain sum of money, and this reserve was shown in London as a collateral asset. He was informed, by a banker in Wellington, that if the Legislature now diverted the reserve, and gave it to the Harbour Board, it would be a breach of faith with the bondholders, would depreciate the credit of the colony in London, and make it almost impossible to float any other local loans. He was entirely influenced in his opposition to the Bill by that fact, which was elicited before the Public Petitions Committee.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON was glad that the Hon. Captain Fraser had explained the reason why he had opposed the second reading of this Bill, for if the honorable gentleman had shown good grounds for opposing it, he sympathized so strongly with the honorable gentleman that he would have supported him; but the argument which he had brought forward was so weak, that he had not the slightest hesitation in confirming what had already been done in the Council with regard to this measure. That gentleman had told them that these reserves, which the Corporation only held in trust, were absolutely exhibited as security, and money borrowed on the strength of that representation.

The Hon. Captain FRASER explained that he never said that the money was borrowed, but that the reserves were shown as collateral security.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.—Exactly; that the document, the Crown grant, the title, or whatever it might be, for this reserve was exhibited as collateral security for money the Corporation was about to borrow. Now, he thought, in the ordinary course of borrowing, when people who lend money to Corporations had such a document presented to them, and were asked to lend money on the strength of it, they would ascertain for themselves, before they advanced that money, whether there was really a good title to the land which the Corporation alleged they possessed. It seemed to him, in this case, that it was impossible for them to have done anything of the kind, inasmuch as it was clearly shown that this land never was in the possession of the Corporation, except to be held in trust, the Corporation receiving the rents. That body had had a good milch cow for some years past, and, from what he had heard in the Council, he understood they had been in receipt of £300 or £400 a year from the reserves. It was natural that a body having been in the receipt of such a large sum per annum, no matter how they derived it, would be reluctant to dispose themselves of the source of income. This question was brought before the Committee, and was clearly gone into there. It had also been discussed in the House, and it had been clearly shown that this land was really intended, in the first instance, as an endowment for the Harbour Board. It had, he thought, been clearly shown by the Hon. Mr. Mantell, that Mr. Domett, at the time the reserves were made, gave them a particular designation, as indicating the purposes for which they were intended, and they were called wharves and quays, which showed that they were to be an endowment for the harbour. They had nothing to do with the question of how this measure came into the Council. It was brought down, and it was for them to consider whether it was a right and proper Bill. That question had been fully discussed, and the Council had come to the conclusion, and from good evidence, that this reserve belonged to the Harbour Board, and for these reasons he would support the third reading of the Bill.

* The Hon. Mr. PATERSON said that when the Bill was being discussed at its second reading he opposed it, and voted against it, not on the ground which was now raised as to proceedings adopted with reference to it elsewhere, but on the ground that he was opposed to the provisions of the Bill itself. No doubt, those circumstances were referred to on the second reading, and weighed considerably in influencing some members of the Council with regard to the Bill itself; but, apart from these proceedings altogether, he still thought the measure was a mistake. There could be no question that the fact of the reserve having been named as it had been was the original cause of all the mistakes that had taken place. As had been stated before, the land was no longer suitable for the purposes for which it was originally intended; for instead of being the boundary between the town and the waterside, as it was formerly, it was now situated in the centre of the town. ("No, no.") It might not be literally speaking in the centre of the town; but it was so much so that there was a large accumulation of land between it and the water, so that it could no longer be used for wharves and quays. Besides, as had been mentioned during the previous discussion, the Harbour Board had already received large endowments, and were, as far as funds were concerned, quite in a position to carry on their works. No injustice would be done to them by leaving this reserve with the Corporation, because they had ample endowments favourably situated for wharves and quays. This reserve was made over to the Corporation, and they were allowed to appropriate the rents derived from it by the authority of the Provincial Council. The only reason why the original Bill was introduced into the Assembly was that, in view of the constitutional changes, it was thought to be advisable to obtain colonial authority instead of provincial, which was about to be swept away. The power of the provincial authorities to grant the use of the land to the Corporation had never been questioned. As had already been pointed out, in the absence of the gentleman in charge of the Bill advantage was taken to change its nature and object altogether.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES had nothing to say except that he actually heard the controversy that took place when the Bill was dealt with in another place, and he was in a position to disprove a good deal that had been said as regarded the advantage taken in the absence of a member—

* The Hon. the SPEAKER suggested that it would be as well not to touch upon what took place in another branch of the Legislature.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES would not do so; but he would ask any honorable member to imagine that he himself was placed in charge of the Bill in the Council, and that something had called him away, and he had requested, say his honorable friend Mr. Menzies, who was interested in the same locality, to take charge of the measure, that honorable gentleman knowing as much of the circumstances and being both as able and as willing to advocate the interests of the district as he (Mr. Holmes) could possibly be; and supposing the honorable gentleman contested the Bill strenuously point by point and fought it out, could it be said that another party holding an opposite view, took an undue advantage when, after lengthened discussion the Bill was carried in the shape in which it now was? That was exactly the manner in which the Bill arrived at its present stage. With regard to the fact of the Corporation including the reserve in the security offered for the loan, that was their error. It was, however, not uncommon that land shown as security in that way should be afterwards disposed of. The mere fact of reserves being supposed to be given as security for loans did not prevent their subsequent alienation; and why should this matter be brought forward as against the Bill? His honorable friend Mr. Paterson had stated that this land was not of any value for the purposes originally intended. He granted that was the case, but it would be as valuable to the Harbour Board for the purposes of revenue as it would be to the Corporation. There was no doubt that when the reserve was made, it was contemplated to bring vessels to Dunedin, and that wharves would be made there, so that the land was precisely of the character that would be set apart for harbour purposes. He could not see what good plea could be urged against the passing of this Bill. He believed the land would go to the parties for whom it was originally intended, and therefore no wrong would be done to the Corporation.

* The Hon. Mr. BONAR, having spoken on the second reading of the Bill, only desired now to relieve the mind of the Hon. Captain Fraser as to the grounds on which he had formed his decision. He did not intend to refer to what had taken place in another House; but he might be allowed to say that Mr. Stout's name being at the head of the Bill, that gentleman's evidence on the question would be satisfactory to his honorable friend.

"Are you aware that the reserves are now held by certain creditors for a loan?—I have been told so; but I do not think that is correct, for this reason, that the city has no power to borrow a shilling on its reserves. . . . Further than that, they could not bind any one by saying that the reserves were to be security. It is incorrect to say that."

Then again,—

"Then the Committee are to understand that the Municipality could not advance these rents as security for the purpose of borrowing?—No; except in an indirect way.

"As a collateral guarantee that they were able to pay interest?—Yes.

"Mr. Murray.] Do you think a trustee would be justified in putting in some property he holds in trust for other purposes as security for the raising of money to be applied to his own purposes?—They could not have put this reserve in as security at all."

That, to his mind, was perfectly conclusive upon the only difficulty he had on this question.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL had only one word to say in reply. The Hon. Mr. Bonar had quoted what he himself had already called attention to, with regard to the moonshine idea that these reserves were sacred, because they had been included in the schedule furnished by the Corporation to the Bank. He had also previously stated that the Harbour Board had likewise included the reserves as collateral security for its loan. Bankers knew perfectly that it was the practice of all Corporations to bring forward every possible thing they had in their power, and everything they had a claim over, in order to make their securities look well. For instance, the Wellington Corporation, in its schedule, included the town belt, the whole rents of which were otherwise specially appropriated. The Hon. Mr. Robinson referred to the name Wharves and Quays having been conferred on these reserves by Mr. Domett. He thought that on the second reading he had made it quite intelligible to the Council that these were called wharves and quays before a single section was selected in Dunedin; and that having been laid out originally, the sections were designated in order to prevent confusion. He hoped the Council would allow the Bill to be read a third time.

Question put, "That the Bill be now read a third time; upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. SHARP asked the Premier, Whether the Government are prepared or willing to make any provision for the due representation of New Zealand interests and productions at the Grand Exhibition at Paris in 1878? As honorable members were aware, an exhibition had been held this year at Philadelphia, at which he thought New Zealand did not take that prominent position which, as one of the foremost countries in this part of the world, she should have taken. The productions of New Zealand were more in demand on the Continent than in America; and as an Exhibition was to take place in Paris in 1878, proper steps should be taken to insure that New Zealand was well represented at that Exhibition. No doubt it would take some time to make the necessary arrangements, and he asked the question this year in order that proper steps should be taken.

Major ATKINSON said the matter was under the consideration of the Government, and in a few days he would inform the House what course they proposed to take in regard to it.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE asked the Premier, Whether the Government will, during the recess, take into their consideration the advisability of establishing insurance offices at the various railway stations in the colony? He was induced to place the question on the Order Paper in consequence of representations made to him by certain gentlemen residing in the district from which he came, who, together with himself, were impressed with the belief that, as the railways progressed, the establishment of railway insurance offices would prove a remunerative source of income to the Government. The system he would like to see initiated was that which had proved so successful in the old country.

Major ATKINSON said the matter, which was one of very considerable importance, was under the consideration of the Government; but they had not yet arrived at a decision on the subject. He could not therefore give the honorable gentleman any definite answer at that moment, but would do so at the earliest possible date.

J. ARNOTT AND OTHERS.

Mr. KENNEDY asked the Government, Whether it is contemplated to give effect to the report of the Public Petitions Committee in the matter of John Arnott, and James Kerr, and Joseph Petrie?

Mr. WHITAKER said the difficulty had arisen out of a mistake made by the Returning Officer of the district, who was instructed, in regard to the printing of the electoral roll, to give one-half to one office and the other half to the other. Instead of doing so, he gave the whole of the printing to both offices. The Government had had the matter under consideration, and considered that these people were entitled to be paid. The only question was, whether they were entitled to be paid the whole sum, because it appeared that the rolls were all printed at the same office, from the same type? Under these circumstances the Government did not think that full payment should be made to each.

LAWRENCE FOOT BRIDGE.

Mr. J. C. BROWN asked the Government, If they will cause a foot bridge to be erected over a dangerous railway cutting in the Town of Lawrence? It would be as well to explain that this railway cutting passed right across one of the streets of Lawrence, where there was considerable goods and passenger traffic. He desired to know whether the Government could arrange for the erection of a foot bridge across the cutting, at a cost not to exceed £100. If it cost more, he would undertake, on behalf of the municipal authorities, that they would meet the extra outlay. The approaches to the bridge would cost the Corporation a considerable sum, and although there was a level crossing which would answer very well for goods traffic, it would be very dangerous for foot passengers, inasmuch as it was not possible for any one travelling along the road from Lawrence to Weatherston to see the train coming. He felt certain that unless this was done there would be many lives lost, and then probably the money would be expended. The cutting also prevented persons from getting easy access to their private property, and some of them would be compelled to go across a sharp curve to get to their houses. Last year a promise was made by the Public Works Department to provide £100 on condition that the Provincial Government of Otago also provided a similar amount. That sum was voted by the Provincial Government. The reason why the money was not expended was that the plans which were prepared by the Engineer of the Public Works Department were found to be of a far more costly nature than the work required. He hoped the Government would consent to this small expenditure for a work of so much importance.

Mr. RICHARDSON said it would manifestly be a very inconvenient course to enter into an agreement of this sort in the House without further information. The original proposition from the authorities at Lawrence was that they should have a road bridge erected. The authorities then expressed their willingness to contribute a portion of the cost, on the understanding that the Provincial Government and the Colonial Government should also pay a portion. The Government had since provided a level crossing. Now, instead of asking for a road bridge, they wished to have a foot bridge. He had no estimate of what the cost would be; but, if the local authorities were prepared to share the expense, probably the Government would be inclined to construct the bridge. He could, however, give no positive answer at present.

COOK STRAIT CABLE.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, What arrangements have been made as to payment of demurrage to the ship "Zealandia," in consequence of the delay of the Government in taking delivery of the Cook Strait cable? Why such delay has occurred? Will the new cable be laid on the best line, irrespective of the old cable? He said there was a rumour that the Government were paying the ship "Zealandia" demurrage at the rate of £20 per day for not landing the telegraph cable from that ship. He understood that next week they would have to pay £30 per day, and the following week £40 per day. He wished to know the reason for this, seeing it was intimated that the cable was to be delivered within four months from April last, and the time expired on the 28th of August. Every effort ought to have been made to take delivery from the ship six weeks ago. With regard to the second part of the question, he believed that the route by which the old cable was laid was very rocky, and this had led to the destruction of the cable, which, if it had been placed in a better situation, would have been quite sufficient for many years to come. He hoped the new cable would be laid on a different line.

Mr. WHITAKER said, with reference to the demurrage, a special contract had been made in London for the purpose of bringing out the cable, and, under the arrangement made, demurrage was to be allowed, if the ship were detained, at the rate of £20 for a certain number of days, £30 a day for another term, and then £40 a day. Demurrage began on the 9th instant, at the rate of £20 a day for fourteen days. That was the position of affairs. The arrangement was made in England, and not in the colony. The "Zealandia" arrived some eight or nine days sooner than had been expected. The delay in landing the cable was caused thus: An agreement was made with the Eastern Telegraph Company to allow their ship the "Edinburgh" to lay the cable, the Government paying only the absolute expense incurred in doing so, and not allowing anything as remuneration for the use of the vessel. That seemed to him to be a very desirable arrangement, but owing to the breakage of the cable between Port Darwin and Java the "Edinburgh" was sent there to repair it; it was then supposed that she would return in ample time to lay the Cook Strait cable, but a longer time was consumed than had been supposed, and consequently she had been delayed in coming here. The "Agnes," a vessel belonging to the same company, had consequently been substituted for the "Edinburgh." A telegram had been received that the "Agnes" was in Sydney, and she was expected to arrive here in about a week or ten days, so that he hoped no very great amount of demurrage would accrue. There was a question whether the ship was entitled to any demurrage at all, but that was a matter of law, and he need not go into it in the House. It was intended to lay the cable by the best route, altogether irrespective of the old cable. The absolute position in which the new cable would be placed would not be decided until the experienced officers who would be in the "Agnes" had reported on the matter. He had a plan showing the soundings taken in parts of the Strait in which it was proposed to lay the cable, and he would be happy to show it to the honorable gentlemen. The plan also showed the position of the old cable.

SIR J. VOGEL'S MISSIONS TO ENGLAND.

Mr. STAFFORD, in moving the motion standing in his name, trusted it would be acceptable to the House. It appeared to him that it was very desirable that the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) should have the opportunity of investigating, and suggesting any investigation that might be desirable, in reference to the cost of the missions of Sir Julius Vogel, and the subject-matter referred to in the motion. He understood it was also proposed to add the name of another gentleman, but his notice was confined to the name of Sir G. Grey alone.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the name of Sir G. Grey be added to the Committee on Public Accounts, for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the subject-matter referred to that Committee on the 10th instant."—(Mr. Stafford.)

Sir R. DOUGLAS would suggest, if the honorable the mover and the House had no objection, that Mr. Rees's name should be added to the Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD said the honorable member for Waitemata had expressed that wish to him in the morning. As far as he was concerned, he would have been very happy to do so; but the rules of the House would not allow a name to be added without previous notice having been given.

Mr. SPEAKER said a notice to that effect was given by the honorable member for Riverton, but it was not placed on the Order Paper, because it was contrary to rule that the House should have brought before it a subject which had already been decided during the session.

Sir G. GREY begged to offer a few remarks upon the motion which had been made. The terms of the motion originally were to this effect: "To inquire into the cost to the colony of the two last missions to England of Sir Julius Vogel." He understood, upon talking to members, that their opinion was that the subject reported upon in terms of the motion would have been simply the separate cost of these two missions. That was not his intention, but that was the resolution which had been referred to the Public Accounts Committee. He now proposed to strike out all the words after the word "That" in the resolution which had been moved by the honorable member for Timaru, for the purpose of adding the following words: "A Select Committee be appointed to collect, arrange, investigate, and cause to be printed for the information of this House all the cheques, bills, and accounts connected with the two last missions to England of Sir Julius Vogel, and report on the same; such Committee to consist of Mr. Andrew, the Hon. Major Atkinson, Mr. Lusk, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Rolleston, Mr. Rees, and the mover; with power to call for persons, papers, and accounts; to report within fourteen days, four to be a quorum." He believed, in justice to the gentleman who was sent to England on these missions, after what had taken place in this House, it would be right that a Committee should be appointed, and that the whole matter should be put in a clear light before this House and the public. He begged to move this amendment upon the motion made by the honorable member for Timaru.

Mr. SPEAKER was of opinion that this amendment could not be put, as it appeared to be somewhat similar to the motion made on Tuesday last, and disposed of by the House. The only difference was that this amendment entered more specifically into the modus operandi; but on all points it was materially the same as the question decided on Tuesday last in the negative by the House.

Sir G. GREY asked, upon a point of order, if it would be understood that the Finance Committee would be entitled to cause to be laid before the House copies of all cheques, bills, and accounts connected with the two last missions of Sir Julius Vogel to England. To his mind, the two motions were different. All the Finance Committee could do under the first motion proposed was to return the sum total of the cost of these two missions. He was anxious to have the whole expenses of this kind published, so that the matter might be cleared up. Under the present arrangement every item of expenditure would be furnished.

Mr. SPEAKER said it would have been quite competent for the House on Tuesday last to have adopted the motion for the appointment of a Select Committee, with power to call for papers and persons, with reference to this particular subject; but the House had negatived that motion. The rule for guidance on these points was very clear—namely, that when a question relating to any particular subject had been brought before the House, and a decision given upon it, the same subject could not be brought forward during the current session. It seemed to him that, under the reference to the Finance Committee, that Committee might report to the House all the particulars which the honorable member for the Thames sought to obtain. It would be quite competent for the honorable gentleman, when the report was brought up, if it were not satisfactory to him, to move that it be referred back to the Finance Committee for further consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD might state, for the information of the House, that the Public Accounts Committee had a meeting that day, and it was agreed to postpone the ultimate investigation until this motion, of which he had given notice, had been brought before the House, and the House had come to a decision with reference to it. The Public Accounts Committee gave instructions that every item of expenditure in detail should be prepared by the Treasury as a preliminary step in the investigation. If the honorable member for the Thames was so particularly anxious that the information should be supplied in detail, of course the Committee would not have objected, but the honorable gentleman ought to have specified that opinion in the original motion. Under the original motion the cost of the two missions simply was asked for, and the Committee might have brought up the grand total; but the Committee did not think that course would sufficiently meet the case. The Committee decided that day that the expenditure should be furnished in detail. If the honorable gentleman would consent to act on the Committee, and if the honorable member for Auckland City East were added to it, as suggested by the honorable member for Marsden—and as far as he (Mr. Stafford) was concerned, he should prefer that those honorable gentlemen should be added—they could bring forward a motion that the accounts should be stated in the fullest manner, and he was sure such a motion would receive the general concurrence of the Committee.

Mr. DIGNAN said that, as he understood the motion for the addition of Mr. Rees's name to the Committee could not be put, he would move as an amendment, That all the words after "Public Accounts" be struck out, so that the name of Sir George Grey might be added permanently to the Committee.

Major ATKINSON might say that he would be very glad if the name of the honorable member for Auckland City East could be added to the Committee, and would have supported a motion to that effect if it could have been put. It was desirable, as doubts apparently rested in honorable members' minds as to this question, that all honorable gentlemen who entertained those doubts should themselves thoroughly examine the accounts.

Mr. SPEAKER said, if this were not a reference to the Public Accounts Committee, but to a special Committee, it would have been quite competent to add the name of the honorable member for Auckland City East to that Committee. There had been no order of the House which would prevent the name of that honorable gentleman being added to any Committee to inquire into the Public Accounts; but, inasmuch as his name had been excluded from the Public Accounts Committee during the present session, it would be a violation of the rules of the House now to add his name to that Committee.

Mr. O'RORKE said it was quite competent for the House to rescind the resolution by which the name of the honorable member for Auckland City East was excluded from the Public Accounts Committee, and then to add that honorable gentleman to the Committee. He had no interest in the matter himself; but as the Government and both sides of the House seemed to think it desirable that Mr. Rees should be on the Committee, he would move that the resolution be rescinded.

Mr. SPEAKER thought the House should pause before it rescinded a resolution without notice being given, as it might establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. O'RORKE asked if it could not be done with the consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Of course, and he would put it if the House desired; but he must point out that great evils might arise if such a precedent were established.

Mr. REYNOLDS said the course proposed by the honorable member for Onehunga was most unusual. If it were allowed, it would be quite competent for a motion to be brought forward by any honorable member to pack a Committee that had already been appointed by the House. The motion as it appeared on the Order Paper was perfectly distinct, "That the name of Sir George Grey be added to the Public Accounts Committee, for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the subject-matter referred to that Committee on the 16th instant." The honorable member for Auckland City West could not move his amendment in connection with that motion without first giving notice; because the original motion was simply that Sir George Grey be added for a special purpose, and the amendment was that he be added permanently to the Committee, which was a Parliamentary Committee. That made a great difference. He held, as a point of order, that the amendment could not be put to the House. With regard to the proposition that the honorable member for Auckland City East be added to the Committee for the same purpose, he would have no objection. In fact, he thought it would be advantageous to add the honorable gentleman to the Committee. When the Public Accounts Committee was first appointed, there was a great deal of ill-feeling engendered. It was stated that Auckland was not properly represented on the Committee; and thinking that probably the members of that province might have something to complain of, he resigned. If two Auckland members were now to be elected to the Committee, he thought two additional Otago members should be appointed, and probably two Wellington and two Christchurch members; thus in the end the Committee would consist of nearly the whole House. He contended, subject to Mr. Speaker's ruling, that neither of these amendments could be put to the House without notice being given.

Mr. SPEAKER said there was at present only one amendment before the House—that of the honorable member for Auckland City West; and he knew of no rule which prevented a portion of an original motion being omitted. The amendment of the honorable member for Auckland City West was therefore in order.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought, as they were abolishing the provinces, honorable members should no longer talk of so many members from one province and so many from another being appointed to a Committee. They all represented the whole colony now. He thought the honorable member for Timaru could not have meant that Sir G. Grey should be appointed to the Public Accounts Committee for one special purpose only. Sir G. Grey would certainly be demeaning himself if he accepted a nomination to the Committee under such circumstances, and would be forgetting his position in the House if he were appointed to the Committee merely for one purpose, and, when that was accomplished, had to clear out. If those were the terms of the nomination, he hoped the honorable gentleman would reject them. He believed himself in concessions, and thought the Government had acted with fairness in expressing an opinion that the honorable member for Auckland City East should be added to the Committee. That honorable member ought to be placed on the Committee. Whether rightly or wrongly, many statements had been made with reference to finance which still remained unsettled, and many misapprehensions might be removed by adding Mr. Rees to the Committee. That honorable member might then learn that he was wrong in his opinions, or he might be able to show the other members of the Committee that they were wrong. He bowed to Mr. Speaker's ruling that the amendment of the honorable member for the Thames could not be put; but the amendment for the addition of the name of that honorable member himself might no doubt be put. The question decided on a previous day was, that a special Committee should not be appointed to inquire into this matter, but that it should be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. He would therefore, if necessary, move the addition of words in the motion which would carry out the wishes of the honorable member for the Thames.

Mr. SPEAKER said the Public Accounts Committee had power to call for persons, papers, and accounts, and to report in the fullest possible manner to the House, when, if the House was not satisfied, the report could be referred back to the Committee for reconsideration.

Mr. REYNOLDS trusted the House would not agree to the amendment of the honorable member for Auckland City West. It must be evident that it was taking advantage of a notice of motion on the Paper which was never intended to be dealt with in that way. The honorable member for Timaru, in his motion, desired that the honorable member for the Thames should be placed on the Committee for a special purpose in connection with one particular question, and in order that he might satisfy himself upon it.

Sir G. GREY did not choose to have it said that the object with which he went on that Committee was to satisfy himself. He absolutely denied that such was the case.

Mr. REYNOLDS would withdraw the words. The intention of the motion made by the honorable member for Timaru was very clear. He did not think it would be at all advisable for the House to allow a resolution to be so twisted and changed as to alter its form altogether, and they would be doing that if they struck out those words. It was all very well for honorable gentleman to say that this should not be a question as to whether members from one province or from another should be on the Committee. He quite agreed with that; but still the honorable member had made a very strong point of that when the question came up for consideration on a previous occasion. On that occasion, in consequence of the representations made by honorable members from Auckland, he tendered his resignation of his seat on the Committee. He had done so in order that another Auckland member should be put upon the Committee. He did not want to be on the Committee himself; but it would appear very strange if, after an Auckland member had been elected to fill his place on the Committee, another one were to be added to it without making provision for additional members from other provinces.

Mr. WHITAKER would, as soon as he had an opportunity, move as follows, in order to get rid of the difficulty:—"That the decision of the House of the 21st June last, that Mr. Rees's name be not added to the Committee on Public Accounts, be rescinded: that the names of the Hon. Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Rees be added to the Committee on Public Accounts."

Mr. FISHER hoped that this discussion would not be carried on any longer, as it was not one of a very important nature. If honorable members were to be kept discussing motions of this sort, they would be sitting until three or four o'clock every morning.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

PRESS TELEGRAMS.

Mr. WHITAKER, in moving the motion standing in his name, said it would be in the recollection of honorable members that, a few days previously, when speaking to a motion on the subject of Press telegrams, he pointed out that the evening newspapers were not unfairly used, because they had the same privilege of sending telegrams at reduced rates between five o'clock in the afternoon and eight o'clock in the evening as the morning papers. In addition to that, the evening papers had the privilege of receiving 200 words in the course of the day; and if that privilege were taken away by putting all papers on the same footing, as the resolution passed required, it would be the evening papers that would suffer. The Government were desirous of affording every facility to the evening papers to enable them to receive news consistent with what was due to the public and to the revenue of the colony. He would not speak at any length on the subject, because he did not anticipate that there would be any objection to the motion he was about to propose. He had placed on the Committee several gentlemen who were connected with newspapers, and he thought it would be a suitable Committee to make this inquiry.

Motion made, and question put, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report to the House what facilities can be given to newspapers for the use of the telegraph, consistently with a due regard to its use by the public, and without entailing an undue loss of revenue; such Committee to consist of Mr. Ballance, Mr. Barff, Mr. Joyce, Mr. De Lautour, Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. Montgomery, Mr. Reid, Hon. Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Swanson, and the mover; with power to call for persons and papers; five to be a quorum; and to report within fourteen days."—(Mr. Whitaker.)

Motion agreed to.

ALEXANDER STITT.

Mr. CURTIS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said the petitioner was a contractor under the Government for the execution of certain road works in the Buller Valley. When those works were completed, or, at all events, on the eve of completion, a very heavy slip occurred, which put the contractor to a large amount of additional expense, which he estimated at £2,400. It appeared that the Engineer-in-Chief was in the district at the time, and the contractor saw him, and asked him for some allowance to be made on account of this disaster. There was some discrepancy between the statements of the petitioner and the Engineer-in-Chief as to the nature of what passed at this interview. However, the discrepancy, after all, was not an important one. The petitioner stated that the Engineer-in-Chief admitted he had a just claim on the Government, and said that he would instruct the District Engineer to examine the ground, and estimate the amount he was entitled to claim as compensation. The Engineer-in-Chief stated that he did not recognize the claim as a just one, but that he thought it was one which might be submitted to the consideration of the Government; and he would instruct the District Engineer to say what amount of damage had been done, for the guidance of the Government in considering the question. At all events, the District Engineer did examine the ground, and recommended that £800 should be paid to the contractor to meet the expense to which he had been put. The Petitions Committee, after hearing a good deal of evidence on the subject, came to the conclusion that £800 was justly due in the way of compensation. He might say that the Committee came to this conclusion unanimously; and further than that, they came to it upon the bare statement of the petitioner, unsupported by the evidence on his own part, and after hearing merely the evidence of the officers of the Public Works Department. Therefore he thought there were good grounds for thinking that the case of the petitioner was a very strong one. He hoped the Government would be prepared to save the House further trouble by stating that they would place the amount on the supplementary estimates, and he would then very gladly ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor, praying that he will cause to be placed upon the Supplementary Estimates the sum of £800, in order to carry out the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee contained in their report upon the petition of Alexander Stitt."—(Mr. Curtis.)

Mr. TOLLE wished to correct a misstatement made by the honorable gentleman, who said that the Committee came to a unanimous conclusion upon the bare statement of the petitioner. He thought he was right in saying that there was a recommendation made by the District Engineer that the petitioner should receive £800. It was mainly upon the recommendation of that officer that the Committee came to their decision.

Mr. RICHARDSON was not going to oppose the resolution for going into Committee, but he wished to intimate that the Government intended to oppose the vote in Committee. He did not oppose the resolution now, because there would be a much better opportunity of discussing a matter of this sort in Committee. With regard to the statement as to what took place at the interview, the Engineer-in-Chief distinctly stated that what he then said was that the subject was a fit one for the consideration of the Government, and that he would direct the District Officer to report. The District Engineer, Mr. Dobson, reported upon the matter, and said,—

"During the progress of the work, I informed the contractor that I considered clause 6, General Conditions, Form E. No. 2, debarred him from any claim; but as I understood from you that in extraordinary cases the Government do not strictly enforce that clause, I forward his letter with favourable comment."

"I have carefully examined the whole question, and consider it would be reasonable to allow the contractor £800 as being the fair cost of work executed which could not possibly have been foreseen, and which was entirely caused by slips from the hill destroying the road."

Now, the view taken by the Government was that, when a tenderer undertook to make road-works and to deliver them over in a finished state, he was bound to take all those risks. If that rule was not enforced, he did not know where the claims would stop. There was a possibility—although he did not say it was the case—that another contractor who tendered might have taken a better view of the case, and allowed a large amount for the danger of such a loss.

Mr. KELLY did not think the petitioner in this case had any legal claim against the Government. After reading the report and recommendation of the local Engineer, who had full knowledge of the circumstances of the case, the Petitions Committee arrived at the conclusion that the petitioner was entitled to £800, because the slips were of an extraordinary character, and could not be fairly calculated upon when the tenders were sent in. It appeared that about £1,600 was the cost to the contractor of removing the slips. Still, it must be admitted that the payment of this claim might possibly open the door to much larger claims.

Mr. BUTON would support the claim, because he believed it was a good equitable claim. He believed the petitioner had no legal claim against the Government, but he certainly had a very strong moral claim. The Committee, he thought, did well in making this recommendation. He understood this was not the case of an ordinary slip occurring; but the nature of the ground was quite different from what was anticipated, and the batter allowed in the specifications was not adapted to the ground. It was not an ordinary incident that might have been foreseen. The contractor had carried out the work according to the specifications, and he believed the petitioner had been ruined, or nearly so, by the accident. Under the circumstances, he thought the amount recommended was a very moderate sum. He did not know that the Government should always adhere to the very letter of their contracts, and draw the line so very tight. There were cases, such as this one, in which they might allow the contractor to petition, when the House could investigate the facts, and decide whether the case was an extraordinary one. He felt inclined to support the motion now before the House.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTOR OF PRISONS.

Mr. BURNS, in moving the motion standing in name, said he had placed it on the Order Paper in consequence of the reply he received on the previous day from the Minister of Justice. He did not wish the Government to imagine for a moment that he was finding fault with what had been done, because, as the Minister of Justice had stated, they had only carried out the wishes of the House. But the House this session had come to the conclusion that there was to be no central prison built this year, at all events; and he thought that, under these circumstances, such an officer could be dispensed with, at least for this year. If his memory served him, the Minister of Justice said no reply had as yet been received from the Home country to the applications for such an officer, and he wished at the earliest possible moment to enable the House to retrace its steps, and that, if no officer had been appointed, the appointment should be at once cancelled. The only way of doing that now would be by sending a cablegram to England. If the officer was appointed, he supposed there was no help for it; but if he were not appointed, he thought, at all events, the appointment should be delayed until next session. There was another feature in the case. If an officer of this kind was necessary at all, why should they go to the Home country to get him? Surely there were officers in this country who were competent to fill such a position. And while upon this subject, he felt bound to say that there were other countries in the world where the prison discipline was perhaps better than that of the old country. He was quite sure the prison discipline of Victoria and the management of its gaols were very much superior to the discipline and management of the old country; and they could find officers of their own who could satisfy all the requirements of the position. The time had arrived when in all the branches of the public service a reasonable hope of promotion should be held out. It was not fair to an officer who had been a number of years in the service, and was capable of filling a higher position, that he should find an outsider placed over his head. He knew nothing of the gaol officials in other parts of the colony, but he knew of one gaoler who had done his duty remarkably well; nay, more, he was in the proud position of saying that the gaol of which he had charge was the only gaol in the colony that was self-supporting. Another matter which he might mention to the credit of this officer was, that he took charge of some Maori rebel prisoners at a time when it was almost impossible to get any gaoler to take charge of them. Not only that, but he took charge of a number of prisoners, convicted of serious crimes, whose safe keeping was considered a matter of great doubt. His whole career, during the time he had had charge of the gaol, had been thoroughly satisfactory, and it was recognized that his management was a credit to the whole colony. There might be other officers equal to him, or perhaps superior—he was not going to cast a slur upon any of them; but it was rather hard to find that an officer who bore such a high character should be denied the opportunity of promotion. If an Inspector of Prisons were required—he very much doubted it—the appointment should be made from amongst their own officers. In the meantime, he hoped the House would agree that a telegram should be sent, without the least delay, stopping the appointment of any officer in England.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That Government be requested to transmit a cablegram to Great Britain without any delay, cancelling the appointment, or promised appointment, of any person to the office of Inspector-General of Prisons."—(Mr. Burns.)

Mr. BOWEN said there were two questions involved in the honorable gentleman's motion—first, as to whether there should be an Inspector of Prisons; and second, as to whether he should be selected in England. He hoped the House would pay great attention to the matter, and act dispassionately, and altogether apart from mere local or temporary considerations. It was quite true, as stated by the honorable gentleman, that the House had thought fit to postpone the erection of a central prison, thereby postponing for some time the only real means of classifying the prisoners of the colony, and the only real means of carrying out the sentence of penal servitude which was already provided for by our Statutes. He did not wish to recur to that now; still, he wished to point out that, important as it was, that the management and classification of the prisoners in our gaols should be uniform, and carried out with skill and special knowledge; it was equally important that such gaols as we had should be classified, in order to adapt them for the work they had to do. The subject had been under consideration in England lately, and a Prisons Bill was brought in to make the system of prison management uniform throughout that country. Hitherto the management had been in the hands of the different boroughs and counties, and when the Bill was first introduced into Parliament it met with considerable opposition through the action of some of the county Justices. The Bill was postponed for three weeks to test the feeling of the country on the subject. The Magistrates of the Quarter Sessions met all over the country, and the almost unanimous verdict was that the Prisons Bill was absolutely necessary. The Chief Justice of England, a man known as one of the ablest Judges we ever had, went so far as to say from the bench, that although he seldom alluded to any matter that was under the consideration of the Legislature, he felt it his duty to say that if the Prison Bill were thrown out it would be a great disaster to the country, because without uniformity of management in the gaols no Judge knew what sentence he was passing on a prisoner. They knew very well that in New Zealand, owing to the multifarious methods of managing the gaols, there was nothing like uniformity. It was also very well known to those interested in the matter that the Visiting Justices took very different views upon the question of prison management. Not only was the classification very different, but the indulgence given to prisoners was very different, so much so that no Judge knew what sentence he was passing when he sentenced a prisoner. If the warning of the Chief Justice of England were necessary as to the management of gaols at Home, how much more necessary must it be here! It was therefore imperative—more imperative now than there was to be no central prison—that there should be a skilled Inspector whose duty it would be to see that the regulations were uniformly carried out throughout the country, and the prisoners properly classified. In addition, he would have to classify the gaols themselves; and thus a Judge, in sentencing a prisoner to penal servitude, would know the exact nature of the punishment he inflicted. As to whether the Inspector should be selected in England or from amongst the prison officials of the colony, he quite agreed with the honorable member for Roslyn that it was advisable, wherever they could, to select men who were already in the service of the country, provided they possessed the necessary ability; but the honorable gentleman must know that prison discipline had undergone great improvement of late years, and had been the subject of considerable discussion. Congresses of men interested in the question of gaol management from all parts of Europe and America had been held, and the improvements initiated by Sir Walter Crofton had so far been deemed of the greatest benefit to the country. Many improvements had been adopted of late years, amongst them the "mark" system, which had been very successful; and there were no men in the colony who knew anything of the practical working of those systems. He was aware that many honorable gentlemen did not lay the same stress upon classification as he did. They knew little of the absolute inhumanity and of the wrongs done by want of classification; but if they devoted a little attention to the subject, they would see that he did not exaggerate the importance of uniformity and classification. The honorable gentleman had made special reference to one particular officer in Dunedin. As far as he had been able to judge, and from what he had heard, the officer alluded to was a very useful officer; but at the same time he thought the honorable gentleman would admit that it was very wrong indeed that a constant agitation should be made in favour of one particular officer, and that constant pressure should be put upon the Government in favour of the appointment of a particular individual to a particular office. He had had the claims of this officer pressed on his attention for the last two years. It was true he was a good officer, but there were other good gaolers in New Zealand: in fact, the gaolers, as a rule, considering the very poor means they had at their disposal, had done their work exceedingly well, and he would be very glad, when any opportunity occurred, to recognize these services. But he felt bound to say that he knew of no man in New Zealand at the present time who was competent to take the position of organizing Inspector. He confessed that the Government felt very considerable responsibility in regard to the management of the gaols, and he did not see how, otherwise than in the manner adopted by the House last year, and in accordance with which steps had been taken, the work could be done properly and efficiently. Under the present system, they were merely breeding criminals, by mixing up young and old offenders; for, as he had said many times before, the gaols at present were a species of purgatory to the young offender, while they were a comparative paradise to the old offender. He hoped the House would pause before it agreed to such a resolution, because he did not see how it was possible, with the very limited means at the disposal of the colony, to properly manage the gaols. It was essential that such an officer should be appointed. As to what had been done, he might say that instructions were sent to the Agent-General to put himself in communication with Judge Richmond, who was now in England, and with Mr. Ducane, the Inspector-General of Prisons, and to request that an officer should be selected—a man of education, a man who was not merely acquainted with all the best systems of gaol discipline in the old country, but a man who had enough of adaptability to meet the circumstances of a new country. And in such a matter the Government felt great confidence in the experience of Judge Richmond, which must be of great value in the matter. They received a letter in April last, stating that the Agent-General had postponed the selection of the officer until Judge Richmond's return from the Continent, because he was anxious to get that gentleman's advice. As honorable gentlemen were aware, communication on the subject was interrupted by the lamented death of the Agent-General; but it was one of the first subjects which would engage the attention of the office as soon as Judge Richmond had returned to London. He sincerely hoped the House would look carefully into the matter, and deal with it altogether apart from any local, or temporary, or party considerations.

Mr. CURTIS hoped the House would not interfere with the action the Government had taken in this matter. It was necessary to have an officer thoroughly skilled in the best mode of treating, and especially classifying criminals. He quite agreed with the Minister of Justice that this was more particularly necessary since the decision the House had arrived at recently. In regard to the particular officer who had been referred to as being specially fitted for this office, he had always heard a very good account of him; but he had chiefly heard his name mentioned in connection with the management of the prison at Dunedin, and the manner in which he had succeeded in making that institution self-supporting. However, upon that point he had some little experience, and he was not quite prepared to indorse all that appeared in the reports of that officer on the subject of the gaol at Dunedin. Some time since he had occasion to send some prisoners from the gaol at Nelson, owing to the smallness of the building, to the gaol at Dunedin. He was a good deal surprised, some year or two afterwards, at receiving an account forwarded by the Superintendent of Otago for the maintenance of those prisoners at a tolerably heavy figure. He replied that he was very much surprised to receive the account, because he understood that the gaol at Dunedin was altogether self-supporting, or rather more than self-supporting, and, in fact, he had been in hopes of receiving some small sum as the surplus value of the labour of those prisoners over the cost of the maintenance. He received from the Superintendent of Otago a very long letter of explanation, the nature of which he now forgot; but of course it was more or less satisfactory, and it did seem, according to the statement the honorable gentleman then sent him, that there was some expense in maintaining the prisoners at the Dunedin Gaol, notwithstanding the character of the reports referred to. He had no doubt whatever that the keeper of the gaol at Dunedin was a very excellent officer indeed: still, he quite agreed with the Minister of Justice that it was of very great importance that a man should be appointed who was thoroughly acquainted with the latest methods of dealing with criminals and the management of gaols. It would be more especially unfortunate to interfere with the action of the Government, seeing that Judge Richmond, a gentleman on whom they all placed such very strong reliance, had been engaged in selecting an officer.

Mr. REYNOLDS trusted the House would not interfere with the arrangements made by the Government. It might have been very well last session to have given instructions to the Government to secure a suitable person in the colony; but it was then stated that the Government would appoint a gentleman from Home to undertake these duties, and the House indorsed that. Now that instructions had been given for the appointment of the officer, it was not right for honorable members to throw obstacles in the way of the Government, in carrying out the wishes of the House last session. The honorable member for Roslyn referred to Mr. Caldwell, the Gaoler at Dunedin, as fitted for the office. He was quite prepared to admit that Mr. Caldwell was a very able man, and that he was the right man in the right place in the position where he was. He was a good gaoler, and he did not know a better in the colony. But, even supposing he were qualified to hold the office of Inspector-General of Prisons, his claim would be inadmissible after what had taken place to his own knowledge. The Otago members had taken up Mr. Caldwell's case and urged it to such an extent that it would be impolitic for the Government to appoint him under such circumstances. A great amount of pressure had been brought upon the Government, not only by members from Otago, but by parties outside the House, in order to secure Mr. Caldwell the appointment. He learnt from telegrams that Mr. Caldwell had sent up a telegram to the Superintendent of Otago asking him to bring forward a grievance which he thought he had against him (Mr. Reynolds) personally. The telegram stated he had been the means of preventing Mr. Caldwell from being appointed to this office. This he would deny in toto; and he could appeal to Ministers, whether he had anything to do with prejudicing them against appointing Mr. Caldwell. He had always said that he was a very good gaoler; still he had never urged his appointment as Inspector. The instructions sent Home were forwarded after he left the Government, and he had no more to do with them than the honorable member for Roslyn had. He had not thought it worth his while previously to contradict those statements, but was waiting until the Superintendent of Otago made an attack upon him with reference to the subject. While admitting that Mr. Caldwell was a good gaoler, and well adapted for the position he held, he would now state, and this for the first time, that he thought it would be a mistake for the Government to appoint him to the highly responsible position of Inspector of Gaols for the colony.

Mr. ROLLESTON would, for his own part, give the Government a decided support. It was known to the Government that for a long time past he had urged upon them the appointment of inspectors of gaols, of lunatic asylums, and of surveys, for he believed large sums of money had been lost because men like himself, who were engaged in administration, had not the knowledge of modern systems and modern appliances, which would have enabled them to deal properly with questions of this kind. Almost everything in a gaol or lunatic asylum depended upon proper appliances, and good methods of construction, and there was no doubt they could not expect, unless they brought people from Home, to understand the modern system of constructing gaol and asylum buildings according to the most improved methods. With regard to gaols, he would like to learn from the Government whether they were going to let another year pass without more thoroughly organizing the local gaols. Particular mention had been made of the Wellington Gaol. He did not say that that gaol was badly managed. Far from it; for he believed that, considering the available appliances, it was exceedingly well managed; but there was no doubt that additional room was needed. A great wrong would be done if the Government did not make provision for increasing the gaols, after having prevented the provinces from doing so, for the provinces would have been bound to do so.

Mr. BOWEN said the Wellington Gaol was being added to.

Mr. ROLLESTON was glad to hear it. He hoped the discussion would not last, because, the Government having stated that they intended to insist in their course, no good could come of a debate. He was very glad the Government had sent Home for an Inspector of Prisons, and he hoped they would do the same with regard to lunatic asylums. He was happy to think that the surveys were placed under a uniform system, and that there was a means for connecting, in accordance with a general plan, the detached surveys in the colony.

Mr. MURRAY thought the case in point was an illustration of the saying "That a prophet hath honor save in his own country." He did not know Mr. Caldwell personally, but he had heard of his "reports." Even in America Mr. Caldwell's experience had been commented on in the highest possible terms, and in Victoria also he was appreciated; but in New Zealand, the place where he was known, it was thought necessary by the Government to import an officer of whom they knew nothing. They had had enough of that system of believing that nothing in New Zealand could be satisfactory. Major Palmer had been imported to be Surveyor-General; but that was defeated by the action of the late member for Dunedin, Mr. Wales, who moved a resolution in the previous Parliament to the effect that they should try to get a suitable officer in the colony. They had succeeded in getting a gentleman who would be very much more efficient than Major Palmer; and the House might just as well try to get an Inspector of Prisons from Otago as to get a Surveyor-General, and he believed the result would be equally satisfactory. The Government had also sent to India for a Conservator of Forests; but he really thought it was time, now that their difficulties were facing them, to get rid of this manufacturing appointments and importing gentlemen to control departments in the colony. He trusted they would not go beyond New Zealand without first trying if they could get efficient officers here.

Mr. BUTON did not think this was simply a question as to whether a certain gentleman was fit to perform the duties of gaoler, for the appointment the House was now discussing was of a very different class from that of a mere gaoler. If they had one central prison for the colony, and required it to be managed by a man of experience and judgment, and whose testimonials were influential, he did not doubt that the gentleman referred to would be the very best officer to appoint. They need not travel out of New Zealand to find such an officer. The Inspector of Prisons would be largely responsible for the initiation of the scheme the Government proposed to introduce, and he would require to be a person of experience. He had seen the testimonials which had been put into his hands with respect to Mr. Caldwell, and he found that that officer had great experience in these matters, and was eminently calculated to fill the office of gaoler in a central prison, however large it might be. But he contended that, unless Mr. Caldwell had gained experience of the present prison discipline in England, and had been able to see the most modern methods of treating and classifying prisoners, they must look elsewhere for such experience. He did not think they should look out of New Zealand if they could find a suitable man in it, and he did not think the Government would do so. The matter should be left in the hands of the Government, and he was sure that, all other things being equal, they would rather appoint a colonist than bring any one out from England. He had no doubt that, if the Government found it necessary to go beyond the limits of the colony for such an officer, they would take very good care that they got a quid pro quo for the salary they paid.

Mr. HISLOP thought the honorable member for Hokitika was trying to beg the question. If the intention of the Government had been that any person in the colony should have an equal chance with any one outside, he did not suppose that any one would have complained, but the Government had entirely overlooked the claims of persons in the colony fitted for this office, and had sent Home for some person. He thought the statements which had been made to the effect that Mr. Caldwell was not fit to hold this office were entirely erroneous. He had the pleasure of knowing that gentleman for a great number of years, and he had been the means of introducing to that officer various persons interested in gaol discipline, for the purpose of visiting the gaol, who all expressed themselves pleased with what they saw. He could say that persons well acquainted with gaols at Home, and particularly Dr. Begg, of Edinburgh, were highly pleased with the manner in which that officer carried out the system of classification—so far as he could in Dunedin Gaol—and the manner in which the prison was managed. The Government, before sending Home for a person, ought to have made a statement as to whether they had inquired into the qualifications of the various officers of that department in the colony. The testimonials put into their hands with regard to Mr. Caldwell were not the full testimonials as to his capabilities; they were the testimonials recommending him for the position he was applying for at the time, and which position he had filled with great satisfaction to the country. He had come from very well regulated gaols in other colonies, where he had far greater means of classifying prisoners and carrying out gaol discipline. Notwithstanding the circumstances in which he was placed, he carried out the gaol system in Dunedin in a manner which had been generally looked upon as satisfactory. With regard to the question raised by the honorable member for Nelson City, the honorable gentleman did not seem to remember the peculiar circumstances connected with the prisoners sent to the Dunedin Gaol. One of the prisoners sent was imprisoned for murder: not only was he a most dangerous character, but he was also an invalid. He had been ill for a long time, and had to be attended by two surgeons. No doubt that swelled the charge made against the Nelson Province. He hoped the motion would be carried.

Mr. MACFARLANE said his principal objection to the appointment of an Inspector-General was that such an officer was not wanted. He might be wrong, but that was his opinion. He imagined that the gaols of the colony had been carried on very well, without the services of such a person. On one occasion an officer had been imported from New South Wales, who turned out a very great failure, and it might be so in this case. The office was not wanted at all; it would be similar to the Forests Department, or the other fancy departments which the Government were creating in this country. He thought any money at the disposal of the Government might be more beneficially expended than in importing an Inspector-General of Prisons.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR regretted that Mr. Caldwell's name should have been mentioned in this discussion—that his name should have been exposed and trampled on by honorable members of this House, who did not know his value. It was not a question as to the appointment of Mr. Caldwell to this office at all. The question was, were they justified, in the present position of the colony, in creating another department and sending Home for an officer at a salary of £1,000 a year, and also paying his passage to the colony? They would probably find themselves in this position, that the officer would be engaged at this salary for one year, and the next year the panic about finance would have so increased that the office would be wiped out.

Mr. BOWEN.—The salary is to be £600 a year.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Has the honorable gentleman instructed the Agent-General not to pay more than £600?

Mr. BOWEN.—Yes.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR was afraid they could not secure and retain the services of an Inspector-General of Prisons, of sufficient ability, for such a salary; and so the first loss would be the only loss. With regard to what the honorable member for Nelson City had said, he did not think the honorable gentleman would obtain much sympathy in the House, because it was very obvious that Nelson had been carrying on sharp practice. It would appear that Nelson wanted Otago to keep the criminals sent from that province free of charge; but the Superintendent of Otago was not the man to put up with such a thing as that.

Mr. CURTIS might explain that the Superintendent of Otago could not be allowed to charge one penny more than the actual cost of maintenance of prisoners after deducting the value of their labour.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR quite admitted that; but there was no doubt an attempt had been made to have the prisoners kept without cost, otherwise no letter would have been sent from Nelson complaining of the charge for the maintenance of prisoners in the Dunedin Gaol. He hoped the House would agree to this motion, because the officer that might be engaged for a salary of £600 a year would merely be an officer of a county gaol, and the county gaols in England were not to be compared with some of the gaols in this colony. There were some model prisons at Home, but the officers connected with them were paid large salaries. The Government could only get an inferior officer from a central prison at such a salary as was mentioned.

Mr. BOWEN.—You are quite mistaken.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR might be mistaken, but they would know better next year whether he was mistaken or not. If it was not too late it would be desirable to incur a small expense in stopping the appointment of a person to the office of Inspector-General of Prisons.

Sir G. GREY trusted the Government would pause in the appointment they proposed to make. He thought it was a very unfortunate thing for New Zealand that the Minister of Justice had not more piercing eyes; he raised his vision so high that he overlooked things near him. It was only yesterday that the question arose of appointing a parliamentary draftsman, and the honorable gentleman stated that he could find no person qualified for that office in New Zealand. He (Sir G. Grey) declared that he knew several persons thoroughly qualified. He knew some young men who, if put into that office, would make a distinguished name for themselves, and greatly improve the statutes of New Zealand. The honorable gentleman could not discover them. They existed, and the honorable gentleman ought to discover them. Now, the honorable member told them that he could find no person in New Zealand qualified to fill the office of Inspector-General of Prisons which the Government proposed to set up. He (Sir G. Grey) knew several persons in New Zealand fully qualified to fulfil the duties of such an office. The question connected with appointments being made in England was a much larger one than might at first be supposed. It was quite clear that, if they wished to give any opening to men in this country, or desired to induce men to come into the country, they should not discourage people living in their midst. There was nothing more detrimental to the development of character in a nation than the highest offices in that nation being closed against the inhabitants of the country. They had had several instances of this kind. A singular one has been named—namely, the importing of a person to fill the office of Inspector of State Forests. He could assure the House that in New Zealand there were at least three gentlemen eminently qualified to fill that office—two of them of great repute as botanists in countries far beyond New Zealand—men with names much greater in the world at large than that of the gentleman appointed—men qualified by study of the country, by botanical knowledge, by devotion to duty, by claims established in this country from services rendered by them. Their merits were overlooked in favour of a stranger possessing no qualifications at all to be compared to theirs, who was put into a great office of that kind. That was a great misfortune to them, and a great misfortune to the inhabitants of New Zealand generally, and it was a very unfair thing to the inhabitants of this colony. Then the case of the Surveyor-General was named. Now, none could deny that there were several gentlemen in New Zealand eminently qualified to fill the office of Surveyor-General. It was a mere chance that they got an inhabitant of New Zealand put into that office. He did not know where they were to stop such a system. He did not wish to use any words of flattery to the Speaker, but it was fortunate for them that he presided over their deliberations; he wondered that the honorable gentlemen did not send Home for a Speaker. He really did not know where this proceeding would stop. Formerly the custom of this country was that the youth of New Zealand were collected—promising young men—and put into offices in the public service, and allowed to develop themselves there, and they were raised to the highest offices in the country from time to time. In what respect did that fail? The leading members of the Civil Service at the present day all sprang from a proceeding of that kind and of that nature. He still hoped that the Government would determine fairly to select the officer who was to exercise a supervision over the gaols in this country from amongst the inhabitants of this country. He had not heard a single argument in favour of a different course being pursued; in fact, the whole proceeding of the Government in this respect appeared to him to be a great mistake. While there were men in New Zealand well qualified to fill this office, the Government were going to the expense of appointing a gentleman in England, who would certainly be inferior to those men he left behind him in that country, because the best men would not come out to this colony for the amount of salary to be paid. They would be entailing considerable expense on the colony, and they would not get a better man for the office than if they made a selection from qualified men in this country. Whilst they were doing that in reference to England, at that end of the world they had a gentleman now acting as Agent-General, who was probably the best man in Her Majesty's dominions for filling that office—a gentleman who had rendered great services in New Zealand formerly in the field—a gentleman who had illustrated this country by pen and pencil—who had rendered great service to England in many capacities, whose ability was so recognized there that he was put into the highest office which his position in life enabled him to hold. That gentleman was to be turned out of the office of Agent-General, and another gentleman, certainly not superior to him, was to be sent Home at an expense which the House had not yet been able to get a proper account of. That was another proceeding of the same kind taken in a direction which he could not understand. At least, he could not get the reasons why it should be followed out. He would wish to point out that one excuse made by the Minister of Justice for the course he was pursuing was one which he could not understand. The honorable member complained that there was a very meritorious officer in this country, but that that officer had been continuously pressed upon his notice for many months past, and the honorable gentleman complained of that as a grievance. But surely, too much pressure had nothing to do with the question. If the person were fit for the appointment, too much pressure by his supporters should not be a bar to his receiving it. He did not mean to say that this particular gentleman should be selected, but some person in the colony should have the first chance of obtaining the appointment, and that such a person could be obtained he was satisfied from his knowledge of the inhabitants of the country. He trusted the House would not allow such an evil to be inflicted upon New Zealand as that prize offices should be given to foreigners brought in for the purpose. He spoke of them as foreigners because they were unknown to the people of the country. If such a course were pursued it would shut out all expectation from those who by their past services to the country had a claim to fill those vacancies which fortune might present. He would certainly support the motion of the honorable member for Roslyn.

Mr. SHEEHAN was sorry that the name of Mr. Caldwell had been dragged into this debate. He understood the Superintendent of Nelson had some complaint against that gentleman, arising out of something connected with the transfer of prisoners from Nelson to Otago. But honorable gentlemen well knew the crafty and cunning tendencies of the people of Nelson, and could easily imagine how the unsophisticated people of Otago might be taken in by them, and he had no doubt the people of Nelson came best out of this transaction. He intended to support this motion, not because he was a member of the Opposition, but because both sides of the House admitted that the present was a somewhat critical period in the finances of the colony. It was therefore not a time for the creation of new offices, or for incurring fresh expenditure. If it could be shown that it was a case of emergency to appoint this officer at once, he would go with the Government; but no such emergency existed. The House had already put off the consideration of a central penal establishment to next session, and he contended that in the meantime the Visiting Justices and present machinery would be sufficient during the recess. As the two questions were somewhat analogous, the Government would do well to postpone this question also till next session. He also considered that the appointment of an Inspector would only be preliminary to the appointment of many other new officers. The House had an instance of this sort of thing on the previous evening, when it passed the vote for the Inspector of Stores' Department. When that officer was first appointed, it was stated he would do all the work; that he would himself go round the colony and inspect all the stores. But now there was not only an Inspector of Stores but also an inspecting officer, a chief clerk, four other clerks, railway store clerk, and extra clerical assistance, causing the colony an expense of £2,300 a year. It would be found in the same way that in twelve months from the appointment of an Inspector of Prisons there would be clerks and a number of other officers to assist him, and a regular department would be established. On the other part of the subject, he held that if this officer were to be appointed, the Government should first satisfy themselves that there was no suitable person in the colony to take the office before they sent Home for one. Let them first look amongst those who had cast their lot in with the colony. What hopes were there for good men to come to the colony if, when such appointments as this were to be made, the Government sent Home for the person to fill it? It was, to his mind, a mistake to pass over men of experience in the colony and go to England for them. He contended that England was not so superior to New Zealand as some persons appeared to imagine in the management of gaols. They had by no means arrived at the best system in many parts of England; whereas there was in one or two places in New Zealand as good a system of prison discipline as could be found anywhere. It was unfair to pass over men who had come out here and spent the best years of their lives in developing the colony, and to go to England for an officer for this appointment. It was a pity Mr. Caldwell's name had been dragged in; but, as it had been, he would say that in the central prison in Auckland, the surrounding walls of which were wood, great difficulty had been experienced in keeping prisoners in. Many had escaped, and an arrangement had been made by the Superintendent of Auckland with the Superintendent of Otago to transfer some of the more dangerous to the prison at Dunedin. There they were kept safely, and at a cost no greater than if they had been kept in Auckland. That was an answer to the complaint of the Superintendent of Nelson.

The Government ought to let this matter stand over for the present, consider it during the recess, and, if they found it necessary to make the appointment, select some one in the colony to fill the office, if they could find any one competent to do so.

Mr. HARPER said that most honorable members who had addressed the House seemed to be ignorant of the subject on which they were talking. He did not profess himself to have any special knowledge of it; but the few remarks which had fallen from the Minister of Justice and the honorable member for Aron, who had evidently carefully studied the subject, led him to the conclusion that some of the remarks of those who opposed this appointment betrayed the ignorance of the speakers. The honorable member who had last addressed the House stated that no emergency existed at the present moment for this appointment. Possibly it was so, and therefore the honorable member proposed that the question should be adjourned for another twelve months. The speech of the Minister of Justice, however, showed that the evil was growing rapidly, and, unless some system of classification of prisoners were adopted, serious consequences would result. If that were the case, the evil should be checked at once. It would take fully twelve months to obtain this officer and enable him to organize his work; and if the appointment were postponed for that time, the prison discipline would remain in its present unsatisfactory state. This was one of those cases in which the economy of which honorable members spoke so much would be found very expensive. It would be far better to spend some little money now and get a good officer—a man who knew something of the new appliances of the large prisons at Home, and whose knowledge of how to use those appliances would, he believed, save the colony afterwards a considerable amount of expense. The House had heard, from the honorable member for Aron, what he had found it necessary to do in the administration of the prison in Canterbury. That honorable gentleman had found it necessary to take a course similar to that proposed by the Government, because he could not find a good man in the place. The person who was brought out from England had saved the province money, by bringing to the assistance of his fellow-officers those new appliances which, although well known in England, had not previously reached New Zealand, and were not likely to be known here except through the introduction of new blood. As he had already said, this was just one of those cases in which economy now would lead the colony to great expense hereafter. The subject was of too serious a character to be passed over as one of those which, in the present state of the finances, should be put off for a time. It was one of the most serious questions that could be brought before the House. Even if good officers could be found in New Zealand, the House must remember that if one of them was appointed to this office he would be taken away from his present work, and somebody else would have to be found to put in his place. Consequently, if an officer were brought from England it would only be adding a fresh officer to those already in the colony, and not one too many, for they would all find plenty of work to do. He could not therefore support the motion.

Mr. HUNTER thought those who had spoken in support of this motion did not quite understand the position in which the colony would soon be in regard to these gaols. As he understood it, the Government would, under the new system, take upon themselves the control of all the gaols in the colony. The House had this session thought it proper to decree that in the meantime there should not be a large central penal establishment. The Government could, however, usefully employ this officer, and arrange for the classification of prisoners by sending him round the colony. When a uniform system was established throughout the colony, a Judge passing sentence upon a prisoner could send him to the prison in which it would be best to place him. The system would be very much improved if some person were appointed to control all the gaols throughout the colony, because then measures could be taken for removing prisoners from one place to another as was thought advisable, and the expense would not be much. Some reference had been made that day and on the previous evening to the resolution passed last session in favour of sending to England for some person specially qualified to draft Bills. At the time that matter was discussed, the Government said it was not likely that the services of a proper person could be obtained in the colony for the salary that was offered. It was a particular profession in England; and, as no persons in the colony devoted themselves to it solely, he thought it would be impossible to get a duly-qualified officer without going to England. However, he considered that in such a matter as that the Government should be allowed to exercise their own discretion. With regard to the question immediately under consideration, he held the same opinion—namely, that the Government should use their own discretion as to whether they sent out of the colony for an Inspector of Prisons or not. They had, he believed, a very good and efficient gaoler in the city of Wellington; but he would not presume for one moment to say that that officer was a proper person to appoint to the position of Inspector of Prisons. They required a man of very large experience for that office. The Minister of Justice had referred to the Prisons Bill, which had been introduced in England lately. It had been ascertained, while that Bill was under consideration, that the cost of some gaols was twice as much as that of others, simply owing to the manner in which they were administered. He did not think there was a person in the colony who would be competent to fill such a position as that of Inspector of Prisons for the colony. Holding those views, he would feel it his duty to vote against the motion; and he thought the Government would be wise in following up their action, so that they might be able to get some person from England who would be able to effect an improvement which was very much wanted in the system of gaol management. The present system was unjust both to the public and to the criminals. There were no means of classification whatever, and even those who were disposed to mend their ways, while in gaol had not an opportunity afforded them of keeping themselves separate from those who were bolder in crime than themselves. With regard to the Wellington Gaol, he might say that a division of the prisoners was made there already; but before it could be called a proper system of classification, there would have to be considerable additions made to the building.

Mr. HENRY said the only objection he had to this appointment was on account of the salary that was put down on the estimates for the person who was to fill the position. To secure a proper officer they should offer a much higher salary—in fact, it should be at least £1,000 a year. They should either have a suitable officer or none at all; and £1,000 a year was little for a person holding such a position. He had had some experience in relation to prisons, and knew that it required a great deal of care and attention to institute a proper system of classification.

Mr. LUMSDEN was rather surprised at what had fallen from the honorable member for Roslyn. He certainly thought the colony had arrived at that stage when it should be able to cope with its own prison management. He believed that in Otago the gaol had been very successfully worked, and he could not see why it was necessary to go outside the colony for an Inspector of Prisons. He believed there were some very able persons now superintending our prisons; and he thought it would be well if the talent which was already in the colony could be made available when they had such a position as this to bestow. He thought the introduction of a stranger as Inspector of Prisons would not have a good effect on prison management generally throughout the colony. The classification of prisoners could only be obtained by the extension of the present prison buildings; but that was a question totally separate from that of having a fresh Inspector to take charge of all the gaols. He had no doubt that the gentleman who had been named as being an efficient officer in Otago would, if proper accommodation were placed at his disposal, be able to initiate a proper system of classification. He had a great objection to the continual creation of new offices. One of the greatest evils in connection with the Immigration and Public Works policy had been the creation of new offices, arising, as it appeared, out of the simple desire to spend money as fast as it was borrowed. But that would come to an end, and those who had introduced the measure would then become very unpopular. It would be better for them to take Time by the fore-lock, and endeavour to reduce the expenditure as far as possible. They should begin to retrench at once; and they could not make a better beginning than by striking this office of Inspector of Prisons out altogether, so far, at least, as sending to England for an Inspector was concerned, but rather making use of the talent that was already in the colony.

Mr. CARRINGTON would say a few words on this question, if only for the purpose of showing the inconsistency of honorable members of the House. Session after session they had been calling upon the Government to establish a central prison; but no sooner had Ministers taken steps to do so than they met with opposition on all sides. Then, as to the question of classifying prisoners. Persons might be sentenced to terms of imprisonment in Auckland and Otago, and one of them would have to do ten times as much work as the other; because in different places the work to be done by convicts was very different. Until there was some system of classification, there could be no equality in the quantity of work done by prisoners in different places.

Mr. SWANSON thought that if that was the only difficulty, it could be easily got over. The Minister of Justice could easily find out where the most work was done, and they could choose the gaoler who got the most work out of the prisoners for the position of Inspector of Prisons. Such a man would be the best for the country and for the prisoners too. The great fault was this: that prisoners was sentenced to so much time, instead of so much labour. He would like to see the prisoners sentenced to do a certain amount of labour. If men were compelled to work hard during their term of imprisonment, they would go out of gaol in much better fettle than they did at present, and would be in a much better position to earn their own livelihood. It was not a man's short hair that prevented him from getting employment after he left gaol, but the fact that he had been away from hard work for such a length of time that his hands would get blistered whenever he attempted to do anything, and therefore he was practically useless to an employer. They could quite understand what sending Home for an Inspector of Prisons meant. They wanted to get a man of good education—a man who would give a tone to society: one of the kid-glove class. If this motion were not carried, and the Government brought a person out from England to act as Inspector of Prisons, the whole of the gaolers in the colony would become his servants. He could easily conceive that such a person, after he had been in the colony for a while, would desire to provide billets for his friends at Home. It was all very well to help one's friends, but he would tell the House what that sort of thing would result in. There would be a complete department formed, and the Inspector of Prisons would be allowed enormous travelling expenses; and what would happen when they got him out here? Why, he would have no experience at all which would be of use to the Colony of New Zealand. The gaols at Home were like great castles, and not at all like the prisons here, and he would be all abroad for a time at least. He would, so to speak, have to get his education here. In his (Mr. Swanson's) opinion, this was not the time to lay the foundation of what would inevitably become a costly department. He had heard a good deal about classification, and he should like to know what this classification meant. Did they want to classify prisoners according to their ages, their crimes, their sentences, or their physical strength? He apprehended that those things would have to be taken into account. Two men, say, had been guilty of a theft, and were sentenced to exactly the same term of imprisonment. There might be an enormous difference in their physical strength; but some plan should be devised by which they could be put to work in such a way that their work would be profitable to the country. He hoped the House would not allow a man to be imported from England to act as Inspector of Prisons. He believed it had been agreed by the House that before they looked abroad for a servant, they should see whether they had not got the man they wanted in the colony. He would ask the Minister of Justice what inquiries had been made by the Government within the colony. Had they inquired whether there was a gentleman at the present time in the colony who was fitted for the position of Inspector of Prisons? He had never heard of any inquiries of that sort having been made. Had the Government inquired, for instance, not only amongst the gaolers but outside of them? Had they offered a prize for the best essay on prison management, with a view to economizing prisoners' labour? It was only fair and right that the House should expect that the Government had made the necessary inquiries in the colony before they sent Home for a man to fill the position. There was one point more to which he wished to refer. He happened to be for three or four months on a prison inquiry in Auckland, and he got to know a good many things during that time about the management of prisons in other countries. They found that the prison system in England was far from being the best. The prison system in Ireland was entirely different, and was beyond all comparison better than that of England. They found that the prisons in the United States were by far the best, and were more than self-supporting. They also found that on the Continent the prisons were better managed than in England. If they were going to send out of this country for an officer, why did they not find out where the prisons were best managed, with the best results for the country and the prisoners? He hoped the House would pause before they went to this expense.

Mr. FISHER would support the resolution. He thought in the first place they could not well afford the cost. He was surprised that the Minister of Justice should have such a notion of sending Home for such an officer. He thought it had often and often been the case that billets were given to men from England, when there were men in the colony well able to do what was required. For a long time in Canterbury, it was only necessary that a man should come from England and should have known Lord Lyttelton's dog, or have seen it, to be put into a billet over everybody else in the province. He thought their experience of importing goods of this sort had not been very beneficial. They had to bring those officers out from England, they had to pay their salaries, they had to give them compensation, and send them back to England without having done any good whatever for the colony.

Mr. BURNS, in reply, said it grieved him very much to interfere with the Minister of Justice. His pathetic appeal to the House on this question was perfectly touching; but he recollected that the honorable gentleman made the same appeal on a recent occasion. He thought the House would be able to judge whether there was anything but theory to support that appeal. The honorable gentleman was simply going on theory alone, and he very much questioned whether there was anything practical in it whatever. They had prisons in the colonies better managed than the prisons in the Home country; and he was certain that the prison management in England was a laughing-stock to the whole nation. He was sure the Pentridge Prison in Victoria was better managed than any prison in the old country. He did not think the circumstances of this colony at the present time were such that they should make any new appointments. In bringing forward this motion he simply wanted to give the House an opportunity of stopping this appointment. The Minister of Justice could not say that the appointment had been made, and he thought they should countermand the appointment at once. It could very well stand over for another year; and, if the appointment was absolutely necessary, he hoped it would then be made, and that some gentleman within the colony itself would be appointed. He thought it was most ungrateful for the honorable member for Nelson City (Mr. Curtis) to make the remarks he did about the Gaol in Dunedin. He happened to know something about the matter referred to by the honorable member. The pathetic appeal made by that honorable member, as Superintendent of Nelson, to the Otago officials about those prisoners was very touching; and now he turned upon them in this way, after they had taken charge of prisoners he could not look after himself. The circumstances had already been correctly detailed by an honorable member. In the first place, the prisoner referred to would not work. If he could have been induced to work, the Nelson Government would not have been asked to pay anything. First of all, the man would not go to work, and then he fell ill. He was afterwards forced out to work almost at the point of the bayonet, and extra officers had to be put on to look after him, as he was a most dangerous character, he having been a bushranger, and tried for murder. Then the management of the Maori prisoners in the Dunedin Gaol was a credit to any one. He did not wish to speak of Mr. Caldwell to the disparagement of any other man in New Zealand. As he said before, he simply mentioned that gentleman because he thought he was capable of undertaking the duties of such an office. It was quite possible there were others in the colony as capable as he was. It was perhaps a pity that his name was brought up at all; but he wished to show the utter absurdity of sending to the Home country for officers when they could get better men in the colony. The same thing had been done in other departments; and, although he admitted there were some exceptions, the great bulk of the officers so obtained had not fulfilled expectations.

PROTECTION OF ANIMALS ACT.

Sir G. GREY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to amend the 29th section of the Protection of Animals Act; and it was in reality a Bill for the insertion of three new words. The introduction of certain noxious animals was prohibited, and it was proposed to add to the prohibited animals three others, namely, the polecat, which was most destructive to birds; the stoat, which was equally destructive to birds; and the weasel, which was especially destructive to insectivorous birds. It was known to eminent naturalists that if the weasel were allowed to be introduced into a country with such a climate as New Zealand, it would breed with extraordinary rapidity; and of course if it did so it would materially interfere with the agriculture of the country, because they would kill the birds which destroyed the grain-eating insects.

Bill read a second time.

On the motion that the Bill be committed presently,

Mr. REYNOLDS thought it would be unfair to honorable members who had Bills on the Order Paper, to allow this Bill to be committed presently. It ought to 'bide its chance, like all the others. He had a Bill, which stood No. 40 on the Order Paper, and had been there for five or six weeks. It was unfair that some honorable members should have an opportunity of getting their Bills committed immediately, while others had to wait such a long time.

Mr. ANDREW moved, that the Bill be committed that day week. He was not in his place when the Bill was read a second time, but that, of course, was his own fault. However, it was not fair to allow this Bill to stop the progress of Orders on the Paper. As to the question as to whether stoats or weasels should be introduced into the country, there might be very different opinions, and he should move, That the commitment of the Bill be postponed for a week.

Mr. SEYMOUR thought the House had rather been taken by surprise by the second reading of this Bill. It stood on the Order Paper as an amendment to the Protection of Animals Act. He had not seen the Bill; but, rather than being a Protection of Animals Act, it ought to be regarded in a totally different light. In reality, it was a Noxious Animals Prohibition Bill, and would prohibit the introduction of certain animals which he thought did not come under the category of noxious animals. It included three descriptions of animals, any one of which it might be desirable to import. They had had a Select Committee appointed that session to consider the question of the rabbit nuisance, and the result of the Committee's investigation showed that a very large amount of damage was being done by rabbits—so great, indeed, that, with all the means at their disposal, it seemed scarcely possible to cope with the difficulty. It had been suggested in many places that the true mode, and perhaps the only mode open to them to prevent the increase of rabbits, was by the introduction of those animals which could not be introduced if the Bill were passed. If he had known that the second reading of the Bill was to be passed so hurriedly, he would have spoken against it then. However, if the commitment was postponed to that day week, he would say no more upon the subject.

Sir G. GREY would have no objection to the commitment being postponed.

AUCKLAND PROVINCIAL COUNCIL LIBRARY BILL.

Mr. O'RORKE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to give effect to the wishes expressed from time to time by the Provincial Council of Auckland in regard to this subject. He had not brought it forward from any terror of the Spoliation of Provinces Bill, because he believed the people of Auckland were possessed of sufficient public spirit to prevent that Bill ever becoming law in that province; but, unfortunately, they had been unable to hold a meeting of the Provincial Council for the last eighteen months, and, for that reason, it was necessary to introduce the Bill into this Assembly. Its object was to enable certain members of the Provincial Council to enter into negotiations with the City Council of Auckland for the transfer of the library to the City Council, in order to form a free public library for the city of Auckland. There were certain liabilities of a moderate amount attached to the library, and referred to in a clause, which he would fully explain in Committee. The names of the members of the proposed Board of Trustees were specified in clause 2; and, as he had already stated, the object of the Bill was to convert the Provincial Council Library of Auckland into a free public library—a course which he would like to see adopted with regard to the Parliamentary Library in the General Assembly Buildings. The Provincial Library of Auckland had, he was happy to say, outgrown the limits of a parliamentary library, and he believed the remark equally applied to the library attached to this House. The sooner these were made public libraries, and the benefits obtained from the public money expended in the formation of these libraries thrown open to the public, the better it would be for the people at large.

WAITARA HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

Mr. KELLY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was one which he had no doubt would commend itself to the House, because it contained no endowment clauses and gave no borrowing powers. In these respects it differed from many of the other Harbour Board Bills which had been introduced into the House. The abolition of provinces had rendered the Bill necessary, in order that a body might be established to look after the harbour at the Waitara, which was a thriving port, but suffered at present from the want of any local power to manage it.

Mr. SHEEHAN would like to know the opinion of the honorable member for Grey and Bell upon this Bill. This Bill was intended to build up at Waitara a rival port to that which it was proposed to form at New Plymouth. Although one man had been struggling for a generation to establish a harbour of refuge at New Plymouth, the House was now asked to tinker up the bar-bound river of Waitara. The honorable member in charge of the Bill said there were no borrowing powers or endowment clauses, but it would be found that that was a thing that would only last for one year. He warned his honorable friend the member for Grey and Bell that next year the honorable member for New Plymouth would be sure to come down and ask for endowments and powers to borrow. Without those powers this measure would be perfectly useless, for it would be found that the rates which could be raised in the district would not be sufficient to keep the pilots in tobacco. He hoped the honorable member for Grey and Bell would express his opinion upon the measure before it was read a second time.

Mr. CARRINGTON had very few words to say upon the subject, and they were to this effect: that the explanation given by the honorable member for New Plymouth was perfectly correct. The reason no endowments were asked for was, that he (Mr. Carrington), as Superintendent of the Province, had already made arrangements, and would take care that the place was properly endowed. The passing of this Bill would in no way interfere with the construction of the larger harbour at New Plymouth, because its object was merely to provide for the local management of the smaller harbour at Waitara.

C. PHILLIPS.

The House went into Committee.

Mr. HAMLIN moved, That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to recommend to this House an appropriation of £300, to meet the report of the Public Petitions Committee in the case of Mr. Coleman Phillips. The other evening, in asking that this question might be referred to a Committee of the whole House, he informed honorable members that the Public Petitions Committee had brought up a report, and in it had recommended that Mr. Coleman Phillips should receive a sum of £300 as compensation, and to repay him the money he was out of pocket for personal expenses while in Wellington. The matter had been thoroughly gone into by the Committee, and they were fully satisfied that Mr. Phillips was deserving of some compensation. He hoped the House would pass the motion.

Major ATKINSON hoped the Committee would not agree to the motion. He was unable to attend the Select Committee, but he was informed that the motion recommending that Mr. Coleman Phillips should receive £300 was only carried by a majority of one. He had heard that the Committee was very much divided on the question. He understood that the Committee were pretty unanimous in thinking that Mr. Phillips should receive £150, which they considered a reasonable amount for the expenses which Mr. Phillips had been put to in Wellington; and he would be prepared to place that amount on the estimates, without sending an address to His Excellency at all, if the honorable member was prepared to accept it. In order to put the question to a test as soon as possible, he would move, That the words "three hundred" be omitted, and that the words "one hundred and fifty" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. SHEEHAN hoped the honorable gentleman who had moved the motion would not accept 10s. in the pound. The facts of the case might be summed up very briefly. They were these: Mr. Coleman Phillips had originated a scheme for extending the trade of this colony to the South Pacific Islands. Whether that scheme was worth the money or not, the then Premier of the colony thought it worth while to bring Mr. Phillips to Wellington, to keep him here for a long time, and to consult with him. And afterwards he went so far as to engage to form a company in Auckland to work out the scheme. In 1874 the South Sea Islands scheme, based upon Mr. Phillips's speculation, was proposed as one of the leading measures of the session. He might remark, by the way, that afterwards it gave way to the Abolition scheme. This fact remained untouched: that whatever Mr. Phillips had to sell, whether it was worth the money or not, the colony, through its Premier, offered him a price which they now wished to compound for £300. He thought that to offer Mr. Phillips 10s. in the pound on that sum was beneath the dignity of the House and the colony. It might be true that other persons had proposed schemes like the South Sea Bubble; but he contended that, if Mr. Phillips came into the market in 1871 or 1872, if he was the only person agitating this particular scheme, and if the Government thought it worth while to send for him, and afterwards to form a company and to recommend the proposals to Parliament, it was unfair on the part of the House to turn round now and repudiate the action of the Premier, and refuse to give Mr. Phillips reasonable compensation. He believed Sir Julius Vogel himself did not deny that Mr. Phillips had a claim. He admitted he had come to Wellington at the expense of the Government, and that he was entitled to compensation. The proposal to offer £150 was a monstrous injustice. Mr. Phillips must have spent over £150 in bringing his petition before the Committee, and it was now proposed to give him merely his expenses for prosecuting his claim. He trusted the Government would not press their proposal.

Mr. G. McLEAN did not think the motion had been put in exactly the form the Committee made their recommendation. The Committee recommended, by a majority of one, he thought, that £150 should be paid to Mr. Phillips; and in addition to that the Committee recommended that his expenses should be paid down to Wellington, and were not to exceed £150. He did not think any one would say that £150 would be spent on a trip from Auckland to Wellington. It would be seen that this motion proposed to exceed even what the report recommended by a considerable sum. After investigating the whole matter himself, he held that Mr. Phillips was not entitled to anything more than his expenses in coming down here, for had he gone to England to float this scheme in the face of the absolute collapse of the company at Tahiti at the time, he (Mr. McLean) was confident he would not have been able to raise a pound on the scheme. If Mr. Phillips had prevented the colony from launching into such a scheme, he thought he would have a better claim for £300. He would be quite willing, as proposed by the Premier, to give Mr. Phillips £150, and he was sure it would be perfectly satisfactory to the latter, because he hardly thought Mr. Phillips expected to get £300. He hoped the Committee would agree to the proposal to give £150, and would not consent to vote away money in the manner proposed.

Mr. LUSK confessed he had listened with some surprise to the melancholy appeal made to the Committee, an appeal which he regretted should have come from any honorable member occupying a seat on the Government benches. The Commissioner of Customs appealed to the Committee to give this petitioner £150, and his reason for doing this was, that he thought the petitioner would feel rather glad to get it. In fact, the petitioner thought they were going to treat him so badly that he would be satisfied with even this small modicum of justice. The honorable gentleman must be aware that what he had said gave but a very incorrect idea of the state of things. It seemed to him (Mr. Lusk) absurd that they should go into the question at all of what were the chances of Mr. Coleman Phillips floating a particular company in London. That was not a question with which the honor of the House and of the country was in any way concerned. The question, as already put, was whether, a gentleman having conceived a scheme, and that scheme having been taken from him at a price by the late Premier on behalf of the colony, and for the purpose, as he supposed, of doing a great benefit to the colony, it became them to say that, because if he had been allowed to carry out the original scheme, and to try to form a company, he would have failed, therefore they should only give him part of the price agreed to be given. It had been twice stated from the Government benches that this recommendation was passed in the Committee by a majority of one. That was incorrect. It was passed by seven votes as against five. Such a misstatement having been made by two honorable gentlemen on the Government benches, he was led to believe that their examination of the matter had been a very cursory one. He thought it was unfair to the petitioner that they should take this report as being altogether a complete statement of the case. The report stated that it had been shown that Mr. Phillips supplied information relative to the Polynesian scheme. Now, it had been shown that Mr. Phillips had done a great deal more than give information. In the papers laid before Parliament in 1873, Sir Julius Vogel stated that the idea originated in his mind from the suggestions made by Mr. Phillips. So that it was not information that Mr. Phillips supplied, but the original conception of what was called the Polynesian scheme, which, whether it was a good or bad idea, was at all events considered to be of such value by the then Government that they positively insisted that they must have it, and stated that, if they did not have it, they would start a rival scheme themselves, and so render it impossible for Mr. Coleman Phillips to form a company. He would not attempt to characterize the spirit in which this matter was conducted by the late Premier of New Zealand. That gentleman no longer held a seat in the House, and therefore could not reply to any statements that might be made. He did not wish to make any reflections upon the conduct of Sir Julius Vogel; but he must say that it did not enhance the honor of the public men of New Zealand that they should attempt now to raise a controversy as to the exact relations between Sir Julius Vogel and Mr. Phillips. He thought the evidence was quite sufficient to show that at all events the manner in which Mr. Phillips was treated was such as they should not wish to see repeated very often in New Zealand. He did not wish to weary the Committee in any way by dealing with the facts of the case, and he would therefore merely say that he thought any one who had taken the trouble to inform himself upon the subject must see plainly that £150 would be very small compensation indeed for the absolute money expenses Mr. Phillips was put to by the action of Sir Julius Vogel. He was kept, so to speak, on a string for many, many months; he was encouraged to come to Wellington and stay for some months; he was encouraged to go to Fiji on two occasions; and for a length of time was employed absolutely in working up the details of this scheme, which was taken by the Government on a distinct promise that from one source or another they would get Mr. Phillips £2,000 as compensation for the services he had rendered. When that was considered, it would be apparent to every one that £150 was ridiculously small compensation. But in addition to that, surely something ought to be paid to Mr. Phillips for the loss of his time, because a man's time should be regarded as of some value when he gave it up to prosecute any matter which was considered to be of value to the public service. When all those things were considered, and further when it was considered that this petitioner had been for upwards of two months prosecuting his claim before the Public Petitions Committee, he maintained that the award proposed to be made by a respectable majority of the Committee, after full investigation, was the smallest possible award that could be granted in accordance with ordinary justice and fair-play. He trusted the Committee would have no hesitation in granting the full amount. He must say he considered the full amount itself a very pitiful award, when all the circumstances were considered. At all events he trusted that the Committee would not be led away by any reference to the possibility of Mr. Phillips not being able to float the scheme, a matter which had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the justice of the claim before the House. He must say it did appear to him an extraordinary thing that the Government should come there and boggle about £150 in a case of this kind, when they must know, the petitioner was much more than £150 out of pocket in prosecuting this claim before the Committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS said he had attended all the meetings of the Committee except one, and his impression was that Mr. Phillips was not entitled to anything except his passage money from Auckland to Wellington, and his expenses while he was in Wellington. A number of resolutions were brought up in the Committee. It was first moved that a sum not exceeding £150 should be paid to Mr. Phillips for expenses incurred in coming to Wellington. It was then proposed as an amendment that £150 should be struck out, and £500 substituted. On the question being put, £150 was carried by the casting vote of the Chairman. It was then moved that after "£150" the following words be added: "and that a sum not exceeding £350 be given him for his other expenses." That would show how the Committee was endeavouring to carry out its own views. Seeing that in all probability this last resolution would be lost, the Committee adjourned. On the following day it was moved that after the words £150 the following words be added: "That a sum not exceeding £150 be given him for his other expenses." That was put to the Committee, and they again divided, there being six on each side; and it was decided by the casting vote of the Chairman that the words should be added. And then there was another motion to the effect that Mr. Phillips was entitled to the expenses he had incurred in coming to Wellington in reference to that subject, not exceeding £150, and that a sum of £150 be given to him for his other expenses. That motion was carried by seven to five. That was the position of the matter; and he felt sure that if honorable members had been present at the meeting of the Public Petitions Committee, there would be very few of them that would vote in favour of any larger sum than that proposed by the Government.

Mr. REES had known Mr. Coleman Phillips for many years, and he knew that for some time before the Polynesian scheme was brought out he was engaged in elaborating a scheme for a private company. He availed himself not only of the knowledge gained by two visits to the islands, but of the knowledge of several other gentlemen, especially that of Mr. Sterndale, a man who had been trading to the islands, a man of great intellectual power, and a man who contributed a series of long and most interesting letters referring not only to the beauty and capabilities of the islands, but to the advantages which would accrue from establishing commercial intercourse with them. Mr. Phillips was engaged for a long time in working out the scheme, and, having communicated it to other gentlemen, became known to Sir Julius Vogel, then Mr. Vogel; and it was he who first proposed to Mr. Phillips that it should assume the form of a political as well as of a mercantile scheme. Mr. Phillips was then told—there was nothing more than an understanding about it, but it was a clear understanding—that he would be paid £3,000 for parting with his store of knowledge. He did not know whether what he had said about Mr. Sterndale came out before the Public Petitions Committee; but he knew it as a fact, inasmuch as Mr. Sterndale and other gentlemen who had traded about the islands, and had obtained valuable information, told him that they had given the information to Mr. Phillips, who had himself mapped out the whole scheme, which was afterwards adopted by the Government, and introduced to the Legislature in 1874. No doubt they all sympathized with the Government in endeavouring to keep down the claims on the public purse, but there was such a thing as political uprightness. The Committee should remember that Mr. Phillips was promised £2,000; and now, after waiting three years, and after coming down to Wellington at the instance of Sir Julius Vogel, to further the scheme which was considered so valuable, he was to be put off with £150. He did not think that was fair. It was not calculated to raise the reputation of the House, or the character of its leading men. He hoped the Committee would adopt the report of the Petitions Committee. The honorable member for Port Chalmers, who appeared to hide behind a smiling face a heart as hard as a millstone, said the Committee were divided equally, six to six, and that the motion for giving Mr.

Coleman Phillips £800 was only carried on the casting vote of the Chairman. The honorable gentleman seemed to be at sixes and sevens, for it happened that the motion was carried by seven to five. The Committee having recommended that Mr. Phillips should receive £300 instead of £150, he hoped the House would indorse that recommendation. £300 would in no way recompense Mr. Phillips for his trouble and outlay; and, looking at all the circumstances of the case, the House should not refuse to grant that sum.

Mr. BRANDON said it would establish a very bad precedent to pass this vote upon the strength of a report of a Committee. Because a speculator might suggest to a Minister, or to the Government of the day, a scheme which might be useful to the colony or advantageous to the community, did that constitute a good claim to compensation? He suggested the scheme, and received a promise that, if it was taken up and succeeded, he would receive a sum of £2,000; but it was not taken up by the colony, and he was not precluded in any way from taking advantage of his own knowledge and experience. He had the right to submit his scheme to any other country or to any private company who might desire to enter upon such an undertaking; and what claim could he possibly have upon this colony? The Minister who negotiated with Mr. Phillips was not authorized by the Government to do so, and when the scheme was submitted to the House it refused to adopt it. If Mr. Phillips were voted a sum sufficient to cover his expenses in coming to Wellington to lay his scheme before Sir Julius Vogel, and at his request—that was all he was entitled to. To say that they were bound to ratify all the actions of a Minister who chose to take up the scheme of any speculator, and pledge the colony to the payment of a certain amount of compensation, was a monstrous proposition. It was impossible to say what sums they might be made liable to, if every speculator who had the privilege of laying before a Minister a specious scheme were afterwards to have the right to come to the House and say, "You have sucked my brains, you have taken advantage of my knowledge, and now I require payment for it." It would be quite sufficient that Mr. Phillips's expenses at Wellington should be paid.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY would go further than the honorable gentleman who had just sat down. This was a scheme for which the Government were in no way responsible, because in no sense was it taken up for the good of the public. A certain gentleman got an idea into his head, and he went to the then Premier and explained his scheme, which certainly was taken in hand by Sir Julius Vogel; but the Legislature refused to adopt it, so that it could not be regarded as a public scheme. Besides, private circulars relating to the subject were sent all over the colony, with the object of forming a company; and that did not look as if Mr. Phillips regarded it as a public matter. Had it been a public matter it would have been announced officially in the Gazette. And while the investigation was going on before the Committee, Mr. Phillips wrote a letter to Sir Julius Vogel, in which he stated that, if members of the Ministry attended the meetings of the Committee simply to vote against him, he should be compelled to take measures to prevent Sir Julius Vogel leaving the colony until the matter was re-investigated. That did not look as if it was a Government matter. He intended to take steps to compel a Minister to work for him, simply because, when the scheme was a failure, he wanted the colony to pay his expenses. Mr. Whitaker, writing to Sir Julius Vogel on the 15th August last—he was then Postmaster-General—said,—

“In reply to your letter of this day's date, in reference to Mr. Phillips's claim for compensation, I have to say that I recollect your stating more than once, at the interviews I had with you on the subject of the South Sea scheme, that you desired that Mr. Phillips should receive some remuneration for his trouble in the matter, and you proposed to insert, in what I suppose may be called the prospectus, a provision that he should be paid £2,000, to which I objected, on the ground that it would prejudice the chance of success; and that I stated it would be quite competent for the company, when formed, to grant Mr. Phillips any sum they thought fit.”

It was not the Government who were to give the £2,000. It was the company—“when formed.” Mr. Phillips got up a scheme; he showed it to a person who happened to be Premier of the colony, and laid it before him; he endeavoured to form a private company, and to get a guarantee. That was all the colony had to do with it: it refused to indorse a proposal for a guarantee to any company that might be formed to carry out that scheme, which then went back to the persons who originated it. He did not see how the colony could be considered liable, merely because Sir Julius Vogel happened to be Premier at the time.

Mr. HAMLIN was surprised to hear the honorable gentleman speak in that strain. Had the colony always refused to recognize engagements entered into by Sir Julius Vogel while acting as Premier? When Sir Julius Vogel went Home to negotiate for a San Francisco mail service, did he not pledge the colony to an extra expenditure of £7,000? And did not these same honorable members back him up then? Was not this scheme entered upon by Sir Julius Vogel upon the clear understanding that it was to be a colonial undertaking, and was not New Zealand to reap whatever advantage resulted from it? He read some extracts the other evening, and would not now read them. In 1874, when Sir James Fergusson was Governor, the matter was taken up, and a Bill was brought before the Assembly to make this a New Zealand scheme. If a Minister could be allowed to break his word in any case, it would be a great hardship indeed. No doubt Mr. Phillips was stopped, both by the then Governor and by Sir Julius Vogel, from going Home; and their letters prove that. With reference to the divisions which had been alluded to by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, he would point out to the House that the honorable gentleman had not stated the question fairly. When the Committee were about to consider their report, the room was deluged by gentlemen who had not, with one exception, been present during the consideration of the case, and had not heard the evidence. They said they had read the evidence; but that evidence had been very materially altered by Sir Julius Vogel in a very marked manner. Several lines were struck out, and others were interlined, in his evidence. It was very much altered and toned down. He would appeal to the honorable member for Newton if that was not the fact. They both pointed out in the Committee that the evidence had been altered, and they were told it was not the case.

Mr. KELLY said the evidence was not substantially altered: the grammar was corrected and it was made clearer. The evidence was gone over by the shorthand-writer afterwards.

Mr. HAMLIN said they turned up the evidence, and saw that it had been altered. They endeavoured to decide what had been struck out, but they could not make out what it was. How could the honorable member say that the evidence was not substantially altered—because they could not see how it had been altered, they could only see the red ink. If those who had heard the evidence had been allowed to decide the matter, the sum recommended would have been more than it was. Two Ministers appeared on the last occasion, but the Committee had hardly had the honor of seeing their faces before. If honorable members would refer to the proceedings, they would see that the Hon. G. McLean attended on the 22nd of August; and on the day the Committee considered their report, they were honored by his presence and that of Mr. Richardson. It was to this packing of the Committee he and others objected at the time, and it caused great delay in bringing up the report. Mr. Phillips had a fair claim to compensation, and the Committee should agree to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON said that as the honorable member talked about packing the Committee, he could not let the remark pass without notice. As often as his duties allowed him he went to that Committee; and on the day referred to he had not, before he entered the room, the slightest idea as to what was before the Committee. He heard one of his colleagues being very severely handled for expressing his views to the Committee, and he stopped in the room. He happened to take a great deal of interest in this matter, and knew, without hearing the evidence, pretty well as much as any member of the Committee did about the subject. He took part in the discussion and voted, as he was entitled to do; but he objected altogether to the honorable member stating that the Committee was packed in any way on that day.

Mr. HISLOP did not think the honorable member complained altogether of the way in which Ministers attended the meetings, but he complained more particularly of the conduct of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. It was a rather remarkable thing that, in the proceedings of the Committee, the name of the Hon. Mr. McLean only appeared on one day previous to the final decision, and the Hon. Mr. Richardson's only appeared on the day upon which the decision was arrived at. He thought it was owing to the action of the honorable member for Port Chalmers that those honorable gentlemen and one other member, supporters of the Government, turned up for the first time on that day upon which the petition was finally considered. He did not know how it was, but it always appeared to be made a Government question on the Committee that Mr. Phillips should receive nothing at all, and he was astonished to hear the Commissioner of Customs agree this evening that a sum of £150 should be placed upon the estimates for Mr. Phillips, for previously the honorable gentleman's opinion was that he was not entitled to anything. That was his contention before the Public Petitions Committee, and the honorable gentleman had not told the Committee how he had now arrived at the decision that Mr. Phillips was entitled to £150. The honorable member might as well have gone the whole length, and said he was entitled to the £300 which had been recommended by the Public Petitions Committee. The honorable member for Wellington Country District, he thought, had stated the case rather unfairly to the Committee. It was not the case of a speculator giving to the Premier for the time being, and agreeing that if the matter were a success he would be compensated; but Mr. Phillips went to the Premier at the invitation of the Premier, and laid before him a well-digested scheme for the settlement of those islands. The Premier was so struck with it that he at once agreed to bring it before Parliament; and he then entered into an agreement with Mr. Phillips that a certain thing should be done, and after that Mr. Phillips should receive a certain sum of money. Afterwards, Mr. Phillips was not satisfied with what had been done; and after he had been told not to go home by Sir Julius Vogel, he was told to go about his business, because the Premier was going to get other persons to work out the scheme. Mr. Phillips then wrote to the Premier stating that if he accepted the scheme or made any use of it, he would have to be compensated by receiving £2,000. The Premier then, without the consent of Mr. Phillips, published the scheme, or rather took the eyes out of it. He laid the matter before the House, notwithstanding the protest of Mr. Phillips. As the Premier had laid the scheme before the House after that protest, there was certainly an implied contract on the part of the Premier to pay for the scheme whether it was a successful one or not. That clearly appeared from the letters published in the evidence. He hoped the Committee would agree to vote the whole sum, because it was but very poor justice to Mr. Phillips, considering the way in which he had been treated in the matter.

Mr. G. McLEAN said the honorable member for Waitaki had taken great interest in Committee in advocating this gentleman's case. The House would think it very strange if Ministers allowed votes to come before the Assembly without investigating them. The honorable member seemed to think that Ministers had not a right to go to the Public Petitions Committee at any time they pleased, or to read evidence that had been taken. When a matter came before the House upon which money was claimed, he took an interest in it, and always examined the evidence taken before the Public Petitions Committee to see whether the claim was just. The honorable member said Ministers did not go near the Committee often; but did the honorable gentleman think that Ministers had nothing else to do but to attend a Committee every day? How would they be able to meet the House if they did that? He was of opinion that Mr. Phillips was entitled to his expenses in attending at Wellington, and it was proposed to give him £150. How many people put schemes before the public with the view of getting so much if the scheme floated, but if it did not they would receive nothing. That was the usual course with all such schemes, and he did not think Mr. Phillips should be made an exception to the rule. As to Mr. Phillips being entitled to £2,000, it was true he was to get £2,000 out of it if possible—if the scheme succeeded; but it was not a success. He hoped the Committee would agree to £150 only, because that was every shilling Mr. Phillips was entitled to, and far more.

Mr. GIBBS was a member of the Committee, and had not been actively in favour of Mr. Phillips getting £150, but he had done so negatively as against any larger sum being agreed to. He was prepared to support the sum of £150, as far as that covered the expenses Mr. Phillips had been put to; but his own opinion had been that Mr. Phillips had not any claim whatever upon the colony—that he had forced his plans upon Sir Julius Vogel, and that it was arranged between them that, if a company was floated, Mr. Phillips should have—as he expressed himself in a letter—some appointment equivalent to £800 or £1,000 a year. Sir Julius Vogel, in his evidence, said he did not think Mr. Phillips was a person likely to give any company value for £1,000 a year; but he was prepared to recommend that, if a company was floated, Mr. Phillips should have a bonus of £2,000. He could not see how in any way that compromised the Government of the country; and he thought Mr. Phillips had no further claim than any other promoter of a company who failed to float it had upon those who endeavoured to assist him in doing so. It was simply that and no more, as far as he could see. The Committee tacitly admitted that Mr. Phillips should be paid the £150 to cover his expenses—and in addition that he should have £150 to compensate him for the losses he had sustained. This he (Mr. Gibbs) had opposed. With regard to the observations made by the honorable member for Franklin about the alterations in the evidence, they were merely verbal alterations, and it was not unusual for witnesses to make such alterations in the evidence when the copy was submitted to them to sign. The alterations made did not alter the facts in any way.

Mr. HAMLIN.—Could you decipher what was struck out?

Mr. GIBBS said he had certainly no difficulty in doing so. He supposed the original copy of the evidence could be produced if necessary.

Mr. LUSH said the last two speakers had convayed an entirely erroneous impression of this matter, although he did not say they intended to do so. They gave the impression that there was a sort of partnership existing between Sir Julius Vogel, then Premier of New Zealand, and Mr. Coleman Phillips—that there was a sort of bargain that Mr. Phillips was to get something out of the company if he succeeded in floating it, but not otherwise. He could not imagine how any honorable member, in the face of the documentary evidence, could for one instant take such a view as that. Mr. Phillips remonstrated in the strongest manner, in a letter to Sir Julius Vogel, published with the evidence, at the course proposed to be taken by the Premier. That was before the scheme was laid before the House at all. He pleaded in the strongest possible manner with Sir Julius Vogel not to insist upon taking his scheme and rendering it absolutely worthless, without giving him compensation. He wrote thus:—"I cannot give up the hope of so many months without a struggle, and why I have to do so I cannot imagine. I have heard that you possess the power of swaying men according to your own ideas; but here I sent you the plan because I wanted your assistance, and you take it all from me. I will not submit to this. If you take the plan and carry it through, you must guarantee to me the compensation you named—£2,000. If you take the plan and publish it, you must still guarantee compensation. I will say one-half that sum." Sir Julius Vogel did take the scheme and published it. How could any one, in the face of that statement, say that Sir Julius Vogel was at liberty to use that scheme and publish it, and, after publishing it, was at liberty to say that it was nothing at all? The originator of that scheme was dragged into that position. It was very hard that he should be forced into the position of a partner in a scheme—that he should be dragged into it in this way. He was really surprised that any honorable members who had taken part in this investigation should have made such statements to the House.

Mr. GIBBS said the honorable member had read a portion of a letter from Mr. Phillips. He (Mr. Gibbs) would read an extract from Sir Julius Vogel's evidence:—

"Did you not promise something of the sort when you proposed bringing the matter before Parliament?—What matter?"

"The matter of the Polynesian scheme?—After Mr. Phillips wrote me the injudicious letter of which I have spoken, I told him he might do what he liked, but that if a company were formed I would try and get him £2,000.

"Did you lead him to believe that the matter would be brought before Parliament for the purpose of seeing if the Parliament would adopt it?—I do not think so. I told him he was at liberty to do as he liked; but if the scheme was carried out, I would try and get him £2,000."

That was the other side of the question.

Mr. SWANSON had made up his mind not to say anything about this matter, but he really could not resist making some remarks upon the evidence as printed. In looking over the evidence given by Sir Julius Vogel, he failed to find a certain answer given to a question, an answer which every member of the Committee had heard. The answer was either struck out or never put in. He would read the question he had himself put to Sir Julius Vogel, and the answer as printed:—

"Would the Government have given anything if the scheme had been carried out?—My opinion is, that it would have made an arrangement by which the company would have paid something; but I was never prepared to put the Government to any expense. If the company had gone on, we should have insisted upon the claims of Mr. Phillips being considered. It was in my mind to do that, but certainly not to put the colony to any expense."

He would ask any member of the Committee if that was the answer given?

Mr. HAMLIN.—Certainly not.

Mr. SWANSON.—Certainly not. Sir Julius Vogel said that any reasonable consideration would be paid. He would read the letter written by Sir Julius Vogel to Mr Phillips:—

"(Private.)

"Wellington, 6th November, 1873.

"DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your note, and thank you had better delay doing anything until you see me.

"I have thought much over your proposal, and have a suggestion to make which I think you will like; and meanwhile I would wait, and not tell your plans to others. The quieter you are about them the better.—I am, &c.,

"JULIUS VOGEL.

"P.S.—I am sure to be in Auckland in the course of a couple of months, probably sooner, and the delay will do no harm. Let me know what you decide upon.

"J. V."

He would read another portion of Sir Julius Vogel's evidence when being examined by the honorable member for Wanganui, Mr. Bryce:—

"Did you suggest to Mr. Phillips that he might get a reward for his connection with the scheme?—I think that I treated Mr Phillips quite confidentially. I suggested to him to come down to Wellington, and did not conceal from him that I thought the Government would take up the idea and carry it out."

Mr. ANDREW said that the claim which Mr. Coleman Phillips had brought before the House was worth nothing whatever. The scheme itself was utterly worthless. He (Mr. Andrew) would undertake for a couple of pounds to produce as good a one. What did the scheme really amount to? In the statement put before the Committee by Mr. Coleman Phillips, it was called the "Original Draft of the Polynesian Scheme. Proposed Scheme for a Trading Company for Polynesia." The objects were stated to be—

"(1.) The supply of native labour in the Polynesian group, and to the Australian colonies. (2.) To take advantage of the dormant labour resident in the islands, by exchanging trade for island productions. (3.) To acquire ultimate dominion."

Was this House going to compensate Mr. Phillips for suggesting that something very like slave labour should be employed? If they imported slave labour, they would be liable to punishment as pirates. Mr. Phillips did consider that labour of this kind should be imported; but what did Sir Julius Vogel say to the proposal to import such labour? He stated in his evidence,—

"I was afterwards rather shocked at having been led into giving my approval to a proposal which had such a prominent feature as dealing with human labour. There are one or two expressions in the thing which are rather ugly."

And were they going to give Mr. Phillips compensation for having suggested a plan, portions of which seemed "ugly"? It seemed to him that Mr. Phillips did not deserve anything for that. Then they had a certain amount of information about geography which might be easily picked up. They were told that some of the Pacific Islands belonged to France—that some of them belonged to America, and different other countries. They were not told how to deal with the islands belonging to foreign Powers. Mr. Phillips did not say anything about France in relation to these islands, except that "France I avoid." He referred to the Wesleyan Mission in this way: "This influence must be courted and gained; I fancy that it can be gained. They cannot expect always to rule these islands." The suggestion was that we were to supplant the Wesleyan missionaries, and rule these islands instead of them. He did not think the people in those islands would benefit by having Coleman Phillips as a ruler instead of a Wesleyan missionary. Were they to compensate Mr. Phillips for suggesting such a scheme as that? No. It was absolutely worthless. Then there were other points which really did not deserve any consideration, and which a boy might have suggested. Mr. Phillips said that the mode of procedure was to plant stations on different islands. Well, that was what Robinson Crusoe did on one island of the Pacific, and he never applied for any compensation. Then Mr. Phillips went on to say, "Let small vessels call at regular intervals." Well, that was what Robinson Crusoe did. He sent out vessels, and went himself as supercargo, to visit his island. The whole scheme, as propounded by Mr. Phillips, was a trumpatory affair altogether. Mr. Phillips first went out to the islands in 1872, and he broached his scheme to Ministers in 1873. Was that any reason why he should come to this House for compensation of any kind? That gentleman then told them that this was an original scheme. He held in his hand the prospectus of the Polynesian Company, Limited, brought out in Melbourne in 1868. That was sent as a circular to Sir Julius Vogel, and yet Mr. Phillips came to the House and sought for compensation as the originator of the Polynesian scheme. Sir Julius Vogel, in his evidence, stated,—

"Mr. Phillips's scheme pointed to a large trading company, something after the nature of the old chartered companies; and the first idea which it originated in my mind was that a charter should be obtained for it; and I freely concede to him the credit of having started this."

The Hudson's Bay Company and the East India Company had charters granted to them hundreds of years before Mr. Phillips was ever heard of. If the scheme was such a great scheme, why was it not brought forward in this House? The Ministry had the Bill read a first time, but they did not venture to attempt to read it a second time; they knew the House would kick it out. Were they to waste their time in wading through these papers, and considering the Polynesian scheme? Mr. Phillips was not entitled to anything. If entitled to anything, it was not from this House. If there was such a thing as Ministerial responsibility, it should apply to this case. If a Minister entered into an arrangement with Mr. Phillips without the authority of Parliament, and promised compensation for something, in that case the thing ought to fall upon the Minister himself. If this House did not give compensation, by all means let Mr. Phillips have his action at law. If he did that, and succeeded, the House might then very well consider whether they should compensate Sir Julius Vogel. His own opinion was that Mr. Phillips should not receive one halfpenny.

Mr. ROLLESTON said there were one or two observations which had not fallen fairly from the last speaker. If the question of traffic in slave labour was an improper one to entertain, when it was brought forward by Mr. Phillips, that was a good reason for rejecting his proposal. He quite agreed with the honorable member for Wairarapa that this scheme was a complete bubble, that the whole transaction was wrong and improper on the part of the Premier; but that was not the question. The question, as it seemed to him, was this: Was it to be understood that negotiations could be entered into with the Prime Minister of the colony—and even beyond that, with the Governor; and that the Governor should write a letter such as that which appeared on page 17 of the evidence, which clearly showed that the Government entertained this as a proposal to be brought before the House, and that they appropriated the ideas of this gentleman—was it to go that length, and then that a man was to be told that he was to keep his ideas quiet—after the Government had appropriated them? Was that to be done, and was it then to be said that he was not to receive compensation for the loss of the hopes held out to him by the Governor and the Prime Minister? That was the point. The whole scheme was trumpatory—even silly, perhaps; but, at the same time, it would not be for the credit of the colony that it should go out to the world that the Prime Minister of New Zealand should hold out promises and the Governor should back them up, and then that the person to whom the promises were made should be thrown over. The fact was, that this man's information, although not worth anything, was considered to be worth a great deal by those who got it from him and who made use of it. The House was bound to show him some consideration; and if it was bound to give any consideration at all, he did not see why it should stop at £150 and not give £300, as recommended by the Committee.

Mr. ANDREW moved, That the amount be reduced to sixpence.

Mr. Andrew's amendment negatived.
Question put, "That the sum of £150 be agreed to;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

AUCKLAND PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he would explain briefly the reason why the Bill was introduced. In 1875, the Provincial Council of Auckland passed an Act called the Public Buildings Act, which authorized certain Commissioners, amongst other things, to build an hospital with moneys to be borrowed on the security of certain lands reserved for public purposes. The Act provided that the Commissioners who had to deal with the matter should be the Superintendent of the Province of Auckland, the members of the Executive Council, and certain members of the Provincial Council. Those Commissioners raised a portion of the money required for building the hospital, but would be obliged to discontinue their operations on the coming into operation of the Abolition of Provinces Act, which took away from the Commissioners all their powers, and which did not provide for a case of this kind. As the building was now nearly completed, it was necessary that somebody should be able to do the work of the Commissioners. If the Act were not passed, the building would simply have to remain in an unfinished state. The present Bill provided that two members of the Provincial Executive and three members of the Provincial Council should be Commissioners. He proposed to meet the difficulty that had arisen by means of this Bill. The Bill provided that the same gentlemen as at present should act as Commissioners, with the exception of the Superintendent, who desired that his name should be omitted from the list. The Commissioners would therefore be Messrs. Reader Gilson Wood, James Thomas Boylan, Patrick Dignan, William Swanson, and George Maurice O'Rourke. It would be their duty to complete the building. Their borrowing power was limited to £25,000, for the simple reason that the rents of the reserves were sufficient only to pay the interest on that amount.

Mr. LUSK did not wish to oppose the second reading of this Bill, but he would point out that there was one objectionable feature in it. The honorable gentleman appeared to be unaware of the circumstances connected with this matter. By the course which he proposed to take, he proposed to do a very serious injury indeed to an educational endowment in the Province of Auckland. It was considered by the Provincial Council to be so very desirable that a large hospital should be built in Auckland that a majority of the members were prepared to throw a very valuable endowment into a common stock for the purpose of giving security for raising a large sum of money, two-fifths of which should be applied to the hospital, and the remaining three-fifths to educational purposes. By the course now proposed, that proportion would be practically reversed, and the educational property which was mortgaged would be made to bear the heaviest part of the burden of building the hospital, which would simply be taking trust property set aside for education and making it an hospital endowment. He thought that ought to be resisted on principle, even if it were not objectionable on the ground of public utility. When the Bill went into Committee, he hoped the Government would be prepared to alter the Bill so as to prevent any injustice; and if they did not, he would ask the House to do so.

TIMARU HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

The Bill was reported with amendments, which were agreed to.

On the motion, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. REID desired to place on record the fact that he should have preferred to have seen a more extended electorate than was provided for in this Bill. It was his wish to extend the electorate from which the Board would be elected. He made that statement lest it might be said that he was acting inconsistently in allowing the Bill to pass without voting against it.

Bill read a second time.

NAPIER HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

This Bill was considered in Committee, and reported without amendment.

On the motion, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. SHEEHAN, before that question was put, wished to make a few remarks. The remarks he would make on this Bill would have reference to the whole of the Bills. He might say that it was a practice among certain extreme forms of dissent to "improve the occasion," as they called it. He would desire to improve this occasion. He would not preach a sermon, although he might preach a sermon on these Bills from a particularly approprate text in the Psalms, "And he bringeth them unto the desired haven." He would begin by expressing the deep sense of gratitude which they felt to the Acting-Chairman of Committees for the zealous manner in which he had discharged his duties to-night. It was the custom, when an immigrant vessel arrived safely in the harbour, for the people on board to present the captain with a testimonial, as an acknowledgment of the care and ability with which he managed the vessel during the voyage, and brought them in safety to their desired destination. He would suggest that, in regard to these Harbour Board Bills, they might with propriety acknowledge in some such way the amount of work done to-night by the honorable member for Wairau in passing all these Bills through Committee. These Harbour Board Bills had had many strange vicissitudes. Some of them had been on the Order Paper since the first week of the session, and yet they had all been dealt with at the same time: they managed to fall on their feet. He was reminded of the Scriptural saying, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days." In the northern part of this colony, where he came from, there was a very large industry carried on in connection with the cutting down of the kauri timber. It was the custom there in dry weather to cut down the trees and put the logs in the creeks. A dam was erected in front of the logs. In the winter-time the whole of the logs were rushed down into the full broad river, to be afterwards cut up into planks at the saw-mills. To-night's proceedings had reminded him of this feature of the northern timber industry. He had never seen so much log-rolling in one night as he had witnessed that night in regard to these Bills. It sometimes happened that the flood momentum was so great that kauri logs were carried down the rivers and away out to sea. He could not help thinking that that would be the case with regard to many of these Harbour Board Bills which they had rushed through Committee that night. It might appear strange that he himself, having no interest in any of these Bills, should have been found aiding and abetting honorable members in pushing them through. He might say, in explanation, that he had one or two small "logs" on the Order Paper which he desired to have carried down the stream of the House for the purpose of being cut into planks to bridge over what otherwise might be an impassable chasm between him and his constituents; and it was possible that those honorable members who were interested in these Harbour Board "logs" might not feel disposed to give him their assistance if he did not assist them on the present occasion. He must say, in all seriousness, that he felt it a matter of deep regret that a Government comprising such men as Major Atkinson and Mr. Whitaker stood by while the House sanctioned all these Bills being rushed through in the space of three or four hours. If the Provincialists acted in that way with regard to Bills of this nature, they would be jumped upon in the most undoubted manner. There seemed to have arisen a party in the House strong enough to subvert the whole course of business—a party strong enough now to turn out the Government. It might be called "The Harbour Board Party," and Ministers were afraid to touch them. If the Government had done their duty they would have come down upon these Bills with that iron hand which a few weeks ago they were shaking at the heads of the Opposition. They had not however done so, and therefore they were accessories before the fact. One of their own number, the Minister of Justice, is himself a proprietor of one of these Harbour Bills. Like a Roman Emperor of old, forgetful of his position, he came down from the imperial throne to struggle in the gladiatorial arena. The title of that Bill, "Waikariri," meant cold water; and he thought the House should have thrown cold water upon the promoter's projects. Then there was the Bill promoted by the honorable member for Timaru, who had his particular "log," and was therefore compelled to go with the tide. A few nights ago, they heard that honorable member boldly declare that next year they would go in for making the Land Fund colonial revenue; but he had taken care this session, very properly no doubt, to have a harbour for Timaru constructed out of colonial revenue. "After me the deluge" was evidently the honorable gentleman's motto in regard to his Harbour Board Bills. No doubt, after they had gone on appropriating public money and public estate in this lavish manner for harbours, the colony would come in by-and-by for the crumbs and remnants of the landed estate. There was one cause of satisfaction, however, in regard to all these Bills. If those Bills could speak as they passed from the Chair, they would say with the old Roman gladiators, "Moriturus, te saluta-mus!" They would now go to that bourne from whence, for travellers of their suspicious appearance, there was no return. If one could write a motto over the door of another Chamber, they might adopt the motto of Dante's Inferno, and write over the door, "Who enter here, leave hope behind." The passage of these Bills through this House ought to be accompanied by a funeral procession, and the playing of "The Dead March" in Sawd. The introducers of these Bills should be made to go along the lobbies as the pall-bearers. There were times when they felt inclined to say, "Thank God, we have a House of Lords!" He had no doubt that in another Chamber the Bills which they had been passing to-night for promoting harbours, wharves, and quays, and gigantic improvements of various kinds would come to nothing. They would disappear, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," and "leave not a wrack behind." There was another moral to be drawn from this whole business. No man here to-night could have watched the manner in which they had discussed these eighteen or twenty Harbour Board Bills without coming to the conclusion, and feeling convinced in his own mind, how utterly unfit the Provincial Councils were for any work of legislation. Why, those miserable bodies would have spent a week over these Bills. They would have wasted the time of the country for a week discussing these measures. They would have gone carefully through the various clauses and discussed the propriety or otherwise of giving away the public estate in handfuls, in the way that had been done that night. For doing that, for wasting time in that way, they were very properly to be deprived of their functions. It was left to that House to do the work of the country in the quick decisive manner which had been displayed in regard to these Bills. If they could realize one wish, that wish would be that the whole of the population of New Zealand had been in the galleries that evening to look at the pitiful spectacle which the Committee presented. "The Ayes say 'Aye,' the Noes say 'No,' the Ayes have it." That was all. He did not mean any disrespect to the Chairman of Committees. By no means. That honorable gentleman had a great amount of work to get through, and he did it very well indeed. But the spectacle to which he referred was this: that twenty measures—some of them containing sixty clauses, every one of them, he believed, giving the power to borrow and to tax the people, and a great many of them dealing with the public estate and taking large endowments from it—all went by without a word of comment. He did not refer to the obstruction raised by the honorable member for Tūapeka to one Bill; but, taking the whole of them, they went through without a word of comment. Those who were always referring to the extravagance of Provincial Governments and Provincial Councils, and speaking of them in unfavourable terms, could not charge those bodies with dealing with the public estate of the country as the House had been doing that night. A new order of things had been ushered in with regard to these Harbour Board Bills. This was the baptism of the Abolition policy. What had taken place that night was simply the introduction of an experiment—the starting of a new régime. The Parliament would be utterly unable to control these matters. Every man coming to this House would have his own log, and these matters would be dealt with without even going through the form of making a bargain. He had taken no part in the proceedings in Committee. He saw that the House was determined to pass these Bills, that honorable members were anxious to get home to their respective places of abode, and for that reason he did not delay the Bills passing through Committee by raising any discussion. All he could say was, that the Government ought to have stopped this stream of Harbour Bills flowing through the Committee that night. They ought to have prevented them becoming law this session; they ought to have indicated that next session they would come down with a comprehensive Harbour Bill for the whole colony—a measure that would have dealt fairly with all sections of the community; and they should not have permitted the sort of business that had been carried on that night. With these few remarks he begged to say he would not further oppose the third reading of this Bill, or of any of the other Bills that had gone through Committee.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR thought it very inconvenient to have a discussion on the third reading of this Bill just then, because he was sure the House was not in a mood to listen to any criticism on these Harbour Bills, unless it were put in the very able way in which it had been by the honorable member for Rodney. Honorable members who objected to these Bills, who were not gifted with the easy eloquence of that honorable gentleman, could not hope to command the attention of the House at a quarter to four in the morning. What was it they were discussing? Nineteen Bills! For his part, he objected entirely to these Bills, and thought it was as well that the House should know the work it had done that night. It had performed, perhaps, the greatest parliamentary feat on record. It had put nineteen Bills, with an average of over fifty clauses each, through Committee, and was about to pass them through—and all in four hours. When they were recording feats of swimming across the English Channel, and walking a thousand miles in a thousand hours, it would be well that they should record this parliamentary feat of the General Assembly of New Zealand. He found that in these four hours they had given borrowing powers to certain local bodies in this country to the extent of over three-quarters of a million—the actual amount was £260,000. They had alienated 276,966 acres of the landed estate of the country, which they were told the other day was all pledged for colonial liabilities. When the members from Otago asked the other day to set aside reserves in the interior of their own province, not only for the benefit of the population that was there now but also for those who might come hereafter, and who could not live on these lands unless they were opened up by railways and thus made available: when they asked to be allowed to make a wise provision for the future in that way, and to have the cost made a first charge on the Land Fund, they were told, "No, the Land Fund of the colony can bear no further strain. It is all required for the colonial necessities." And now, as the honorable member for Rodney very properly put it, a Harbour Board party had sprung up in the House strong enough to turn out Governments. Without a single protest nineteen Bills had been allowed to pass through the House in one night, and with the approval of the Government. Before they went into Committee, the Government told them that, as each Bill came on, they would state whether they approved or disapproved of it, but that they did not approve of the lot. Yet, in every case in which they were asked in Committee, they said they approved. The case of the Timaru Bill was, in his opinion, a very gross one. They had there a proposal to spend £106,000, and at the expense of the District of Canterbury, for an experiment in an open roadstead; and at this time, when it was almost a matter of certainty that, if they passed the Loan Bill asking powers to raise a million, it would be refused, and they would have it thrown back in their teeth. Yet they were going in for an experiment in an open roadstead that would cost £106,000 and 50,000 acres of the landed estate of that district, worth another £100,000. With regard to the other measures, as a sample of the policy they had been pursuing, they had given 30,000 acres of land to the Wellington Harbour Board. Now, the charges upon the Wellington Land Fund were a debit annually of £46,833, or at 7 per cent. equal to a debtor capital of £669,000; and yet with that fact plainly before them, they were giving 30,000 acres of what Wellington had not got to give. The same remarks applied exactly to Hokitika. He ventured to say that not only would a Provincial Council have taken a week over those Bills, but they would not have passed one of them: in every such case they had refused to do anything of the sort. At any rate Otago had. He was certain that Wellington would have made the strongest possible protest. The strongest possible protest that could have been made was made the other night by the Deputy-Superintendent of Wellington; but he was sorry to say that protest was disregarded. He was content with making these few remarks, but he wished to say one thing further. He had no doubt that all those Bills would fall together, the good with the bad. He had no doubt the executioner would be the member of the Government in the other House. They would have the same scene as occurred the other day with the Forests Bill—the Government not daring hardly to oppose that Bill before this House, bitterly regretting that they were forced to divide upon the Bill, and then putting up their representative in the other House to destroy it, after accepting it in a modified form in this House. There would be just the same thing in the other House on these Bills. They would find even the member of the Government assisting to destroy the whole of them—the good with the bad.

Sir R. DOUGLAS, with regard to the passage of the Bills, said he had seen the same expedition used in a Provincial Council, and had seen the whole of the estimates passed through in about a quarter of an hour or at least twenty minutes. He had also seen several Bills rushed through the Auckland Provincial Council in one day just before the Superintendent prorogued it. He did not think the Provincial Councils were a bit better than this House in that respect. With regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Rodney about a party strong enough to turn the Government out, if that honorable gentleman and those with him had chosen the other day to have opposed the Bills, they would have found others ready to help them—a party strong enough to have thrown out those of the Bills that were not fit to be passed. It was very much like clap-net for the honorable member for Rodney to stand up and assert that he and the honorable gentleman who had just sat down were the only just persons, and in fact the only persons in that House who were prepared to oppose these Bills. Why had they not got up before and opposed them? They would have found plenty of members to assist them. But he (Sir R. Douglas) looked upon this matter in a very different light. He was glad to see these reserves set on one side. He was convinced that money not spent on them would be appropriated by the colony, and the greater number of reserves that were set aside now the better, for there was some chance of those reserves being valuable in the future, whereas if they were left to the provincial districts the whole of them would be got rid of in a very short space of time.

Mr. J. C. BROWN said the remarks just made came with very bad grace from the honorable gentleman, seeing that, while most of them had sat there studiously going over the Bills, the honorable gentleman had been absent most of the evening.

Mr. ROWE did not think there was much in the arguments that had been used, either by the honorable member for Rodney or the honorable member for Mount Ida. He hoped these Bills would meet with a better fate than those honorable gentleman prophesied: they deserved a better fate. If they were passed, carried through the Upper House, and faithfully worked out by the various Harbour Boards, they would result in vast benefit to the colony; and he only hoped that a number of other such logs might be rolled that were intended for the good of the colony, and calculated to promote their best interests. When those works that were contemplated were carried out, the colony would possess a very much larger borrowing power than it had at present. He had no fear but that these Bills would result in benefit to the colony.

Mr. HUNTER was surprised to hear the arguments adduced by the honorable member for Rodney and the honorable member for Mount Ida. The administration of these Boards, and the exercise of the powers given, would be confined to the people in the different localities. Those honorable gentlemen must surely have lost sight of that fact. There was no set of Bills which had passed this session that had been more carefully considered than these measures, because they had been brought forward by different individuals, and had been well considered. The Bill of which he had charge was prepared by the solicitor of the Wellington Corporation, and revised by that body, and by members of the Chamber of Commerce. He believed most of the other Bills had undergone similar care; and therefore he for one had no regret for the part he had taken in passing these Bills. By passing them, he thought that the other branch of the Legislature would be conferring a great benefit on the different localities; and he hoped they would continue to pass Bills that would give some useful result to the country for their attendance there. Up to the present time, their progress had been very slow.

Mr. STAFFORD would only make one remark upon a subject that had been twice referred to by the honorable member for Mount Ida. That honorable gentleman talked about £106,000 being given; but he did not seem to have taken the trouble to see from what sources that money was contributed. It was not colonial revenue. It was revenue part of which was an original endowment made years ago for the Timaru and Gladstone Board of Works, which would now be handed over to the Harbour Board for the same object for which it was originally set aside. The other part of the revenue was a vote that had been passed in consecutive sessions by the Provincial Council of Canterbury, who might be supposed to have known what they were doing, and was in the deposit account of the Province of Canterbury at the present moment, available for that particular object. There was no colonial revenue taken for the purpose. The people of Canterbury had merely determined among themselves as to how they were to spend some of their own revenues, portions of which had accrued years ago.

SARTORIS AND DOWNE.

Mr. STAFFORD asked the Premier, In what manner the Government proposes to give effect to the recommendation of the Sartoris, Downe, and Others Committee?

Major ATKINSON said the matter was under the consideration of the Government, who were very anxious that it should be settled if possible, but they had not yet come to any determination. He would inform the honorable gentleman, in the course of a few days, whether it would be possible to settle it this session. The Government did not concur in the report of the Committee, which was at present before the House, but they would, if they could see their way to do so, submit a proposition to the House.

AUCKLAND ISLANDS.

Mr. LUMSDEN asked the Government, For what term, and on what conditions, the lease of the Auckland Islands has been granted to Dr. Monckton, of Riverton; and whether any steps have been taken to ascertain if the conditions of such lease are being complied with? An impression existed in Southland that Dr. Monckton had leased the Auckland Islands upon certain conditions, one of which was to maintain at the islands a dépôt of provisions, which would be available for any shipwrecked persons. A report which appeared in a paper on the previous day, respecting the visit of the schooner "Hira" to the Auckland Islands, seemed to him to be inconsistent with the idea that the conditions were fulfilled. The report, after referring to the visit of the "Hira," went on to say, "At Ross Bay she supplied Nelson and his wife, placed there by Dr. Monckton, with provisions. They were nearly starving, subsisting on seal-flesh and shell-fish." He fancied the statement must be a mistake; but, if true, it showed that the supposed conditions had not been complied with.

Major ATKINSON said there was no doubt at all that Dr. Monckton had not fulfilled the conditions of his lease, and the matter had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, with the view of determining the lease. The last payment which would have been due had the lease been fulfilled was not made. The issue of the lease was stopped directly the Government received the report of Captain Suttie, of H.M.S. "Nympe," of the failure of Dr. Monckton to carry out the conditions of the lease. He thought there must be some misstatement as to the condition in which the people were found at the Islands, because Captain Suttie left a considerable supply of provisions; and therefore he believed the statement the honorable member referred to was exaggerated. There was no doubt the lease had not been fulfilled; and the Government were taking steps to determine it.

W. HUTT.

Mr. CURTIS asked the Government, Whether they are prepared to give effect to the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee in their report upon the petition of William Hutt and others? He need hardly urge upon the Government the necessity for settling this affair, if possible. The Petitions Committee recommended that land scrip of the value of 80s. for each pound of the original purchase-money, to be exercisable in the Province of Wellington, should be issued to the claimants. He was not sufficiently acquainted with the whole of the merits of the case to express any opinion as to the decision of the Committee, and he merely wished to know whether the Government were prepared to carry it out.

Major ATKINSON said the Government were not prepared, at the present time, to give effect to the Committee's report. If they did so, it would open up a very wide question. He thought the petitioners had a very just ground of complaint; but it was impossible to settle the matter without giving it due consideration, which it could not possibly receive until the recess.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

On the motion of Mr. WHITAKER, it was resolved, That the decision of the House of the 21st of June last, that Mr. Rees's name be not added to the Committee on Public Accounts, be rescinded; and that the names of the Hon. Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Rees be added to the Committee on Public Accounts.

ABOLITION.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Sir G. GREY said,—Before you leave the chair, Sir, I have a motion which I wish to bring under the notice of the House. For the first time, this morning I have read a despatch and its enclosures, addressed by the Governor of this colony to the Secretary of State upon the 21st June instant—whilst this House was in session. I propose to make some remarks in justification of my own conduct, and to shield myself from the attacks made upon me in that despatch. With a view to so doing, I wish to conclude my remarks by moving the adjournment of the House. I am sure the House will feel with me that it was impossible I could have read this despatch without receiving what I may call a severe shock to my feelings. I had not the least idea that such a document and its enclosures were in existence. I think I shall show to the House, in a very few words and a very short time, that such a document ought not to have been written; that it contains aspersions upon my character which are utterly without foundation, and which, if they were intended to have been made, ought not to have been concealed from me. Without troubling the House with any lengthened remarks upon the constitutional question involved in this despatch, I will simply say that the expressions used with reference to these constitutional principles are not a fair statement of the principles which are at stake, nor are they a fair representation of the circumstances of this country, or of the changes about to be made. I need hardly remark that the General Government of this colony themselves proposed in the first place to make the abolition of the provinces but a partial measure, and that idea was no original conception of mine. It was the carrying out of a plan which they pledged themselves to carry out, solemnly assuring the constituencies they would not make abolition a general measure. From that determination they afterwards departed. Well, Sir, not only did they do that, but a statement is made to the effect that the calculations I have made with regard to the population of Auckland and Otago are unsound. But my calculations were the calculations of the Government, taken from their own official returns. I adopted them as being the best I could get, and as being those which I thought the Government themselves would not impugn. Then, Sir, there is no allusion whatever, in this despatch to the Secretary of State, made to the nature of the other branch of the Legislature in the colony; nor is there any allusion made to the way in which small constituencies return so large a number of members to this House—constituencies which from various causes are under the influence of the Government of New Zealand. I will not trouble the House upon these points, but I will make representations in another quarter in order to disabuse the minds of persons not acquainted with the circumstances of the colony, of the impressions the despatch will make upon them. There are other circumstances in connection with the document, however, to which I must allude. I object to its style, to the language used in it, and I object still more to what to my mind is a very sad revelation indeed, which is made in this despatch. It is quite certain that the writer of that document does not hold the position which our Most Gracious Sovereign has always desired that such an official should hold to her subjects—a position of impartiality, a position of fairness to all parties, and especially to all public men. I am sure Sir, that no unbiassed mind can rise from a perusal of this despatch with any other feeling than that it emanated from a political partisan. I say that with all confidence. I have read it in an utterly dispassionate manner, unmoved by the allegations against myself which it contains, and not feeling injured thereby, because I am certain that nothing ever was written which will redound more to my advantage, or to the advantage of the cause I am endeavouring to promote. Now, Sir, there are some statements made in this despatch which it is impossible for me to peruse without almost indescribable regret. Let me suppose for one moment that the Sovereign at Home allowed private persons to entrap or to force into conversation unthinking men, and then allowed those conversations to be repeated to her by her Private Secretaries, or to be placed in writing before her, so that men who might possibly become her Advisers might come before her with a traduced character, come before her in such a manner that—she believing these reports in the manner in which this writer certainly does believe the reports he has received—it would be impossible that those persons who might become her Advisers should possess her confidence. Supposing, too, that the Queen, having from time to time received reports so damning, I may say, to the character of a public man, yet from time to time met that public man with smiling face and with friendly mien, but all the time entertained such sentiments in her secret heart with regard to him, it is impossible that confidence should ever exist between Her Majesty and a statesman when he discovers it. But there is something here even worse than that. Here, the only medium allowed to us between ourselves and our Sovereign is the writer of this despatch. Between myself and Her Most Gracious Majesty relations have existed for many years. Aspersions of a nature which I myself could hardly characterize, and to which perhaps I ought hardly to allude, have been made against myself by a person who should not have tried to destroy me in Her Majesty's regard. I refer to the writer of this document, which contains accusations against me which, if believed, must have blasted my character for ever with my Sovereign and her Advisers. I submit that a thing of this kind has been hitherto unknown. In this letter, enclosed in the Governor's despatch, the writer of it simply authorized the Private Secretary, to whom it was written, to show it to the Governor, but to no other person. It was bad enough to have done the first thing, but the second transaction is, I consider, an act of gross treachery and injustice towards myself; and what is more, I say that the writer of this despatch and his Advisers must themselves have known that some of the statements it contains are untrue. Sir, I can prove that in a few words. There is a statement—

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I rise to a point of order. The honorable gentleman is making statements which, it appears to me, are entirely unparliamentary. I do not know whether it is my duty or yours, Sir, to call the attention of the House to this fact; but when any honorable member of this House states that what has been written in a despatch by His Excellency, he, the Governor, knows to be untrue, I take it to be quite time for the House to stop the use of such language. I thought, by your ruling the other day, that you would prohibit the introduction of the Governor's name into debate in such a way as this.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It appears to me that, when a document is laid on the table of this House, it is quite competent for any honorable member to speak on it and refer directly to the writer, so long as what is said is said in language that is respectful. It seems to me that the honorable member for the Thames has a right to speak, under these conditions, on this subject.

Mr. ANDREW.—The words used were not merely that this document contains misstatements, but that the Governor knew it contained misstatements.

Sir G. GREY.—I submit that I never used the Governor's name in that way. I say that His Excellency's Advisers must have known that the statements made in this document are untrue.

Major ATKINSON.—The limitation of reference to His Excellency is within your province, Sir. I only called the attention of the House to the fact that language had been used which, it seemed to me, was perfectly unjustifiable. I regret extremely that such language should be used.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If any language is used which is not proper, it is my duty to draw attention to it; and if I fail to do so, it is competent for any honorable member to draw my attention to the fact. I do not think that the honorable member for the Thames, in his remarks, transgressed the proper bounds. I think that when a document is placed on the table of the House, it becomes a fair subject for comment.

Mr. ANDREW.—I rise to make a personal explanation, Sir. I wish merely to say that I should not have risen in the first instance had I heard distinctly what the honorable member for the Thames says he said. It seemed to me that he did not use the words "the Governor or his Advisers," but "the Governor and his Advisers."

Mr. HUNTER.—I submit that the honorable member for the Thames has, in distinct terms, mentioned the Governor's name, notwithstanding that you have ruled on a previous occasion that His Excellency's name should not be brought up in any debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I hope there will be no misunderstanding about this. It is not right capriciously and without cause to import into the debates of this House His Excellency's name; but if papers are laid on the table emanating from His Excellency, it is quite competent for an honorable member to refer to the writer of them—in fact, it is absolutely essential and cannot be avoided. The only question then is, whether the comments are of such a nature as to affect the dignity of this House. In this case, I think the honorable member for the Thames was quite in order in his remarks.

Mr. PYKE.—Sir, speaking to a point of order, I should like to draw the attention of the House to a parallel circumstance which occurred not very long ago. I was punished by this House for uttering, in an under-tone, the word "discreditable." I should like to know whether that is a stronger word than the word "untrue," as used by the honorable member for the Thames. I think the House should remember this parallel case.

Mr. W. WOOD.—Sir, I take it to be one of the privileges of this Assembly that it may take the part of any member who is slandered; and I think that we should do so, and deal with the person who slanders, no matter what his position may be, just as we would with the humblest individual.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There can be no doubt that any member of this House who has been injuriously referred to in papers placed before this House has a perfect right to defend himself against any charges or imputations that may be made in those papers regarding him.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, the Premier has shown throughout this session a determination to destroy me. I stand before this House appealing to it, and possibly pleading for my life, because the charges made against me amount almost to treason, and certainly assail my honor; and under such circumstances, if a word of unguarded strength escapes from my lips, I may well be excused, particularly when I remember that the Premier at the beginning of this session, acting as the speaking-trumpet of another Minister of the Crown, jumped up, and, in reference to a statement of mine, plainly used the words, "That is not true." Sir, you very properly said, when I called your attention to those words, that they would reflect disgrace upon him and not upon myself if they were not justified; and I submit that a man pleading in a cause like this should not be subjected to interruption of this kind. I will prove what I said. There is a statement in this despatch to the effect that I spoke of the necessity of my taking over the police of Auckland from the General Government in view of the possibility of conflict between the Provincial and General Governments. The precise words are not pretended to be given, because the writer says the conversation took place twelve months previously—a conversation of which I have no knowledge, and which must have been extorted from me by a person who acted the part of a spy with the deliberate intention of reporting my words to the Governor. I knew that the Ministry had had recourse to unfair means to injure me, but I did not know the company with which I was brought into contact. But, Sir, even the words themselves bear an interpretation very different from that which is put upon them here. The words are that "there might come a time when, in some conflict of authority between the Provincial and Central Governments, I should find myself seriously embarrassed by reason of the control of the police being out of my hands." Now, Sir, I believe I was the only Superintendent in the colony who was not allowed to have the control of the police. I determined to assert my right to that control; and I was successful at last in wringing from the Government the admission that I had that right. And then, Sir, what did I do? Having succeeded in that object, I did not take over the control of the police; and the Government knew perfectly well when they sent Home this despatch that I had had that offer, that I did not avail myself of it, and that the police were left under the control of the Government, as they remain to this moment. Now, Sir, I ask, were the Government justified, knowing that, in implying that I was endeavouring to get control of the police for traitorous purposes? Why did they not say, when they received that letter, "You must be mistaken. The Superintendent could have taken over the police had he chosen, but he has not done so. He has left them in our hands"? I was quite right in saying that a conflict of authority might take place between myself and the Government with reference to the police. I believe that, had the police been under my control, I could easily have secured that Native who committed so desperate a murder in the vicinity of Auckland; but I was not allowed to do so, because the police were not in my hands. I therefore was justified in saying that either the writer of this letter or his Advisers must have known that, in the despatch sent to the Secretary of State, they did not represent that which was true. Sir, this system of espionage, with which I have been surrounded, has prevailed for a long time. I have been the victim of persons who, under the guise of friendly feeling, have been deliberately plotting my ruin in another country. The writer of this despatch states,—

"Mr. Dargaville was at the time a member of the Provincial Council of Auckland, and the occurrence he narrates occurred about a year ago, before the meeting of the General Assembly, and consequently before the Abolition Bill was before the public. The circumstance came to my knowledge soon after it took place."

I would ask, Sir, how that came to the knowledge of the writer of this despatch; and why, after it came to his knowledge, was no opportunity of explanation afforded to me? Why should I feel that, at the present moment, I perhaps stand a degraded man in the estimation of that one by whom, amongst all mortals, I would wish to be thought well of, and by whom I have been thought well of for so many years? I declare solemnly that I would not have made such accusations against another as have been made against me. I would have shrunk from so doing with horror and shame. And let me tell the House this: that the whole of these accusations—one of which I have now disposed of—rest upon the authority of one gentleman and the Private Secretary of the writer of this despatch—that, I believe, is the relation in which they stand to each other—and I here affirm that the gentleman whose letter I relied on for this accusation is entirely unknown to me as an associate or companion. I have never met him in any private house. No relations whatever of a private nature have existed between us at any period of time. He has stopped me in the streets, and asked me questions which I wished to avoid. I have met him once or twice at the Auckland Club; and absolutely one of the reasons on account of which for many months I avoided entering that club, except for a few moments during the day-time, was to get clear of the writer of this letter, who appears in a correspondence with the highest personage in this colony through his Private Secretary. Once or twice he has called at my office on public business; but no conversation has ever passed between him and myself except on one occasion when a statement was extorted from me under the circumstances I have stated. Then the writer of this despatch, which is sent Home to the Secretary of State and is especially intended for Her Majesty's perusal, makes another serious charge against me in these words:—

"As, however, Sir George Grey has seen fit to make this formal complaint to your Lordship, I now distinctly charge him with being himself the first to give currency to a report similar to the one he has brought under your Lordship's notice; and, in support of this accusation, I enclose to your Lordship the copy of a letter which has been addressed by Mr. Dargaville to my Private Secretary, for my information."

Sir, I assert that I was never asked a single question connected with these circumstances; I was not allowed to send Home a denial of the fact at the same time when this letter was sent; it has been in circulation in England for some considerable period of time, I being in entire ignorance that such slanders were being circulated against me; and I now declare to this House that I was in no respect whatever the author of this statement. The statement was made to me a considerable time ago—at a time anterior to that stated by the writer of the letter. I did not then credit it, but the gentleman who told me, who is a supporter of the Government, regarded it as a perfectly natural thing, and as a thing true in fact. He could see nothing extraordinary about it; but I was filled with surprise, and certainly did repeat the statement to one or two other persons. The whole circumstances then passed from my mind; but afterwards, when I wrote my letter to the Governor on the 5th June, I stated that I was assured that warnings of this kind were being circulated in Dunedin, and were producing a great effect. I saw the statement in a newspaper, and quoted it in my letter to the Governor. That statement was to the effect that opposition to the Ministry might involve the city (Auckland) being cannonaded by the men-of-war in the harbour. I first saw that statement in the New Zealand Herald. The proprietor of that journal, as good and noble-minded a man as ever lived, has passed away regretted by all; but the editor of the paper is still there, and let him say whether, directly or indirectly, I had anything to do with the circulation of that report. I next heard that the statement had been circulated in Dunedin, and I was again very much surprised. I have no doubt the gentleman who informed me of this spoke the truth in telling me what he did. He had been in Dunedin for a considerable time, and he came to Auckland. He told me what the threats were which were circulated there. That report found its way into an Auckland newspaper. That report had two effects. One was that it led the supporters of the Government to use language which irritated those who were opposed to them; and it discouraged men who thought with me, and who shrank from doing anything which might bring about any difficulties in any possible contest in this country. I thought it was a wrong use to make of the power vested in the hands of the Government of this country to allow such warnings to go abroad, and that it was their duty at once to have contradicted them. They could have contradicted them instantly. I think it was wrong of them to have written this despatch and to have sent it Home without allowing a contradiction to be made, and without allowing that document to be made public until last night or this morning, when it was first made known to myself and to this House. I venture to say further, on this point, that the conversation I am reported to have held on this subject I cannot recollect. It is possible a question may have been asked me. It is possible a reply may have been given. I think, from a knowledge of myself and my manner, that the words put into my mouth are not the words I used. Words which I am supposed to have uttered twelve months ago are put into writing, and form part of a State paper. Ought a man's character to be taken away upon such evidence as that? Ought not, in all common justice and fairness, this letter to have been sent to me before it was transmitted to the Secretary of State, so that my remarks upon it might have gone Home at the same time? I say, Sir, that this is one of those attempts which the present Ministry have made in every possible manner to damage myself. The Press is under their control. I must use this word, and I believe it is parliamentary: the Press is bribed by them. I use that word advisedly, and they know it themselves. I believe that the Premier has become callous to shame in a great degree. I believe that a continued wrongdoing in many respects, and a success in that wrongdoing, has hardened his mind to the thoughts which he ought to feel. He must know not only that the Press is brought under the influence of the Government, but that they use their position in this House to appoint members of the House as editors of their newspapers, influencing at once persons in this House, the writers, and, out of the House, the paid individuals. They must know that they have done much to corrupt the Press. Why, even in the Abolition Bill, they provided that one newspaper in each provincial district was to be considered as the Government Gazette. They specially put that into the Abolition Bill, and it appears in that Bill now. Not only in that, but in the Debtors and Creditors Act also they use their power to give sums of money to their own newspapers. Every means has been put in action to ruin myself, and to stop me in the course that I am pursuing. The Press has been employed, and the writer of this despatch has been employed, to damage me with my Sovereign and with my fellow-countrymen at Home. The Times newspaper has been employed by the correspondent of that journal in this colony—in this correspondent they have used every means for that purpose; and I say that this last attempt, which has been discovered now, is the worst of all. I ask, what redress is there for us under such circumstances? To whom are we to appeal? The Crown is known to be the fountain of justice. If that fountain is now muddied by partisans and by partisanship, where are we to fly for refuge? What are we to do? What hope is there for anybody? Let them fairly bring their accusations forward in this country, and let me defend myself. I see no hope of safety for myself or for any other person who happens to incur their displeasure. Nothing to me could be more painful than to find that the mind of those whom I valued, and whose esteem for me is one of the most precious things in this world, has been thus secretly poisoned against me, and months must elapse before justice can be done me at Home, if it can ever be done. I appeal to honorable members to try to find some means by which the shield of protection can be thrown around those who sit here, that they may be protected from slanders of this kind.

Mr. THOMSON.—I think the honorable member for the Thames has made a very calm and dignified statement, especially when we consider the very grave charges that have been made against him. The honorable member has spoken in a very subdued spirit, apparently arising from the gravity of the charges made against him. If the honorable gentleman is guilty of the charges which have been made against him, he is, in fact, not fit to sit in this House. The honorable gentleman is charged with inventing or giving rise to a certain report, and he is accused of doing this for party purposes. And, Sir, even stronger charges are brought against the honorable gentleman. The tone in which the honorable member for the Thames has addressed himself to this question is very different indeed from the tone of the despatch to which reference has been made. The style of this despatch is in the very highest degree objectionable. This is a State paper which is to be bound up with the Votes and Proceedings of this House. It appears to me that it is not written in that calm and dignified style in which a State paper ought to be written. It is very different indeed from many of the State papers that we have been accustomed to read. It is very different indeed from the style of the despatch of the Secretary of State, Lord Carnarvon, that has been so frequently referred to in this House this session. That despatch was written in a very dignified and calm style. His Lordship expressed a doubt as to whether the General Assembly could abolish the provinces, and simply expressed a hope that, should the provinces be abolished, the hopes of the General Assembly would be realized. But the despatch we are now considering seems to me to be written, I may say, in a partial spirit. And, Sir, looking at this letter, it seems to be written, not by the Officer Administering the Government of New Zealand, but by Sir Julius Vogel himself. It is quite in his style. If honorable members wish to satisfy themselves on this point, they have only to read the memorandum that was sent Home in regard to the Loan Agents, and the letters that were sent to the various banking inspectors throughout the colony. It seems exceedingly wrong that the Officer Administering the Government of New Zealand should send a despatch Home written by his Responsible Advisers. His despatches are presumed to be his own. Despatches are often founded upon memoranda which are enclosed. We have the memorandum of the Government to His Excellency the Governor on this question. For this memorandum he is not responsible, but for the letter sent by the Officer Administering the Government of this country to the Secretary of State, that officer is individually responsible.

That being the case, he should be very particular in regard to writing such a document himself. Then the question arises, why has this despatch not been laid upon the table months ago? This despatch, I find, was written on the 21st June, nearly four months since. I presume the Government have kept back this despatch because it was objectionable, and produced it now simply because they could not retain it longer. The honorable member for the Thames says he asked for it. If the honorable gentleman asked for this despatch, why was it not laid on the table months ago?

Sir G. GREY.—I asked for it the other day.

Mr. THOMSON.—At all events, the document ought to have been laid on the table the day after it was written. This is a document that reflects very seriously on the character of the honorable member for the Thames, and, such being the case, it was the bounden duty of the Government, if they did not submit the document to the honorable member before sending it Home, to lay it on the table the day after it was written, so that the honorable gentleman might take what steps he considered best under the circumstances to vindicate his character. I think the despatch has been detained thus long simply because it could not be detained any longer. It has been written four months. Letters have been sent Home since this despatch was written, and answers have been received to them. I presume that there will be something in the Home papers regarding this very despatch, a despatch reflecting so seriously upon the honorable member for the Thames, who is well known at Home. I think it is a pity that this despatch was ever written, and it is also a pity that the Government did not lay it on the table the very day after it was sent Home.

Major ATKINSON.—I am sorry to have to trouble the House with any remarks, but perhaps it is right that I should say a few words. The honorable gentleman has made what is, for him, a very temperate speech.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, Sir, I say, for him.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Major ATKINSON.—I will repeat it, in order that honorable members may understand what I am saying. I say, the honorable gentleman, for him, made a very temperate speech. Although he complained of being slandered himself, he did not give way, as he usually does, to slandering Ministers—to the usual extent which he does. He was content upon the present occasion—

Mr. W. WOOD.—Sir, I call attention to the words used by the honorable member—"he did not give way as he usually does to slandering Ministers." I should like to know if you think they are proper words for the honorable member to use, or for any other honorable member to use.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think the honorable member is out of order.

Major ATKINSON.—I am going to quote the words the honorable member used to-day. He says, I am "shameless with greed in having provided estates for my friends." If the honorable gentleman will use that language outside this House, I will give him an immediate opportunity of proving it in the Courts of law, to which he is so ready to apply. That, Sir, is a distinct challenge to the honorable member, but which I fear he has not the moral courage to accept; if he accepts it, he will see whether I have grown shameless enough to supply my friends with large estates.

Sir G. GREY.—I said nothing about that to-day. I used no such terms to-day.

Major ATKINSON.—Will the honorable member tell me what he did say?

Sir G. GREY.—Not to-day.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, to-day. "Shameless with greed."

Sir G. GREY.—I say No. Sir, I assure you I said nothing of the kind. I said the honorable gentleman had grown shameless in the pursuit of things of this kind. I used no such words as "estates for his friends" or "for greed."

Major ATKINSON.—I take the honorable member's disavowal. I believe that I distinctly heard the words; but it is possible I may have been mistaken. I think I can leave it to honorable members who heard the words. Then the honorable member went on to say that we had deliberately—

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, an honorable member (Mr. Richmond)—the honorable member for the Suburbs of Nelson—used words. Perhaps he will repeat them.

Mr. RICHMOND.—I say the honorable member for the Thames used the words, "employing spies and bribing the Press."

Sir G. GREY.—Yes; "employed spies and bribed the Press"—and I meant it.

Major ATKINSON.—I am not particular about the words the honorable member uses to me. I am perfectly content, as I have stated in this House, to let the public of New Zealand judge between us. The honorable member goes on to say that the whole course of our legislation has been to corrupt the country; to bribe members: that we have spies watching the honorable member throughout the country. He has been pleased to say that Mr. Dargaville, whose character, I venture to say, will bear comparison with his own, and should, at any rate, protect him from such statements, was employed as a spy by the Government of the day to trap him into—I really do not know what.

Sir G. GREY.—I said nothing of the kind. I said he acted as a spy; which he distinctly did.

Major ATKINSON.—I am very sorry I appear to have misheard the honorable gentleman all through. At any rate, I must trust to my own memory instead of the honorable gentleman's. I say distinctly that the honorable member said that we employed spies, and that this gentleman was employed as a spy for the purpose I have stated. That is my impression—I may be right or wrong. I would point out that an honorable gentleman who is so very free with such false accusations as I enumerated, who scarcely ever rises in his place without accusing Ministers of the most shameful crimes—which accusations he must know are untrue—is not a subject for much compassion, even supposing the statements he has made that he has been misrepresented were according to fact. But, Sir, they are not. I will remind the House of the circumstances under which His Excellency's despatch was written. The honorable gentleman himself thought proper to address the Secretary of State direct—against all constitutional usage, against usage he himself complained of being not observed. He even went so far, when Governor, as to request the Secretary of State at Home to return unanswered letters addressed to him from the colony until they had gone through the Governor. The honorable gentleman thought proper to address the Secretary of State direct, and only forwarded the letter to His Excellency in time to be too late for the mail. It is very unfortunate that the honorable gentleman is always obliged to put off his correspondence with the Home Government, so that he has not sufficient time to communicate with His Excellency to enable His Excellency to comment upon his letters. This despatch, of which the honorable gentleman so much complains, was written to comment upon a despatch which the honorable gentleman had thought it right to send direct to the Secretary of State, without giving His Excellency an opportunity of commenting upon it. I would ask the House to remember this, and that His Excellency's despatch was one commenting upon a letter which the honorable gentleman had succeeded in sending to the Secretary of State so as to gain time upon the Governor. What does the honorable gentleman endeavour to convey in that letter? He represents it as probable, and adds the weight of his own name to it, that Her Majesty's representative in this colony was going to cause Auckland to be bombarded by Her Majesty's ships, at the instance of the Ministry of the day, for party purposes. I ask the House whether a gentleman who will take a newspaper report, and not give it simply as a newspaper report, but who adds the weight of his own name to it, saying he has reason to believe the thing is true, has any cause to complain of comments which His Excellency thinks it necessary to make upon such a document?

Sir G. GREY.—May I rise to a personal explanation? The statement I made in the despatch was this: that I believed it was true that the supporters of the Government had been making those statements. That was my allegation.

Major ATKINSON.—The letter is before honorable gentlemen, and they know exactly what was implied and what was written. Do honorable members think that the honorable gentleman would have asked the Secretary of State to telegraph out that Auckland was not to be bombarded, if he did not believe that such an act was possible and probable? I venture to say there is not a single person in Auckland, except the honorable member (Sir G. Grey), who believed it for a moment; and I venture to say that the Home authorities will treat the rumour with the contempt it deserves. To say that persons in Auckland were deterred from taking action in political matters on account of a fear of Her Majesty's ships bombarding Auckland, is simply ridiculous. The despatches of His Excellency are written by himself, and not by Ministers. He communicates direct with the Secretary of State, and Ministers have nothing to do with writing his despatches in any form or shape; and the honorable member for the Thames must know that perfectly well. I will read the words of the honorable member's letter, so that the House may see whether I have misquoted:—"I am so entirely satisfied of the honor and good faith of the paper from which I quote that I feel sure there are substantial grounds for the statement it contains."

Sir G. GREY.—Will the honorable gentleman read the statement in the newspaper? I submit that should be done, so that the House may know what the statement was. It was that the followers of the Government were spreading certain reports.

Major ATKINSON.—With regard to the letter, honorable members are of course as capable of forming an opinion as to its correctness as I am; they have all the facts before them. I have no doubt that the country will indorse every word of His Excellency's despatch. I distinctly indorse every word of it. If the despatch had not been absolutely true—if the honorable gentleman did not feel its truth—we should not have had that speech from him to-day. The reason why the despatch was not laid on the table before is simply this: that His Excellency desired to obtain an answer from the Secretary of State to the letter of the Superintendent of Auckland, written on the 5th June, and also an answer to this despatch, before communicating it to the House. One of these documents, as I have said, was a commentary on the other, and His Excellency desired that the reply of the Secretary of State should be received before they were laid on the table of the House. The honorable member's letter has been laid upon the table now, because he expressed a desire the other night that it should be produced. Upon that desire being communicated to the Governor, His Excellency consented to the despatch being laid on the table. I need not trouble the House further than to say that if the honorable member has real cause for complaint—if he can deny any of these statements that have been made against him—he has the ordinary means of redress open to him. He knows as well as anybody how to avail himself of those means; and when the correspondence is ended it will be for the country to judge who has taken the right course. I have not the slightest doubt what the verdict of the country will be.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—If it had not been for the assurance which the honorable member has given that His Excellency writes his own despatches, I should have recognized in the speech of the honorable member the Roman hand that penned this despatch. It appears to be identical in feeling with the despatch itself.

Major ATKINSON.—No doubt. I entirely indorse that despatch.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—There is not the least occasion to say that, because the honorable gentleman is just the man who would indorse such a despatch, which is just on a par with many speeches he makes in the House. He was good enough to characterize the speech of the honorable member for the Thames as a temperate one for him; but when I recollect the intemperate speeches which the honorable member himself has made in this House, I think he might have left that amount of faint praise to come from somebody else. The honorable member for the Thames made a calm, impartial, and unimpassioned speech, and it would have been well if the despatch to which we are now referring had been written in the same spirit. The honorable gentleman says he is content to leave it to the people to judge between the Government and the honorable member for the Thames; but I tell him that the people have been judging and are now judging, and in two of the most important places in the colony they have judged most emphatically against the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government and his colleagues. The population of two provinces—each of which contains a larger population than did the whole colony when first it received its Constitution—have given a most emphatic decision against the present Abolition proposals. The honorable member says he has no sympathy for the honorable member for the Thames. That is also an entirely unnecessary statement. We know perfectly well he has no sympathy for the honorable member for the Thames—that it is just the other way—but we have this consoling assurance, that the honorable member for the Thames does not require his sympathy. He is able to take care of himself, and my honorable friend will have to be very assiduous indeed if he gets the upper hand of the honorable member for the Thames either in this or any other business. The honorable member says in effect that the honorable member for the Thames delayed sending his despatch to the Governor until it was too late for the Governor to make any comments on it which would accompany it to the Secretary of State. That, in itself, is a charge against the honorable member for the Thames of burking any comments that might otherwise be sent Home by the Ministry on his despatch to the Secretary of State. I do not think that is a charge which should be made by gentlemen who are complaining night after night of unfair charges being brought against them. I think a Government who so constantly complain of unfair charges being made against them should be very careful how they make charges in return. The honorable gentleman says no one believes this statement about force being employed against those who are opposed to the Abolition Bill coming into force. That is not the question. The question is, Whether persons claiming to be in confidential relationship with the Government—I will not call it having private entry by the backstairs, but having intimate and confidential relations with the Government—did make statements of this kind. I say they did. I say that in the Province of Auckland threats of that kind were frequently made by Government supporters during the recent elections; and it is but a fair inference that, when people were voting upon this question of abolition, statements of this kind, that Her Majesty's ships, and armed force if necessary, would be made use of to enforce abolition, would have some effect. It is equal to saying, "We have to put abolition into force, and we will compel you to elect persons who will help us to do so." Why, Sir, in the very lobbies of this building, I have heard these statements made, not in jest, but deliberately made, that, no matter what the opposition might be to this measure, it would be put into force, and that any attempt in the Province of Otago or Auckland to prevent it would be met by the employment of force. I heard the other day members who support the Government say they would themselves come up to Auckland and assist in putting abolition into force. I tell them, if they have that intention, they had better think carefully before they act upon it, because it might so happen that, after they got there, there might, on the part of afflicted relatives, be inquiries after missing friends. I do not know, of course, where the line ought to be drawn in commenting on despatches written by His Excellency the Governor; but I apprehend, whether he writes them himself or not, he derives his information from Ministers, and consults them as to the subjects upon which he writes. I contend, therefore, that we are fairly entitled to hold Ministers responsible for this despatch, and to characterize its language and terms as we think fit, without any disrespect to the Governor. The honorable member at the head of the Government has given me that permission by indorsing the statements made in the despatch. I say, therefore, that this despatch is a very unfair and one-sided statement of affairs. I have been accustomed to read Governors' despatches. I have read the despatches of the honorable member for the Thames, I have read the despatches of Governors of the Australian colonies, and of other Governors of this colony, and I have always found the same high, impartial, gentlemanly tone in those documents—as unimpassioned utterances as those of the Judges on the bench. It is not right that the Governor of the colony—the representative of Her Majesty in this country—should take the side of any party in his despatches; but the Government have placed His Excellency in that most unfortunate position. I will assume that the belief of the honorable member for the Thames is entirely unfounded—I will assume that his statements are as wild as possible: is it a proper thing that, in a despatch to the Secretary of State—a document that is a State paper—His Excellency should use such an expression as this: "I should certainly have treated it as a bad joke"? That is not the language in which a despatch from the Governor of a colony should be couched. The whole document is written in the style of a sharp newspaper article, and to call it a despatch or State document is, to my mind, a misnomer. The Governor is made to say to the Secretary of State, in reference to the policy of abolition, and in regard to the opposition to it, "That feeling is certainly not unanimous, except, perhaps, in the city of Auckland and its immediate neighbourhood." We have had evidence this session, and very strong evidence too, that even the most remote outlying districts, which were formerly in favour of it, are now opposed to it. I say it is especially wrong that the Governor, in making these statements to the Secretary of State, should have been called upon to make statements which, I regret to say, are not in accordance with facts. The honorable member for the Thames has explained, and explained satisfactorily, the attempt to make out that he substantially indorsed the truth of the assertion that ships of war would be employed to enforce abolition in Auckland, so that I need not refer to that matter. But I come to a much worse point in this despatch. It is stated,—

"As, however, Sir George Grey has seen fit to make this formal complaint to your Lordship, I now distinctly charge him with being himself the first to give currency to a report similar to the one he has brought under your Lordship's notice; and, in support of this accusation, I enclose to your Lordship this copy of a letter which has been addressed by Mr. Dargaville to my Private Secretary for my information."

It is a common practice among aged females, when an accusation is brought against them, to retort with another charge, without the slightest justification; but, Sir, is it for a moment to be supposed that a public man of such high standing as Sir George Grey—a man who has been Governor of this colony and whose reputation is well established—should have charges brought against him founded upon a private letter from a private citizen to the Governor's Private Secretary? We who know Mr. Dargaville know perfectly well that his statements on political matters must be received with a large amount of caution. He is well known in Auckland as a disappointed demagogue—a man who tried hard to be elected Superintendent, and spent thousands of pounds, or rather promised to spend them, in the attempt, but failed. He was then returned to the Provincial Council by those very persons who had opposed his election to the office of Superintendent, because they wished to show the people, from practical experience, how utterly unfit he was for this position. Holding such opinions as he did, Mr. Dargaville did not dare to come forward and to contest the representation of any constituency in Auckland. And yet his opinions are to be taken as representing public opinion in Auckland—opinions expressed in this letter addressed to "Dear Maling." It reminds me much of that correspondence with "Dear Pollen," of which we heard so much. Is the opinion of such a man to be taken against that of a public man of the highest reputation—a man who has spent forty or fifty years in the public service, and who has been Governor of this colony? I am not speaking of the present Ministry, but of the Ministry which was in office when this despatch was prepared and sent Home; and I say that any members of that Ministry who are now on the Government benches, and who were parties to that despatch, should at once leave those benches filled with shame for what they had done. It is, to my mind, one of the darkest features of this despatch that a charge of that kind should be made by the Governor of the colony—Her Majesty's representative—upon such utterly unreliable testimony. If the Governor desired to make such a charge against the Superintendent of a province, a former Governor, and a man of the highest standing, he should have sent a copy of the despatch containing those charges to Sir George Grey, in order that he might make any explanations he thought fit upon them. There has been no foundation for those charges but a letter of no more value than the anonymous letter of a newspaper correspondent. Mr. Dargaville is known well enough in Auckland, but he is utterly unknown at Home; and any letter of his read there is of no more value than an anonymous letter. And yet, upon such a letter as that, the Governor has made the most serious charges against Sir George Grey. And the statement made in regard to this matter is, that Sir George Grey had expressed to Mr. Dargaville his great anxiety to get the control of the police force for the purpose of enabling him to contend with the General Government, in the event of a dispute arising between them. The honorable member for the Thames has answered that statement most completely; but I, as a member of the Provincial Executive of Auckland at the time, and having official knowledge of what took place, may confirm the statement that he was not anxious to take over the police, although the control of them was offered to him by the General Government. Another statement made in this despatch, in the refutation of which I appeal to all members of the Provincial Council now present to support me, is that the repeal of the resolutions carried by the Provincial Council of Auckland in favour of abolition was brought about by the direct instigation of Sir George Grey. There is no truth whatever in that statement. Those resolutions were moved by me. I came on that very day from Napier, and had no opportunity whatever of consulting with Sir George Grey on the question. The question in favour of abolition was put to the Council; and by one of those blunders which occur in all representative bodies, it was carried without discussion. I was in the library at the time it was carried, drawing up an amendment which I intended to move. I returned to the House, and, without any consultation with Sir George Grey, gave notice of the rescinding resolutions which were afterwards carried. That Sir George Grey instigated that, or desired it, or brought it about, is utterly untrue. Yesterday, in the lobbies, there was that kind of rumour going about which generally heralds the production of important intelligence, such as we used to have two or three years ago when the policy of this country was changing from top to bottom of the political thermometer every two or three days. In those days two or three people who used to hang about the backstairs were in the habit of whispering confidentially, "You will hear something good to-night." We heard the same thing yesterday. I was told by those gentlemen, "There is something coming on to-night with reference to abolition which will open the eyes of the Opposition." I expected that we were to have what Ministers have never yet attempted to get—namely, a sound opinion on the legality of the Abolition Act; and I looked forward to it with some amount of dread, because I thought that, if they had obtained such an opinion against our views, it would break up any further opposition to the coming into force of the Abolition Act. But what did we find? This despatch, which is full of partisanship, and which, in all essential allegations, has no foundation in fact: a despatch in which a most wanton charge is made against a public officer by a private citizen of the Province of Auckland. Altogether apart from party considerations—putting it on one side as a matter of Opposition or Government—I say that every sensible and fair-minded gentleman in this House will regret the tone and conception of that despatch, and will admit that it is not couched in language that ought to characterize a despatch of the Governor of New Zealand. Every man will admit that in dealing with the people over whom he is placed in charge—especially in commenting on the conduct or character of a public officer—he ought to hesitate, and ought to obtain the most distinct proof, before he made such a charge as is contained in one of the paragraphs of this despatch. Besides neglecting to send Sir George Grey a copy, that despatch is now nearly four months old. It has been lying in the Ministerial coffers up to this time; and if it had not been brought out by recent discussions, it would lie there until it was laid before Parliament with other despatches next year. I contend that that is the extreme of unfairness—that it shows an extreme want of fair-play—a want of chivalrous consideration even for an opponent. The honorable member for the Thames has, perhaps, made a mistake in noticing a document of this kind, and in endeavouring to refute the statements made by Mr. Dargaville. In the Province of Auckland, where the honorable member for the Thames and Mr. Dargaville are both known, the allegations of Mr. Dargaville will be treated with scorn and contempt; but, even in this House, I contend there are very few men, however embittered they may be against the honorable member for the Thames, and however strongly they may condemn and censure his action, who will not be prepared to put in the balance the years of public service and public reputation of Sir George Grey against the statement of a private gentleman in Auckland writing to the Private Secretary of the Governor. I contend that a private letter of that sort, beginning "Dear Maling," which speaks of the Superintendent of a province and a former Governor of the colony as "Grey," ought not to have been put into an official document. If His Excellency thought the charge worthy of investigation, he ought to have requested Mr. Dargaville to bring it before him officially; and it ought to be an official statement of the conversation that took place. I do not wish to go into too much detail, but the letter of Mr. Dargaville on the face of it does not coincide with the statements with regard to it in the Governor's speech. Mr. Dargaville writes on the 8th June, 1875. We are told that this conversation with Sir George Grey took place about twelve months before abolition came into force at all. Now, as a matter of fact, the Abolition proposals came into the House in 1874, and Sir George Grey was then living in retirement in Kawai, and did not come to Auckland or take any part in the political questions agitating the country until February, 1875. Now, it is quite evident that, if the Governor's statement is correct, and Mr. Dargaville's statement is correct, the conversation referred to could never have taken place. I am satisfied that Sir George Grey could not talk of armed resistance to a measure not in existence. On the face of it, it appears to me a contradiction. However, I think that Sir George Grey's reputation will survive this attack. I do not think the statements of Mr. Dargaville, adopted by His Excellency the Governor and indorsed by the Premier, will be able to overcome the good faith and strong common sense of the people of this country. They will not believe that a man with such antecedents as Sir George Grey has sullied a life of honor and good services to the country by such a base fabrication. It is well, now-a-days, to be a Colonial Governor—to draw a large number of thousands of pounds a year, to reside in luxurious palaces, and to travel in expensive yachts that will cost £7,000 or £8,000 a year to maintain. It is a very fine, jolly thing to be a Colonial Governor now-a-days. But the honorable member for the Thames, whose reputation is now assailed in this unfair and ungentlemanly manner, was Governor of this colony and of other colonies when Governors had to walk about like other people; when the country was held by armed rebel bands; and possibly the Governors of the present day would never be Governors if they had to lead armed forces to battle, as Sir George Grey had to do in his time. I think that for the purpose of clearing Sir George Grey from the imputations that have been cast upon him this debate would be entirely unnecessary; but I contend that, for the purpose of preventing despatches of this kind being written, and for the purpose of showing the opinion of the House that despatches of this kind should not be written, and that the correspondence of the Governor with the Home authorities should be impartial and unimpassioned, the debate is useful, and I hope it will have that result. I hate to fight an angry quarrel; and this House, I contend, ought to be able to do public business without making such charges against each other as we have been making, and we ought to be able to do that business without losing our tempers. I draw this distinction between the Government and the Opposition: that a license is allowed to the Opposition that is not allowed to the Government. The Government can lead the House, can direct it, and can concede. But it is the besetting sin of this Government that it cannot make a concession. It is unable to see when it is desirable to make a concession at the proper time. When such despatches are written, and such charges made by the highest officer in the colony against other public officers, it will lead to angry recriminations, and Ministers will be held responsible for what may take place.

Mr. REES.—As a member of the Provincial Council of Auckland during the time which the occurrences recounted in this now celebrated correspondence took place, I desire to make one or two remarks on the paragraphs which relate to those proceedings in that Council wherein the name of Sir George Grey is mixed up. I can only presume that that letter, judging from its tone, was written, not by the Marquis of Normanby, His Excellency the Governor, but by his Ministers. I do not believe that His Excellency would write such a letter as this. I believe that, having full confidence in his Ministers, he put his name to this letter, believing they would not allow him to do anything dishonorable in itself, or likely to bring disrespect on the high station he holds by appointment and by birth. When I trace also in the letter the exact phrases used in this House over and over again—the exact classification of words which we have heard here in relation to the honorable member for the Thames, from the Ministerial benches—it seems unnatural to suppose anything else but that the Premier, perhaps assisted by one of the late Ministers, was the concocter of this despatch, which His Excellency the Governor was induced to sign without actually reading it. In the 9th paragraph of the letter I read as follows:—

“Sir George Grey also omits to inform your Lordship that, although possibly the majority of the members from the Province of Auckland are opposed to the abolition of the provincial system, that feeling is certainly not unanimous, except perhaps in the city of Auckland and its immediate neighbourhood; neither does he state that in May, last year, a resolution in favour of abolition was carried by a majority of five, in the Provincial Council itself, and was only rescinded the next day by a majority of one at the direct instigation and dictation of Sir George Grey himself. I think, therefore, he is hardly justified in claiming the whole of the provinces as adopting his views.”

I believe that efforts were made in all the great Provincial Councils of the colony at the same time—I believe at the instigation of a certain knot of persons—to have this resolution carried. In Auckland, by some mischance—and in Auckland alone—unknown to a very large portion of the members, this resolution was carried. As soon as it was known that the resolution was successful—as stated by the honorable member for Rodney—that gentleman gave notice in the Council that next day he would move that the resolution be rescinded. After a full debate, that resolution was agreed to. I really cannot understand how Ministers—how any men of ordinary honor—could pledge themselves to those statements in the despatch, the truth of which they were not aware of. If this statement was made by witnesses in a Court of law, they would lay themselves open to a charge of perjury. It would not be sufficient for them to say afterwards that they only said what they believed, and did not know whether they had spoken the truth or not. If this statement was sworn to by any person in a Court of law, the person making it would be liable to imprisonment and hard labour for perjury. I would ask, Is that a proper position for Ministers to put themselves into in relation to such a matter as this, where a grave charge is made against a gentleman whose name, more than that of any other man of the day, is connected with the Colonial Empire of Great Britain? If, I say, that were stated upon oath in a Court of law, upon the facts coming out as stated by the honorable member for Rodney, which can be testified to by all the honorable members from Auckland, those who stated it would render themselves liable to imprisonment for perjury. The Government took no steps to ascertain the truth of it. The Premier just now said he would trust to his own memory rather than to the memories of those around him; but it seems to me that the Government trust more to their imagination than to their memory. But, Sir, I was astonished at another statement of the Premier. I was not present when the honorable member for the Thames, Sir G. Grey, made his speech; but I was astonished when I came in to hear the Premier say that the honorable member had made, for him, a very temperate speech, and that he was not as slanderous as usual. I should like to know if there is any precedent for a Prime Minister making such a statement as that. I can only compare the Premier, whenever he refers to the good conduct of the honorable member for the Thames, to the black swan—a rara avis in terra. The Premier said he would trust to his own memory and not to the statements of other persons. I have always understood that it is the general rule, in all deliberative Assemblies such as this, that, when an honorable member denies that he had made a statement, his denial is taken as sufficient. I am sorry to hear the Premier, who should be the leader of the House, breaking through the rules of courtesy and procedure with the same hardihood and indifference. I use the term "hardihood" because such conduct as this must condemn him in the minds of all right-thinking people, who will see that it is impossible to pursue a safe course while going on as he is doing. Then, again, I was astonished to hear the honorable gentleman say that the honorable member for the Thames was always in the habit of putting off his despatches until the Governor could not send his comments on them Home. Perhaps the honorable gentleman will mention an instance of this.

Major ATKINSON.—The telegram of Saturday.

Mr. REES.—When a person sends a telegram, his business must be of some importance, and it may be necessary that he should send it away at once. Now, with regard to the letter, I may say that Sir George Grey saw the statement in a newspaper published in Auckland, that the supporters of the Ministry in Auckland were causing certain rumours to be circulated, and this only came to his knowledge just before the mail left, and therefore he was bound to take immediate action. That, however, did not justify the Premier in saying that Sir George Grey was in the habit of putting off his despatches so long that the Governor could not send Home his comments on them. The fact is that Sir George Grey sent copies of his letter and telegram to the Governor on the very day that he sent the originals to England. The meaning of Sir George Grey is clearly shown by his words. He says, "I heard that, in two parts of the colony, reports had been circulated that Her Majesty's seamen and marines are to be used to put down, by armed force, all opposition to the Ministry; and I find it stated in a local newspaper of this morning." Why, he distinctly states it to be a newspaper report; and afterwards he says, "I am so entirely satisfied of the honor and good faith of the paper from which I quote, that I feel sure there are substantial grounds for the statement it contains." If the Hon. the Premier had the slightest pretension either of being careful in his statements, or of being able clearly to understand the English language, he would find that the statement which is made here by the newspaper is that reports are being circulated to a certain effect, and not that Auckland is to be bombarded. It states that reports have been circulated to that effect; and the honorable member for the Thames merely says that there are clear grounds for the statement that such reports have been circulated. It is impossible to put any other interpretation on the paragraph. Some members of the Ministry, to whom the English language is not properly known, I have not the slightest doubt, could put another interpretation on it; but if any fifth-form schoolboy were to put that interpretation on this paragraph, he would stand a very good chance of being hoisted, and it would serve him right. The honorable member for the Thames does not state that he believes force is to be used, but that a report to that effect is being circulated. Those honorable gentlemen on the Government benches, having found that they have made a mistake, ought now as men of honor to say so. The honorable member for the Thames goes on to say in his despatch that "such allegations of the intentions of the Imperial authorities, circulated as they are here, do much harm." Any gentleman who was in Auckland at the time of the elections will know that those allegations did harm among many of the people. The people actually became afraid they would be brought into collision with the Imperial forces. The Hon. the Premier had said, "If Sir George Grey can deny any of the statements contained in His Excellency's despatch, it is open for him to deny them." How could Sir George Grey deny the statements, when he was kept in ignorance of them for four months after they were made? I say that when the Government pursue that course of conduct they are not pursuing the just, the fair, or the right course. The slipshod and wretched English in this despatch convinces me, though it is signed by the Governor, that it is written by his Ministers. Fancy publishing such a thing as this in the Times as the production of a Governor of a great colony:—

"Were I as much inclined to take alarm at absurd rumours and newspaper canards as he seems to be, I might indeed inform your Lordship that, on more than one occasion, Sir George Grey himself has been reported to have indulged in dark and mysterious hints at the possibility of armed resistance to the law being resorted to by those who are opposed to the abolition of the provinces; and the same tone has been more frequently adopted by the Evening Star, a paper in Auckland which strongly supports his views."

Fancy His Excellency the Governor sending a despatch such as that to the Secretary of State. This statement is backed up by a letter from Mr. J. M. Dargaville. Anybody who comes from Auckland knows that, if there be one man in the community more empty and more full of nonsense and vanity than another, and a man who does not stick at anything he says, it is Mr. J. M. Dargaville. He is a man who actually lost the fair chances he had of becoming Superintendent of Auckland by making such an exhibition of himself as to cause even the reporters for the newspapers to lay down their pencils and refuse to report him on account of the indecency of his remarks. I see that his letter is addressed to Captain Maling, and I am sure that I do not envy Captain Maling his friendship with this gentleman. If that gentleman is to be the source from which accusations against one of the leading men in the country may be entertained and transmitted Home, then I say it is time this state of things were ended. He wrote a private letter to Captain Maling, which was to be shown to His Excellency the Governor if the recipient of it thought proper. Captain Maling might have known that Sir George Grey is not in the habit of becoming confidential with men like Mr. J. M. Dargaville. As far as the police force of Auckland is concerned, Ministers themselves know that Sir George Grey was not desirous of having it under his control, and that he refused to take it over on the terms on which it was offered to him. I say that the attempt to blacken an opponent for political purposes—the attempt thus to injure the leader of the opposite side—is descending to practices which an Englishman ought to be ashamed of. I repeat, that this despatch was not written by the Governor. I have no doubt that His Excellency simply took the letter up and signed it because his Advisers put it before him. It is a letter which reflects much more on the man who wrote it than on the man who is the subject of it. It was sent away to London, and nobody knew anything about it for four months. If the people of the colony are called on to judge between Sir George Grey and the Premier in relation to this matter, all I can say is, that the people will, from one end of the colony to the other, universally condemn the Premier. Then, Sir, it is currently stated that Mr. Dargaville was connected with a useful force for the preservation of the peace. I do not know whether he still manifests the same proclivities, and does a little of the informing work in relation to political affairs, and in relation to members of this House; but, if it be so, I sincerely hope that the Governor's Aides-de-camp will not lend their ears to such persons as these in order to attain or be made the receptacles of information by which false and secret charges may be made before the Council of State in England against well-known political men. The whole of this matter reflects very great discredit upon the Ministry. I am sorry they did not make a frank statement in relation to the matter. The Premier should have said, "We believed the statements were correct at the time; but if Sir George Grey says they are not, we are willing to accept his statement and apologize." Instead of doing that, the honorable gentleman attempted to defend it; but the honorable member for the Thames can well afford to leave the matter to the decision of the people. From every part of the colony the writer of such a letter will be condemned. It cannot injure Sir George Grey, who is too well known and too much respected, but it will not redound to the credit of the Ministry. The unfairness of such an attack will carry its own condemnation. Sir George Grey ought to have had an opportunity to defend himself from a stab in the dark, a blow which he could not parry.

MR. REID.—I consider the honorable member for the Thames was fully justified in bringing this matter before the House. Having read the despatch, I must say I was surprised to find the signature of His Excellency the Governor appended to such a document. I cannot indorse all that was said by the honorable member for Auckland City East in regard to the letter, of which the despatch is an extension or a criticism. I cannot say, as he does, that there is nothing in the letter,—that it was not intended to leave the impression that the Colonial Government would use the Queen's ships in forcing abolition on the people of Auckland. I take exception to that part of it which certifies to a belief in the extract quoted. It expresses a probability of the request being made to the Home Government, and requests it to interfere to prevent it. To that extent, the action taken by the Governor was justified; but nothing else justifies this despatch. Coming from so high a personage, I am astonished at it; in fact, I would much more readily have believed that it came from a third-rate clerk. The whole tone of the despatch is such that it cannot be described by any terms which would ordinarily apply to our State despatches; and I regret to stand up here and so speak of any document emanating from His Excellency the Governor. The Ministry state that this document was written without their knowledge, but that it meets with their entire concurrence. Of course we are bound to believe this; but I must be allowed to say that, if I can see the hand of any one in it, it is that of the late Premier, Sir Julius Vogel. I cannot allow this discussion to close without expressing my deep regret that such a despatch was ever penned. At the same time, I deprecate the strong expressions used on both sides of the House during these discussions. It would be very much better that we should exclude the personalities, the strong terms of disapprobation and opprobrium, and the insinuations of motives which are attributed to each other in the course of debate. I see no reason why, because we differ politically, we should try to destroy the reputations and fair fame of our opponents. Surely there can be no advantage in that. For my part, when I hear of charges of that kind, their effect is to repel me from those who make them. They only lead to animosity and unfriendly feeling. As to the subject before us, I can only repeat that this is a document which nothing can justify. It was not penned in the heat of a debate; it was prepared with deliberation; and no terms that could be applied to portions of it would be too censorious.

Mr. LUSK.—I have no desire to detain the House by any lengthy remarks; but as one of the members of the Province of Auckland, and as one of those persons incidentally referred to in the despatch, it may become me to say a few words upon matters of fact connected with the subject. The statements in this despatch are mainly accusations against Sir George Grey, in which the correctness of the statements made in his despatch to the Secretary of State are impugned. One of these statements—and perhaps the worst of the whole—refers to the possible employment of Her Majesty's forces to coerce the people of this colony. I may say, Sir, in regard to that statement, that I never saw any reference to it in the public prints; but at the same time I must say that I have not once but many times heard the statement made by persons whom I know to be supporters of the Government. Frequently, in conversations I have had in Auckland, these gentlemen have said, "It is no use resisting the powers that be, because they are backed up by the men-of-war, which will be sent to Auckland should the necessity arise, and you will then see what your position will be." That statement has been made to me many times; and I can only say that, if the people did not see in the newspapers what Sir George Grey saw, thousands of them have heard the statement made in public. It appears to me to be an extraordinary thing that a matter of fact so notorious should have been unknown to the Government—so completely unknown to them that they could honestly cast a doubt upon the statement having been made at all. With regard to the letter upon which this extraordinary despatch is founded, I may say that I was a member of the Provincial Council of Auckland when the resolutions referred to were passed: in fact, I stand in rather a peculiar position in regard to those resolutions, because, if they were only rescinded on the next day by a majority of one, at the instigation of Sir George Grey, I must be that one referred to. I was the person, I believe, whose opinion on this subject was longest in doubt in the minds of members of the Provincial Council, and I was the last to say anything on the subject when the matter was under discussion in the Council. I then frankly and plainly stated my opinion, and up to that time I had never held any conversation with Sir George Grey from the time he assumed the office of Superintendent of the province. Neither directly nor indirectly was I instigated by Sir George Grey to take any particular action in this matter; and I therefore deliberately say that that statement is wholly unfounded, and, being unfounded and calculated to mislead, it is an extraordinary thing that the person in the highest position of authority in the colony should communicate it to the Home authorities. I have no desire to express an opinion as to the authorship of this document. I honestly believe that it emanated from some person very inferior to the gentleman whose signature it bears. All the internal evidence bears that out. A few words may, however, be said as to the spirit of the document—a point which has been referred to during the debate. It has been said, or, rather, the Premier hinted, that it was a perfectly fair reprisal on the part of the Government to send Home a document of this sort and conceal all knowledge of the fact, because Sir George Grey had sent Home a document to the Secretary of State and did not give the Governor time to reply to it by the same mail. But does it not occur to honorable members that the position of the parties is entirely different—that Sir George Grey was not acting as the accuser of the Governor of New Zealand, but was making an appeal to the Home Government on behalf of the people of Auckland? It was to calm the feelings of the people of Auckland, to prevent their being agitated by statements which he did not for an instant say had emanated from the Government; and was it to be said, because that document did not reach the Governor in time to reply to it before the despatch of the mail, that it is a parallel case to forwarding a despatch to the Secretary of State in June, and for four months to allow this gross and most serious charge to be concealed from the person whose character had been maligned? There is no parallel whatever; and it is astonishing to me that any one occupying the high position of Premier of this colony should be guilty of talking anything so much like nonsense. I regret exceedingly that this document was ever penned, but I do not regret that it has come under the consideration of this House, because I think that very great good ought to result from its having been discussed. I do not say this because I think the character of Sir George Grey requires any vindication at our hands—I do not say this because I think for one instant that any slanders that may be brought against him by the pen of Mr. J. M. Dargaville can possibly have any effect in injuring his fair fame. But there are other honorable members, whose characters are not so established and so widely known as that of Sir George Grey, who may be affected by this—by the very same course as has been pursued in this case; and it may be a matter of very great moment to the characters of members of the Legislature that a protest, and a very strong protest, should be entered at once upon its being known to this House that such things have been done, and that we should adopt means for the vindication of our characters, which have been assailed, and protect ourselves and those who follow after us here in this House from being exposed to underhand insinuations, and to calumnies against our characters which we are allowed no opportunity to reply to.

Mr. HUNTER.—Sir, this discussion, which has lasted a long time, appears to me to be confined very much to two points—first, to serious accusations against His Excellency the Governor; and secondly, to the vindication of the conduct of an ex-Governor of the colony, Sir George Grey, the member for the Thames. Now, it appears to me that the people of New Zealand require to be vindicated against the very strong and uncalled-for accusations which have been hurled against them. No honorable gentleman in this House knows better than the honorable member for the Thames, as he has lived so long in this colony, that there is nothing whatever to justify in the slightest degree that honorable gentleman having any reason to believe that the inhabitants of this colony would rise and rebel against Her Majesty's authority. The honorable gentleman is well acquainted with the past history of this colony, and he knows, and has himself borne testimony to, the good conduct, loyalty, and devotion of the people of New Zealand to Her Majesty the Queen. There is nothing whatever to justify the accusations which were brought against the people of this colony; which accusations were the foundation and first origin of this correspondence which we have been discussing. It is all very well to talk about disturbances being imminent. I say that the honorable gentleman must have known—and I believe he did know, if he will do justice to the inhabitants of this colony—that such an idea never would have entered into their minds, and never would have been carried out by them in any shape or form. But, Sir, I was rather surprised during this discussion to find that no reference whatever was made to a very recent expression of the same view on the part of the honorable gentleman. I find, on the 7th of October of this very year, Sir George Grey, as Superintendent of the Province of Auckland, sends a telegram to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I have not heard it contradicted. It appears in a newspaper published in this city, and I am entitled to assume that it is correct. In this telegram he says, "Disturbances imminent. Some threaten employment Queen's ships." Now, where is the evidence to justify any reasonable man of common sense and intelligence in using such words as "disturbances imminent"? I say that there is nothing to justify the most ordinary member of this House in using such an expression as that, much less a gentleman possessed of the knowledge, intelligence, and experience of that honorable gentleman. There has been nothing brought forward in the debates of this House, there was nothing that occurred throughout the country, there was nothing that appeared in the telegrams published in the different parts of the colony—nothing to justify such a declaration as this. We have heard much loud talking about this, that, and the other thing about to be done on the part of gentlemen holding Her Majesty's Commission as Justices of the Peace; but we know, and that honorable gentleman knows, how entirely such stories are without foundation. The people of New Zealand have always been and will always be loyal and well disposed, and there is nothing that will ever induce me to form such a low opinion of them as to suppose that they would place themselves in such a position as to render it necessary to threaten to employ the Queen's ships against them. Now, we are asked to believe that statement in the city of Wellington. His Excellency the Governor is resident here; the Ministry are here; the Parliament is in session; and I apprehend that if the honorable member for the Thames entertained any such opinion as this, that the Ministry were threatening to employ the Queen's ships, it would have been easy for him to have put a question direct on the subject. I apprehend that Her Majesty's ships can only be employed, as is pointed out in this despatch which has been so severely commented upon, through the instrumentality of His Excellency the Governor, and His Excellency would only act on and by the advice of his Responsible Advisers. I have before pointed out in this House that the honorable member for the Thames has over and over again endeavoured to sap the very principle of responsible government, which was granted to this colony on clear, distinct, and specific grounds. We undertook the management of our own affairs; the honorable member knows very well that this was determined at the time Her Majesty's troops were all withdrawn from this colony. Under these circumstances, so long as the gentlemen occupying those benches possess the confidence of a majority of the members of this House, they are responsible to His Excellency the Governor and to the Parliament of New Zealand now assembled. If the statements of the honorable member for the Thames can be borne out by facts, it was clearly his duty, as a representative in Parliament, and as the Superintendent of the Province of Auckland, to have brought the matter before the Assembly. I say this, with all respect for the honorable gentleman: that his assertion as to threats having been used by the people is altogether without foundation—that it ought to be scattered to the winds as a thing not deserving of one moment's consideration. It is difficult, in speaking of this matter, to characterize it in language which would be considered parliamentary. Then this statement in the honorable member's telegram is followed up by these words: "I earnestly pray telegraph to prevent disturbances. Abolition Act should be disallowed if Provincial Legislatures not consulted." What does that mean? What is the practical meaning of those words? It is that the Government of England, or rather the Secretary of State for the Colonies, is to exercise his power of interfering—that he is to interfere with the representatives of the people governing this colony. It means neither more nor less than this, let us disguise it in whatever language we may. We may attempt to mystify words, but the common-sense meaning of that is this: that practically a foreign Power is to exercise control in governing this colony. Some gentleman says "No." He will have an opportunity of following me; but I fancy he will find it a very difficult matter to disprove the assertion which I have made, that it is a direct attempt to interfere with that which has been decided on by the majority of the representatives of the people. The words used in the honorable gentleman's telegram are, "I earnestly pray telegraph to prevent disturbances." The position of the matter I apprehend to be this : It is a topic which I have not touched upon once during this session, but many members are aware of the position I took up last session. I was one of those who voted and did all I could at that time to prevent abolition of the provinces. I did not take the view that abolition would be for the interest of the colony. I took up that position, and voted against the passing of the Abolition of Provinces Act. I stated most distinctly and positively that I regarded it as a matter which should be referred to the arbitration of the people of New Zealand, that the next general election would determine the question, and that I should feel myself bound loyally to carry out that which was proved to be the opinion of the large majority of the people of this colony. The point was fairly raised. It was put to the people of this colony, and they returned a direct verdict, and that was that these institutions should be abolished and some other form of government substituted in their stead. I have endeavoured to do my small share faithfully and loyally. What is the position taken up by the honorable member for the Thames? His desire is that a foreign Power shall come and interpose to prevent effect being given to that which was the express wish of the people of this colony. The honorable member for the Thames has had an opportunity of over and over again expressing his opinions on this subject in this House, and if he believed that he possessed the confidence of the majority of the representatives of the people, he should, as leader of the Opposition, on the first or second day of the session, have come down with a distinct want-of-confidence motion. If he had done that the question would have been settled at once. If, as he says, the majority of the people are in favour of his view of the question, then the state of things would have been reversed, and the Opposition would have occupied the position of the Government. He knows that the opinion of the country and of this House is against the view taken by the Opposition. That would have been a direct and fair issue to put, and it would have brought the matter fairly before the country. I hold that full power is conferred upon the inhabitants of this colony to govern themselves. We have the right, under the laws existing here, to amend our own Constitution. It is a perfectly fair inference to assume that the matter has been considered by the ablest legal authorities in England, and that it has been held that we had the power to pass this Act, otherwise it would have been disallowed. Sir George Grey then says, in his telegram, "Abolition Act should be disallowed if Provincial Legislatures not consulted." The honorable member knows as well as I do that it was impossible to consult the Provincial Legislatures. This Parliament passed an Act prohibiting them from meeting again. It was impossible they could meet as members of a Provincial Council to give their opinion in their small parliament. It would have been a direct violation of the law. Something has been said about the delay in sending the letter by the honorable member for the Thames to the Governor—that Sir George Grey's letter reached the Secretary of State by one mail and that of His Excellency by the next mail. It was unfortunate that accusations against the people of New Zealand and the letter of the Governor referring to them had not gone together, and it would have been better if Sir George Grey had delayed sending for a month his letter abusing the Governor and people of this colony, so that it should not have gone without a contrary statement. Under similar circumstances, if I had been unable to send a letter bringing such accusations, I should have thought I should have been wise to have delayed forwarding it until the comments on it should have gone with it. That is the view I should have taken of the matter. Something was said about submitting the Governor's despatches to Sir George Grey, but I do not think it has been the practice to do so. Reference was made by the honorable member for the Thames to the correspondent of the Times, and a charge was made against a gentleman who is not a member of this House. I take occasion to say that that journal is, of all others, careful in the selection of its correspondents, and as a rule it gives circulation to nothing which there is not fair reason to suppose was correct. During the discussion, a great deal has been said about the population of the different provinces, and the proportion in favour of and against the proposed constitutional changes; and I have taken the trouble to make an estimate of this matter. According to the last census the population of the colony was 375,866 souls. My estimate will go, of course, for what it is worth, but the following is to my mind the proportion of those in favour of the continuance of the old state of things and those opposed to it. I find that the Province of Auckland contains 79,000 people, and from what I have seen in this House, and what I have learned, I deny that there is unanimous feeling in that province, as has been represented here. The return of members to this House shows that a very large portion of the inhabitants of that province were in favour of a change in the Constitution. I estimate that in Auckland probably one-half were in favour of abolition; in Taranaki, five-sixths; in Wellington, three-fourths; Hawke's Bay and Marlborough were pretty unanimously in favour of abolition; Nelson had five-sixths in favour of it; the same with Westland. As to Canterbury, I feel some hesitation, but I assume that three-fourths are in favour of a change; and in Otago, where I know the feeling in favour of Provincialism is very much stronger than in other places, I take only one-fourth as in favour of abolition. That gives 160,000 out of 375,000 as in favour of the old state of things, or rather less than one-half of the population of the country. One very important point seems to me to have been lost sight of. It is this: Although the Auckland and Otago members may represent a very large majority of the constituencies, an immense number of people, forming the minority, are not represented. We have a very clear and convincing proof of that in the case of the late member for Dunedin City, Mr. Reynolds, who was rejected by his old constituents and was elected for Port Chalmers; therefore it was quite clear that there was a different feeling in two districts very close to each other. At the Thames election there was an instance of a double return: Sir George Grey was returned both for the Thames and Auckland City West. We have seen very clearly that the honorable member for the Thames, Mr. Rowe, and the honorable member for the Thames, Sir George Grey, differ in their views; and I believe it was thought that if Sir George Grey did not elect to sit for the Thames, a member would have been returned for that district who entertained views similar to those of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. SWANSON.—A question of money.

Mr. HUNTER.—The honorable member for Newton says that it is a question of money. No doubt money is a very important element, and can do a great deal; but I do not think money would buy two-thirds of the people of New Zealand. I have not such a poor opinion of them as that. They have no right whatever to be charged with such an accusation. If I understand the argument of the honorable member for Newton, it is this: that the honorable member for the Thames, having the larger command of money, was able to return himself for the Thames in opposition to poorer men. That is the inference I draw—that the Thames constituency is to be bought just like the rotten boroughs at Home used to be. The honorable member for Newton says “No;” but I can only draw my own inference, for he stated it was a question of money. Sir, the honorable member for Newton is interrupting me.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Newton is out of order.

Mr. HUNTER.—I am entitled to draw that inference. I hope I have not transgressed the rules of the House in any way, for I always try to keep in order. The remarks of the honorable member conveyed the impression that the Thames was a constituency that could be bought, and therefore Sir George Grey had a better chance than any other man. If the honorable member for Newton objects to that conclusion, he will be able to reply to my remarks. I should not have said one word upon this subject, had I not thought that the people of New Zealand were not being fairly treated throughout this discussion. They have been maligned; accusations have been hurled against them; and I, as an old resident of the country—one who has lived in it from its earliest days—say that neither directly nor indirectly is there any warrant for the assumption that they will not readily obey the laws of this country, and render proper obedience to the representatives of the Queen.

Mr. SWANSON.—The honorable member turned that remark of mine from its true meaning. What I meant by “a question of money” was perfectly evident to any one. You cannot buy a constituency like the Thames. Those little arrangements in Hawke's Bay and Taranaki can be bought, because, if you only purchase 150 or so, you have all the rest in your pocket; but you cannot buy thousands; it takes a pretty long purse to do that. In standing for a large constituency like the Thames, a man cannot advertise and canvass the district without going to a very large expense. We were not at all afraid of the result of a contest. I defy any one to stand for that district without going to great expense, even if he never gives away a glass of beer. The honorable member for Wellington says, “Oh, oh.” Well, there was an immense amount of beer used in Wellington upon a late occasion. A great many expenses must be incurred in contesting a constituency like the Thames; but in Auckland City West it is very different: there is comparatively very little expense in the city. We took the contest for the Auckland City West seat; and I fully expected that this gentleman we have heard so much about to-day, Mr. Dargaville, would have come out, for he contested the seat once or twice before. We fully expected to see that great champion of Centralism stand. Sir, I do not think the Thames can be bought. If any one is going to try to buy a constituency, I would say, Do not go to the Thames. I will allude to one matter which does not appear to me to have been referred to. It is this: In his despatch the Governor says,—

It was really too much for the Governor to say that. What evidence had the Governor to show that the statement made by Mr. Dargaville was true? It might have been as false as possible, and without a shadow or vestige of foundation or any justification. That letter ought to have been seen by Sir George Grey before it was sent Home, so that he might make any remarks he wished about the matter. If Mr. Dargaville is to be a sort of a private detective, there ought to have been other inquiries to see if any one else had heard of it. Mr. Dargaville says he heard it in the Provincial Council. Well, I am quite as constant an attendant at the Provincial Council as he is, and quite as well known, and I never heard one word of it. The Governor sends Home a statement as a matter of fact of what he says took place in the Provincial Council of Auckland; but I say it is contrary to the fact. Nothing of the sort took place. The inference to be drawn from this letter is that this matter was brought up in the Auckland Provincial Council at the instance of Sir George Grey. Then as to the motion passed by the Provincial Council in favour of abolition. It was proposed, I believe, by Mr. Bagnall, and seconded by Mr. Buckland. All the supporters of the motion had been carefully whipped up. However, there was no debate. Mr. Sheehan had just stepped ashore, and, seeing the motion on the Order Paper, was writing an amendment, when the motion was put. I instantly appealed to Mr. O'Rorke, who is Speaker of the Provincial Council, but he ruled that the matter could not be re-opened; he had asked if any honorable member wished to speak, and no one had risen to do so. It passed by a fluke. The Provincial Executive were sitting on their benches, and there was no communication with Sir George Grey. If Ministers have made the

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

SAN FRANCISCO MAIL SERVICE.

The House went into Committee.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, I beg to move, That it is expedient that the existing San Francisco Mail Contract be modified as follows:—(1.) That the service be direct from San Francisco to Sydney, calling at Honolulu and at Auckland. (2.) That the coastal service be performed by the Company by ten-knot boats, to be approved of by the Government. (3.) That the share of New Zealand's contribution to the subsidy be reduced by £7,500 at the least. The House is already aware that at the commencement of the session a Committee was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into this Californian Service especially with a view of having some modification made in it. The Committee have reported, and their report has remained over for consideration for some time. The reason for the delay has been that correspondence has been going on with the New South Wales Government and the contractors, with a view to ascertain how far any modification would be agreed to on the part of that Government and the contractors. The matter has now reached this point: that they are pressing for the consideration by this House as to whether or not the terms proposed by the New South Wales Government, or the terms proposed by the contractors, or the terms proposed by the Select Committee, with a slight modification, shall be accepted by this House. The House is aware that the contract was made in July, 1875, and it was to begin in the November following. The contract was very carefully drawn, with all the usual conditions and stipulations for due performance. It was for eight years. Next month it will have run for one year. I need not describe the terms of the contract; it has been for some time before the House, and is well known to honorable members. One important stipulation in the contract which will be a subject for our consideration is that, in the event of the contractors not performing their contract, they are to pay a penalty of £25,000. That £25,000, assuming it to be obtained, would be divided equally by New South Wales and New Zealand. Of course, at the commencement of all services of this kind very considerable difficulties arise from time to time, and no doubt this service has had its difficulties like other services. At present, however, it seems to be very firmly established, and the time kept by the mail steamers has been very accurate. In point of fact, the mails have occasionally been delivered before their time, and we can see that we have a service regularly performed by steamers of a first-class description, both as regards steaming power and accommodation for passengers. The position now is this: that the Company require a modification. They declare that the service as it is at present carried out causes them the loss of large sums of money, and they attribute that to the coastal service. They require that that service should be given up, not only on account of the inconvenience and loss of money, but because they consider that these large steamers going along the coast cause a risk which might entail a loss upon them equal to a whole year's subsidy. These ships are valued at from £180,000 to £200,000 each, and are insured for £100,000, so that, if one of them should be wrecked, it would cause a very heavy loss to the Company. I now come to the question of those proposals which have been made by the Company. They are these: that the subsidy, instead of being £90,000 a year, should be reduced to £80,000; that the number of services should be reduced to twelve services a year, and that the coastal service by the large steamers should be given up. That proposition was submitted, or very nearly that proposition was submitted to the Committee; but the Committee considered it was not a proposal which would be accepted. The Government came to the same conclusion, and I presume the House will do so too. I apprehend, therefore, that that may be placed out of consideration altogether. The Sydney Government have proposed that the coastal services should be given up; that the mail steamers should not call at Fiji, and should call only at Honolulu and the Bay of Islands. In the alternative services first proposed, there was one known as No. C, in which it was proposed that the steamers should call at Auckland; that there should be thirteen services in the year; and that the coastal service should be done by small vessels, the large steamers going on to Sydney. That proposition is very nearly the one now made by the Government, and contained in the motion I am about to move. The House is now in possession of three different propositions—the proposition of the Company, the proposition of the Sydney Government, and the proposition of the New Zealand Government. What I desire to-night is, that this Assembly should come to a conclusion whether they will accept any one of these proposals. The proposition this Government makes, and which appears on the Order Paper, would reduce the subsidy of New Zealand to £37,500 a year. That is the proposition, that £7,500 should be taken off the New Zealand subsidy—in other words, that the subsidy to the Company should be £75,000. That was the proposition originally made by the Company for this very service, when they sent in their tender. If honorable members will refer to some papers laid before them in an early part of the session, they will find a comparative statement of the cost of the services by way of Suez and San Francisco. The House will understand that not only the service by way of San Francisco but also the service by way of Suez is subsidized. On a reference to the papers before them, honorable members will see the precise position in which these services stand. The statement is as follows, and is based upon the correspondence exchanged between the United Kingdom, &c., and New Zealand during the year 1875:—

SAN FRANCISCO SERVICE.

Dr.	£	£
Subsidy to Pacific Mail Company ...	45,000
Interprovincial Services ...	2,000

In the event of the colony deciding to abandon the San Francisco Service and to rely solely on the Galle Service, our payments and receipts would be,—

Dr.	£	£

Assuming, merely for comparative purposes, that this colony forwarded and received the whole of its mails by the San Francisco Service, the result would work out thus:—

Dr.	£	£
Subsidy to Pacific Mail Company ...	45,000
Interprovincial Services ...	2,000

Net cost ...		£16,777

If the present proposal were adopted and the whole of the letters were sent by San Francisco, and none by Suez, then we should have to pay £7,000 or £8,000 more than would be recovered in the shape of postages, after allowing the now proposed reduction of £7,500. On the other hand, if we used the Suez Service entirely, the cost would be £15,896; so that, in point of fact, the San Francisco Service, if all the letters came by it, would be a cheaper service than that by Suez, if all the letters came by that route. Then let us look at the advantages of the two services. The material advantage is this: that every additional letter we have by San Francisco reduces the cost of the service, whereas every additional letter by Suez increases the cost. So there is every hope that in a very short time the income and expenditure by the San Francisco Service will equalize themselves. I have no doubt that within a very short time—within two or three years—the service will really cost us nothing; whereas if we used the Suez Service the only result would be that we should have an ever-increasing amount of postages to pay, and the cost would become very heavy with the correspondence increasing as it does now with great rapidity. Now, we come to the cost of the two services. The cost of the San Francisco Service is 9s. per mile, and the cost of the Suez Service is 14s. 4d. per mile. That is a very considerable difference, although we gain nothing by it. Now, I come to another very important part of the subject, and that is the question of time. At the commencement of the session honorable gentlemen had placed in their hands all the postal papers, and amongst them will be found a very elaborate table showing the time of the arrival of all the steamers during the year, and the number of days occupied in the voyage. There is, however, a very great saving of time effected by employing the San Francisco boats. I have had a short table prepared showing the time allowed by the official time-tables for the delivery of mails between London and the places I shall refer to presently. Via San Francisco the contract time from London to Sydney is 48 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 46 days; the contract time from London to Auckland is 45 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 41 days; the contract time from London to Wellington is 49 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 45 days; the contract time from London to Dunedin is 51 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 48 days. Via Brindisi, the contract time from London to Sydney is 49 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 47 days, as against 46 days via San Francisco; the contract time from London to Auckland is 60 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 55 days, as against 41 days via San Francisco; the contract time from London to Wellington is 56 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 51 days, as against 45 days via San Francisco; the contract time from London to Dunedin is 53 days, and the shortest time in which the mails have been delivered is 49 days, as against 48 days via San Francisco. If the mails were brought by way of Southampton there would be a much greater delay in their delivery. The contract time would then, instead of being 45 days to Auckland, be 67; instead of being 49 days to Wellington, it would be 63; and instead of 51 days to Dunedin, it would be 60. Now as regards the cost of each letter sent by the different routes: via San Francisco it is 6d., and via Brindisi 8d.; and each newspaper which comes in the latter way costs 2d., as against 1d. in the former. Therefore the San Francisco Service gives a saving of 100 per cent. on newspapers. Besides, there is a great saving of time by the San Francisco Service in the northern parts of the colony, and a considerable saving in the southern parts. I think enough has been said by me to show that by the San Francisco Service we effect a considerable saving both of time and money. The advantage of having the two lines is of course very considerable, especially if one line should happen to break down. I should not propose, therefore, to give up the Suez Service, but consider that it would be well to allow it to stand as at present. By having the two lines, we are afforded facilities of forwarding duplicates of our letters. If we abandon the San Francisco Service, we shall be left entirely at the mercy of the Victorian Government; and I must say that we have not found that Government in these matters nearly so favourable to deal with as the New South Wales Government. The latter Government has met us in a very fair and liberal spirit in the matter of the mails; and therefore we should continue to work with them, in connection with the San Francisco Service, as far as we can. No fault can be found with the ships that have been supplied; for as regards convenience, speed, &c., they are everything that can be desired. They afford us direct communication with America, which, I think, is a great advantage. We have direct communication with the East by the Suez Service, and with America by the San Francisco Service. I have no doubt that honorable gentlemen coming from Otago feel there would be a loss by taking these large steamers off the coastal service; but, during the last five years, the Government have persisted in forcing them to go down to Otago. The matter is simply in this condition at present: Either the coastal service must be stopped, or the whole service must be discontinued altogether. Mr. W. P. Clyde, the President of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in a letter to Messrs. Gilchrist, Watt, and Co., of Sydney, puts the matter very concisely. He says, "Under the former direction of this Company, an abandonment of this service had been seriously considered, when a modification of the route to the direct C. service was permitted, and the service continued." It will be remembered that that modification was made, and, under it, the service was found very satisfactory. And then Mr. Clyde goes on to say, "The necessities of the case present to my mind the following alternatives:—A modification of the route to what is known as the C route, which avoids the difficulties and dangers of the coastal service, and the stopping at Fiji." No doubt the stopping at Fiji is one of the most serious difficulties the contractors find in their way. They can only go among the reefs by daylight, and at great loss of time. Mr. Clyde continues: "The substitution of ships fitted for the coastal service and Fiji navigation, which steamers would scarcely be fit for the long sea service, in place of the popular and able steamers now performing the service." These are the alternatives, or otherwise the service will be abandoned by the contractors. Therefore it is clear either that the coastal service must be given up, or that the service will be abandoned altogether. The Government have, as I have stated, endeavoured to get the Company to carry out the coastal service as hitherto; but they fully realize that the service, as it at present stands, will require modification. When we are in Committee, I shall have an opportunity of affording honorable members any other information which may be required. Among the papers relating to the service there will be found a telegram from Mr. Stewart, of Sydney, to the Colonial Secretary at Wellington. It is as follows:—

"Sydney, 12th October, 1876.

"Hope that, in obtaining sanction from Parliament to modification mail service, you will secure option to call Bay of Islands. Please reply.

"ALEXANDER STEWART,
"(for Colonial Secretary, Sydney)."

My answer to this was,—

"Wellington, 13th October, 1876.

"Great difficulty about coastal service if Bay of Islands port of call. Auckland will probably be fixed. Difference of time to Sydney few hours only.

"FREDK. WHITAKER,

"Postmaster-General."

When I first went into this question, my opinion was that the Bay of Islands would be the proper place. But, after careful consideration, I and the Government have come to the conclusion that it would not be desirable to make the Bay of Islands the port of call, as the coastal service from the Bay of Islands instead of Auckland would involve a large extra expenditure. The last telegram the Government have just received is as follows:—

"If you wish our co-operation, you had better seek alternative permission. Auckland twelve hours longer, most objectionable."

The whole matter is now before the House. Honorable members have all the papers relating to it in their hands, and they will be able to see the exact state of things. The New South Wales Government, in their last telegram, dated 18th October, ask us to take the alternative of either Auckland or the Bay of Islands as the port of call. To enable the Government to give a definite answer one way or the other, I now move the resolution standing in my name.

Mr. STAFFORD.—The Postmaster-General has placed the matter so fairly before the House, and his views are so fully borne out by the papers upon the subject which have been placed before the House, that I feel bound to concur in almost all the conclusions at which he has arrived. There is, however, one point of difference between us; for he, without giving any reasons why, except in the short reference at the end of his speech, insisted, as it were, that Auckland would be the best place in New Zealand for the mail steamers to call. Now, my only desire is to get the cheapest mail service that can be got. I have no other feeling in the matter; and I entirely concur with the Postmaster-General that it is unadvisable to attempt to maintain the coastal service. It must be a failure, and I am quite willing to see it abandoned altogether. That part of the service being abandoned, the only question that remains, in my mind, is, where is the cheapest place in New Zealand at which we can get our mails from San Francisco delivered? Now, the honorable gentleman has given no reason why the Bay of Islands should not be preferred to Auckland as the calling place. He says, "After a great deal of consideration"—he does not say by whom: it was not by the Californian Mail Service Committee, of which I am a member.

Mr. WHITAKER.—By the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD.—Well, after a great deal of consideration, the Government have come to the conclusion that the cheapest port of call in New Zealand is Auckland; but the honorable gentleman forgets that it is part of the recommendation of the Committee on the subject, and part of the resolution which the Government has now submitted, that the contractors are to deliver the mails at the different ports of New Zealand. Therefore, I say that it is the contractors and not this House who should be left to decide ultimately which is the best port of call, from which the mails could best be distributed at the harbour ports of the colony. I observe in the papers laid on the table that the New South Wales Government is most urgent in pointing out that the Bay of Islands and not Auckland should be selected as the port of call; and the last telegram received also urges that the Bay of Islands is the most convenient port. The contractors, in all their communications, express a decided preference for the Bay of Islands, although they put the two ports as alternative. Now, as we propose to throw upon the contractors the cost of distributing the mails throughout New Zealand, why not leave them a discretionary power as to the selection of one port or the other? If the Government tell us it will cost the country £7,000 more if they decide upon calling at the Bay of Islands instead of Auckland, they will not care to pay that £7,000, and therefore they would select Auckland, but they should have the option; no good reason has been given to the Committee why they should not. I will propose, That, at the end of the first subsection, after the word "Auckland," the words "or Bay of Islands, at the option of the contractors" be added; and to strike out the words "at least," at the end of the third subsection, with a view to insert the words, "if calling at Auckland, or £10,000 if calling at the Bay of Islands." That would throw upon the contractors the necessity of foregoing £2,500 if they should prefer to call at the Bay of Islands; and if they did adopt the Bay of Islands, the colony would get the service that much cheaper; but if they found it cheaper to adopt the alternative proposition and call at Auckland, then by all means let them do so. I am quite willing to admit that it would be better to have the steamers calling at Auckland; but considering the circumstances of the colony, we must go in purely for an efficient mail service, at the cheapest possible rate. We cannot afford to offer inducement to the steamers to come to Auckland for the sake of consulting the convenience of a few first-class passengers, although the £2,500 extra may prove sufficient to induce them to do so. I am encouraged to move this amendment by the observation that the New South Wales Government will be much more likely to promote this modification if the Bay of Islands is selected; and the contractors themselves have always kept that alternative in view. I also recollect the very able letter received from Mr. Thomas Russell upon the subject last year, in which he strongly insisted upon the Bay of Islands being the best place in New Zealand at which the San Francisco steamers could call.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I think the motion of the Postmaster-General is somewhat defective. It says, "It is expedient that the existing San Francisco Mail Contract be modified." I am not disposed to say that it is expedient, but I believe the Company will not be able to continue the coastal service. That being the case, we should throw the responsibility of breaking the contract on the contractors and not on the colony. I would therefore suggest this amendment:—"That in the event of the contractors for the San Francisco Mail Service being desirous to modify the conditions of their contract, and in the event of the Government of New South Wales deeming it expedient so to do, this House will consent to such modification on the following terms." Then would follow the subsections of the Postmaster-General's resolution. I do not think the honorable gentleman can object to that. I could vote for this amendment; but I cannot vote for the resolution as it stands. There are other honorable members who think that the Company should be compelled to fulfil the contract as it stands, or throw it up; and they also would vote for this amendment. I admit that it would be a great mistake to abandon the service; but, at the same time, I do not think it is advisable to interfere with the terms of the contract. The proposal of the honorable member for Timaru to give the Company the option of selecting the Bay of Islands or Auckland, is a very good one; but I fail to see upon what grounds he can make a difference in cost to the colony by selecting one port or the other. The proposition of the Postmaster-General to reduce the subsidy by £7,500, in consideration of the abandonment of the coastal service, should not be entertained, inasmuch as the Company offered under the O. service to accept that contract for £75,000 per annum; whereas the B. service—which is at present being performed—was to cost £90,000. The colony accepted the B. service; and if the Company now want to fall back on the C. service, they should carry out their original offer to do it for £75,000. Looking at the advantage New South Wales would gain by being made the terminus of the line, they should reduce the subsidy of this colony by at least £10,000. I would suggest that these figures should be substituted for the £7,500, and then I would accept the amendment of the honorable member for Timaru, leaving it open to the Company to adopt the Bay of Islands, or Auckland, as they thought fit. There is another addition I should like to see made to the resolution. The Company now have their boats on the line, and desire, for their own convenience, to alter the terms of the contract; but I think the colony should reserve to itself the right to put an end to the contract within a shorter period than eight years. To carry out that, I will move, That in any arrangement that may be entered into with the Company, the Government will reserve to itself the power to put an end to the contract on giving twelve months' notice. If twelve months' notice is too little, I would substitute two years; and then if at any time we found that the service was not being carried out to the satisfaction of the colony we could terminate the contract. There is no hardship in that, because we are quite prepared to carry out the present contract. We are not breaking faith with the Company. If they wish to make a new arrangement, we are justified in insisting upon terms suitable to ourselves.

Mr. MACFARLANE.—It appears to me that this is merely a question of the form of words: that there is not much difference between the proposal of the Government and the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers.

Mr. BURNS.—We in New Zealand have been very unfortunate in our mail services, both by California and Panama. I think it is a very great pity that this service was ever entered into, and the longer it is continued the more unsatisfactory will it be. However, the Postmaster-General has put matters in a different light; and as he is going upon the economic principle, I must say I am bound to give the proposal some measure of support. I like the proposal of the honorable member for Port Chalmers the best of the two, for this simple reason: that while, on the one hand, the House appears to offer something to the Company, I think it right that this House should get an offer from the Company. That is the difference, and it is a very great deal of difference. In the one case, the Company might make a handle of the offer for breaking off the contract altogether, while, if we insisted upon the Company adhering to their contract, they could not violate it. I am not going to be so selfish as to look at this question from a southern point of view, and to say, You must continue the coastal service. I admit that a bargain is a bargain, and if it cannot be fulfilled it ought to be stopped altogether. We are going the wrong way to work with the mail service altogether. If we were quit of this service, we could get a service carried on by a company of our own formed in this country, and at a cheaper rate. Taking into consideration the present financial position of the country, I am bound to support the proposal of the honorable member for Port Chalmers.

Mr. MURRAY.—I have always been opposed to the San Francisco Service, as I did not see the advisability of having it to enable the Americans to come and compete with us in the Island trade. More especially have I been opposed to it on the ground that we should have had direct steamer communication with England, at a less cost than we have to pay for this service. I would just point out some of the results that would have followed from the direct service. The Government have admitted that they had an offer from responsible contractors to bring out our immigrants by first-class steamers, at a cost of £10 per head. Now, I find that the expenditure upon the mail service has been something like £200,000 during the last five years. The cost of importing 60,000 immigrants has been £1,411,994. The proportionate cost of raising the loan at 5 per cent. has been £71,000. These three items amount to £1,678,994. Now, the bringing out of 60,000 immigrants at £10 per head would be £600,000. The cost of barracks, quarantine, incidentals, and contingencies might be stated at £3 per head, making a total of £780,000. There has thus been an absolute money loss to the colony of £998,994, besides that of having no direct steam communication with England which otherwise we would have had. The opportunity we have now of getting rid of the San Francisco Mail Service altogether is one that should not be lost. There is one proposal which has been omitted. It is said that we should have either the Bay of Islands or Auckland as the port of call; but we should not overlook the central port of the colony, the port of Wellington. I believe it would only entail a loss of one day more in the service. We could get almost daily communication with Dunedin and the South by the Union Steamship Company's boats and by the Australian steamers, and thus obviate the necessity for a coastal service altogether. I would move as an amendment, That the word "Auckland" be omitted, and "Wellington" inserted in lieu thereof; that subsection 2 be struck out, and that "£7,500" be omitted, and "£15,000" inserted instead. We should choose the most economical way of carrying our letters. The colony cannot afford to indulge in the special luxury of a mail service to America. And the necessity of rapid communication, does not exist as formerly, seeing that we have got the telegraph cable.

Mr. SHARP.—I do not think the honorable member for Bruce has put the matter properly before the House. He talks of the costly service. As I understand the proposal, we have to pay £45,000. We must not overlook the fact that we are receiving £23,000 as against that subsidy. We receive the New Zealand postages and the English postages, amounting to that sum; and by the proposed reduction we should then have to pay about £17,000 for the whole service. Every one must admit that the San Francisco Mail Service, as far as New Zealand is concerned, is the most direct and the speediest route. The several amendments before the House certainly leave one in a sort of fog, and one cannot at once decide without considering them carefully which is the best amendment to support. But after all it comes to this: that the House seems to be of opinion that the service should either be modified as pointed out by the honorable member for Port Chalmers or the honorable member for Timaru, or else that it should be done away with altogether. I think the majority of members are of opinion that the contract should be modified. Although there is no doubt that as far as Wellington is concerned it is the most central port of the colony, there is a dislike among contractors to make Wellington the port of call.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. SHARP.—I do not know why, except for the reason that strikes every one else, that the weather is of a character which the steamers do not like to encounter. I think the honorable member for Port Chalmers pointed out that by having a line of steamers calling at Auckland, and not running down the coast, the New South Wales Government would gain a direct advantage, inasmuch as there would not be a transhipment of passengers. It is very true, no doubt, that would be the case inwards; but he forgot to state that outwards we have the advantage of New South Wales. I therefore think that, if the Company wish to modify their contract on the terms proposed in this resolution, I shall give my support in favour of the steamers calling at the port of Auckland. I think beyond that point it does not rest with the Company. The Government should keep the control of the inter-provincial service in their own hands, and they should only alter the contract so far as making the port of call in New Zealand, and should retain the distribution of the mails.

Mr. STAFFORD.—I may state that this question was very well considered in Committee. If the Government retain in their own hands the distribution of the mails, we shall not get the New South Wales Government to contribute anything towards the cost. If we compel the contractors still to provide vessels subject to the approval of the Government as to speed and general convenience, we have the Sydney Government paying us one-half the cost, and we shall have the contractors responsible for the due execution of the service; otherwise the contractors' obligation will entirely rest at the Bay of Islands or Auckland, as the case may be, for any breakdown in the distribution of the mails. If the contractors had to distribute the mails, and any breakdown occurred, they would be liable to a penalty. Under these circumstances, the Committee thought the contractors should distribute the mails at the same ports as they do now. The only difference will be that, instead of having larger vessels going down the coast, we should have smaller boats, approved of by the Government.

Mr. MURRAY.—We have now three proposals before us. The proposal of the honorable member for Port Chalmers simply puts the question in a more satisfactory light. I think we should agree to accept the first part of the proposal. The next proposal is as to whether Auckland shall be fixed as a port of call. The amendment of the honorable member for Timaru was that either the Bay of Islands or Auckland should be selected as the port of call. The fourth proposal is that Wellington should be a port of call. By adopting this amendment we shall get our letters in the South two days earlier, and in Auckland they will get their letters two days later. There would be every advantage in having a port of call at Wellington. We should be able to utilize the coal fields on the West Coast. The large steamers could take in a supply of coal at the port of Wellington. The Bay of Islands coal is unsuited for steam purposes, on account of the quantity of sulphur it contains. It is very important that we should use as much of our own productions as possible, and try to reduce the enormous expenditure that we incur in importing commodities. Anything we can do to develop our local resources will be of advantage to the colony, and will tend to diminish the amount of subsidy the colony has to pay. Therefore, I trust that honorable members who do not come from particularly far north will support my amendment.

Mr. PEARCE.—I cannot permit the statement which fell from the honorable member for Nelson City (Mr. Sharp) to pass by unchallenged. He said that masters of vessels objected to coming to the port of Wellington, and he gave the weather as a reason. I cannot conceive what warrant the honorable member has for making such a statement. In reference to the old Panama Service, there was a stipulation, which was supported by all the masters of vessels, that Wellington should be the port of call. I may say, as a matter of fact, that the first of the Panama steamers that ever came to Wellington was in charge of a perfect stranger, who brought his ship in in the dead of night. I can easily understand that the contractors for the present service may object to the port of Wellington, not on account of bad weather, as the honorable member said, but simply because calling here would take a longer time, and Sydney would object. Unfortunately, our mail is in connection with Sydney, because, if we had been able to work in concert with Victoria, the proper route would have been through Cook Strait, and on to Melbourne, for a San Francisco Service. Unfortunately, we have to deal with Sydney; and this route is too far south to make it the proper one for Sydney. I am inclined to support the motion of the honorable member for Timaru.

Mr. STAFFORD.—I should like to explain what, perhaps, was not clearly expressed in my resolution as drafted. I propose that the option of calling at the Bay of Islands or Auckland should be left to the contractors; and they would have to consider whether they would receive £2,500 less for calling at the Bay of Islands than if they called at Auckland. I also wish the Government could see their way to accept the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I think it would come better particularly in respect to giving the option to the contractors which I propose, and would throw upon the contractors the onus of making arrangements more thoroughly than the motion as originally proposed.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY.—In proposing that the terminus should be at Wellington instead of at Auckland, so that the South should have their mails two days sooner, I think the honorable member for Bruce forgot that the South obtains the benefit of having the Suez mail delivered there first, and I think it only fair to the North that they should receive the greatest advantage from the San Francisco Service. If Wellington were made the port of call, it would make the service to Auckland about two days longer than if the steamers called at the North. By the Bay of Islands would be the best line for the steamers. If a steamer starting from the Manukau brought the letters for Taranaki and Wellington they could very rapidly be distributed. By the steamers calling at the Bay of Islands instead of Auckland, 250 miles would be saved on the voyage to Sydney, which would be about equal to one day, and that would make a great difference to that colony. With respect to the amount we pay to the Victorian Government for letters sent via Suez, I the other day asked the Postmaster-General to make a statement as to how the sum we pay is calculated; but, as that has not been done, I can only take my figures from the returns. I find from the Postmaster-General's report, the payment to Victoria for a year was £9,378 10s. 7d., and 97,666 letters were sent. By San Francisco 310,422 letters were sent, which, at the same rate, would give a cost of about £32,500. We pay £45,000 for the San Francisco Service, so the difference would be very small, and we now have the advantage of a fortnightly mail. Every year we shall send more letters by San Francisco; and I may mention that at the end of 1875 there was a feeling that the San Francisco mail was not regular, and that caused a great number of extra letters to be sent by Suez. If we give up the San Francisco mail, we shall scarcely gain anything in money; we shall lose the second line of communication with England, and the advantage of the connection with the Islands and America.

Mr. SHARP.—I think the honorable member for Wellington City misunderstood me. I admitted that Wellington was a better geographical centre than Auckland for the distribution of the mails; but I said, and I believe I am correct, that there is an antipathy on the part of the contractors both of the Panama and San Francisco lines to coming so far south. That is on record, but I have not the papers by me at present. The difference between calling at Wellington and at a northern port is two or three days.

Mr. CURTIS.—I think two things are pretty clear on the face of the papers laid before the Committee. One is, that the choice of a port of call lies between Auckland and the Bay of Islands, and that Wellington is out of the question. Another point which appears to me to be completely settled is, that the coastal service by the through boats must be given up. I was very glad to hear some attention drawn by the honorable member for Lyttelton to the question of the actual cost of the service. I endeavoured to follow the figures of the Postmaster-General; but I was unable to arrive at the actual cost of the service, beyond the additional sum we should have to pay towards the Suez Service in the event of the abandonment of the San Francisco Service. I do not think the honorable member stated that in distinct figures. That is a matter of very great importance, not perhaps for the information of the House, because honorable members are aware that the actual cost of the service is really very small: at all events, it cannot amount to more than £10,000 a year; whereas the public in the colony generally are under the impression that the service actually costs the whole of the contribution of £45,000 a year in excess of anything we would otherwise have to pay. It is thought that we are paying £45,000 a year for a luxury.

Not only does that impression prevail generally, but the editors of newspapers are constantly dining into the ears of the public that this service costs £45,000 a year, and ought to be abandoned. Therefore I think it is very important that the actual figures should be placed upon record. As to the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers, for expunging certain words in the preamble and inserting other words, I think it is unnecessary. It is made quite clear that the modification is to come from the contractor, and there is no harm in our agreeing that it is expedient that some change should be made. I have no objection to support the amendment of the honorable member if it is any satisfaction to him to add those words to the preamble of the resolution. The amendment of the honorable member for Timaru is, I think, a very judicious one, and throws the onus of selecting the port of call as between the Bay of Islands, and Auckland on the contractors. The modification which the honorable member proposes as to a reduction of the subsidies is also, I think, a very reasonable one. In agreeing to this resolution, I think it is desirable that the House should not tie down the Government too strictly as to the terms of the contract. The House will probably rise before this arrangement can be completed, and there are two other parties to consider; there are not only the contractors, but also the Government of New South Wales. If we tie down the hands of the Government, and state too explicitly every condition we expect to have adhered to, I am afraid that difficulties may arise which we do not foresee. There is one thing I should like to see modified, and that is the coastal service, as it will hereafter have to be performed by the smaller vessels. I think it would be better to leave the alternative in the hands of the Government whether it should be conducted by the contractors, or by the Government. I do not agree with the argument of the honorable member for Timaru that it is absolutely necessary that the distribution of the mails from the port of call to other parts of the colony should be in the hands of the contractors, so that they might be responsible in the case of a breakdown. I do not think that is of importance, but I do see considerable advantage in leaving that matter in the hands of the Government, and at their discretion. I see it might remove difficulties in negotiating with the contractors, and also with the Government of New South Wales. I would propose to amend resolution No. 2 by striking out in the third paragraph the words "by the Company," and to amend No. 3 by inserting, after the word "subsidy," the words "including coastal service." The effect of that amendment would be to leave it in the hands of the Government to deal with that question, which is wholly a minor one after all. During the course of the negotiations it might turn out to be most expedient that the Government should have that power.

Mr. ORMOND.—The honorable gentleman who has just sat down has, to a certain extent, dealt with what I should have brought before the Committee. He has explained that it is a very great mistake to speak, as the honorable member for Bruce has done, of this being a costly postal service. It is not so; and the great advantage of the service is that, as the number of our letters increases, and the colony grows, so will it be still less expensive. It is correct to say that, at the present moment, the service costs us only £16,000 a year, and, if this arrangement is carried out, will not cost more than £6,000. That cannot be said to be a costly service for the conveyance of our letters to America and England. I think the discussion would be very much limited if the Government would now say whether or not they will accept the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Timaru. If they would accept it, I think a majority of the Committee would then see that we had arrived at a conclusion that we could agree to, and further discussion would be saved. The amendment proposed by the honorable member for Timaru is, practically, the recommendation of the Postal Committee, after very careful inquiry and considerable time in examining into the matter. The only difference is, that while the Committee recommend that either Auckland or the Bay of Islands may be the port of call, and the sum of which New Zealand should be relieved is £10,000, the honorable member for Timaru, leaving the question of the port of call open as between Auckland and the Bay of Islands, diminishes the amount of subsidy to £7,500 if it is arranged that the port of call shall be Auckland, and to £10,000 if to the Bay of Islands. I think, considering the information we have got, there can be little doubt that the Company will have no option in the matter. The Government of New South Wales so strongly insist that it would be an advantage to them to have the Bay of Islands the port of call, that it is sure to be ultimately decided upon. New South Wales will gain twenty-four hours, and New Zealand will lose nothing by that arrangement. I now come to the question of the distribution of the mails; and on that point the amendment of the honorable member for Nelson City is entirely opposed to what was, I think, the unanimous opinion of the Committee. I would point out that nothing would be more likely to interfere with the regularity of the service, and its consequent advantage, than to make two bodies responsible for it. The Committee, in recommending that the Company should have the distribution of the mails, thought it was absolutely necessary this condition should be imposed. There is no doubt it will come to the same thing. The Company will have to arrange with our local companies for their distribution, and it must be an immense advantage to the colony that the Company itself should be responsible. I should imagine that it would make it more costly if the Government had to arrange for different services, than if the arrangement were made by the Company. With regard to the amendment proposing that Wellington should be the port of call, I was glad to hear the honorable member for Wellington City say that it would jeopardize the whole service if such a condition were inserted. There can be no doubt about it, we have an admirable service, carried out by vessels of a class such as we have never before seen in our ports. For the first time this service is being carried out with regularity and satisfaction, and we should do nothing to jeopardize it. I would ask the Postmaster-General to say whether the Government will agree to the modification proposed by the honorable member for Timaru.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I will accept the amendments proposed by the honorable member for Port Chalmers and the honorable member for Timaru.

Mr. MURRAY.—I wish to state that, in making so large a modification of the contracts, we are perhaps doing an injustice to other contractors with whom it might be possible to make arrangements. I have to-day received the following telegram from the A.S.N. Company:—

"Modification too favorable to company for seven years. Should be open to public contract."

An erroneous impression might be conveyed by what has been said by some honorable members as to the doing away of the coastal service being a saving to the colony of that portion of the subsidy. I would point out that letters will still have to be sent by Suez; therefore all that is struck off must not be put to the credit of the San Francisco Service.

Mr. JOYCE.—I have an amendment to propose. It is this: That this Committee is of opinion that no modification of the existing contract which would dispense with the coastal service would be satisfactory to New Zealand; and that the Company be required to fulfil its engagements subject to the modification, if it can be agreed to, of substituting the Bay of Islands for Auckland as the port of call. In proposing that amendment, I desire to say that, if we part with the coastal service as it is now carried on, we shall part with one of the greatest advantages to be derived by the colony from taking up the San Francisco service at all. It was taken up to promote intercourse with America, in the expectation of a large trade arising. I do not know that it will ever lead to that, but this last contract has not been in operation long enough to determine the question. We have had some slight indications of a trade arising; for I noticed, in the manifest of the last steamer published in the newspapers, that this colony was supplied with a quantity of onions and apples from San Francisco. That certainly does not indicate a large and important trade; but it is a beginning, at all events. If we part with our coastal service, we shall part with the kernel of the nut, and have nothing left but the shell. It would not lead to the opening of a large trade if we merely sent our letters up to the Bay of Islands to catch the steamers as they passed, and it would be very inconvenient to passengers. I shall therefore propose this amendment. I think it would have been a much better position for the Government to have taken up to have said that the service was on its trial, that the time might come when it should cease and determine, and to put the question to this House: Shall we let it determine if the contractors insist upon what they now demand? However, the Government have not chosen to take that course, and, as the nearest approach to it, I shall propose the amendment which I have read.

Mr. W. WOOD.—I beg to move, as an amendment, That in any modified contract a condition be inserted by which any one of the three contracting parties can terminate the contract by giving two years' notice of their intention to do so. The Postmaster-General, as usual, has made a blunder in accepting the amendments of the honorable member for Port Chalmers and the honorable member for Timaru. There being three contracting parties in this case, he immediately jumped to the conclusion that it would be quite fair that one of these parties should have the power to determine the contract at three months' notice. But he does not see the necessity for giving the same right to all the others. When we take in hand to deal with a matter like this, we should certainly give each of the three contracting parties equal powers with regard to determining the contract.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Although I would like to support the amendment of the honorable member for Wallace, yet I feel that, if it were carried, we should be damning the service altogether. We have sufficient evidence before us in the correspondence to show that the contractors cannot carry on the contract if they are compelled to continue the coastal service. I am thoroughly satisfied that the San Francisco Service is the best we can possibly get for the colony; and if the resolutions as proposed are carried, and the contractors and the New South Wales Government agree to them, the only cost to the country will be £6,000 for the current year. Every year the cost will be becoming less; and I believe that in eighteen months or two years we shall have nothing to pay at all, as the postages will pay the subsidy. With regard to the remark of the honorable member for Nelson (Mr. Curtis) that it is not advisable to bind the Government, I think we should merely express our opinion, and, if the Government find it necessary to deviate from it, I would not object to their doing so to a small extent. If it were necessary to go beyond the amount fixed by £1,000, £2,000, or even £5,000, I think the Government should take the responsibility on their own shoulders, trusting to be indemnified afterwards by the Legislature. I trust the honorable member for Wallace will not press his amendment. If it is carried, we know perfectly well that it will have the effect of putting an end to the service altogether. If the honorable member is candid, he will confess that that is his object.

Mr. JOYCE.—I do not see why I should regard the honorable member for Port Chalmers as my father confessor.

The amendment was consequently agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I trust the honorable member for Bruce will not press his amendment that the word "Wellington," be substituted for the word "Auckland." That would make a difference of from 48 to 50 hours to the people of New South Wales in the delivery of their mails. That being the case, I do not think we should pass that amendment. It must be remembered that Auckland has a very fine harbour, and I think it would be well were we to divide our favours, and not centre all the expenditure in Wellington.

Mr. HUNTER.—I think the object is to secure a service that would be of the greatest advantage to the whole colony, and under all the circumstances I think that Auckland should continue to be the port of call for the mail steamers.

Mr. Murray's amendment was negatived.

Mr. Stafford's amendment providing that it should be optional with the contractors whether the Bay of Islands or Auckland should be the port of call, was agreed to.

Mr. Curtis's amendment was negatived.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I move, as an amendment to the third paragraph "That the words '$27,500' be struck out, and '$10,000' inserted in lieu thereof. I think that even if we do this, the New South Wales Government will still have the best of the bargain.

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Mr. Stafford's amendment, relative to respective reductions to be made for calling at the Bay of Islands or Auckland, was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD.—Sir, I will point out, with reference to the amendment of the honorable member for Mataura, that it will, if carried, give the contractors enormous power. They would consider it optional whether they should do their work or not. We have got the service at a price which I do not think is very high. If we give an option without any penalty, depend upon it we shall receive a notice within a week, or possibly within twenty-four hours to conclude the service.

Mr. WHITAKER.—In reality the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers would put an end to the contract, because it is not at all improbable that we should receive the notice to-morrow morning, as pointed out by the honorable member for Timaru.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The Company want to make certain modifications, and it is quite competent for the colony, under these circumstances, to secure terms favourable to itself if it can do so. If the twelve months' notice is too short, I will willingly alter it to two years. I do not think there need be any fear of the Company wishing to bring the contract to a termination so speedily. They have their boats on the line, and, after the objections taken by the House last session about the extension of the contract from six to eight years, the proposition of the member for Bruce should be accepted. There can be no reason to anticipate that the Company will be at all anxious to put a stop to the contract because of such a provision. I therefore think the Government would be wanting in their duty if they do not accept such a modification as this. I wish of course to leave all responsibility with the Government, but at the same time we should indicate what our ideas are upon the subject.

Mr. WHITAKER.—If these resolutions are passed to-night, I propose to telegraph them to-morrow morning to the New South Wales Government, and to the contractors; and if we add the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers, it will be tantamount to saying that we wish to throw up the contract.

Mr. BURNS.—I think it right that there should be some stipulation such as that suggested by the honorable member for Port Chalmers. Before two years are over we shall have a steam line by way of the Cape, which may be as serviceable to New Zealand as the San Francisco line, and, if the Company are anxious to make modifications, we should have the privilege of making modifications too.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I have it on good authority that within eighteen months, or possibly twelve months, a company will be formed to run a line of steamers between Wellington and London by way of the Cape. That being the case, we should not bind ourselves for such a long period as seven years. The Company, I am sure, will agree to this condition, otherwise I would not propose it. If the Postmaster-General had taken proper steps to inform himself of the views of the New South Wales Government, I have no doubt we should have saved £10,000, and would have had these conditions agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON.—The amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers means that as long as the contractors make money they are to keep on the contract; but as soon as they lose they are to stop. That would certainly be a nice arrangement for the colony.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I feel inclined to support the honorable member for Port Chalmers; but I think the feeling of the Committee is that we should give two years' notice. I think, however, that if the amendment is to be agreed to, it should be framed so as to give all the contracting parties the right to terminate the contract.

Mr. W. WOOD.—That was the object of my amendment, and that is the only distinction between it and the motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers.

Mr. W. Wood's amendment and Mr. Reynolds's amendment put and negatived.

Mr. MURRAY.—I think seven years is too long a time for the continuance of this contract. I shall therefore propose, That any modified contract shall contain a provision by which either the Government or the Company may, at the end of five years, terminate the contract.

Mr. REES.—I do not think it would be right, either to the Company or to the colony, to alter the terms of the contract in this way, at a moment's notice. Supposing the contractors did such a thing? We might find ourselves without a mail service at all, and, if the colony does it, the contractors may be put to enormous loss. There ought to be fair notice on either side.

Mr. MURRAY.—If the honorable gentleman wishes that, I have no objection; but I think provision should be certain to be made in any arrangement. As a matter of business, the Government would stipulate for such a provision.

Mr. SWANSON.—I think the interests of the other parties to the contract should not be ignored by the House, and everything left for them to obtain themselves.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honorable gentleman seems to think that the interests of the Company should not be ignored. We have a contract at the present time. We say, "Carry out that contract," and the contractors say they cannot unless it is modified; and then we say, "Very well, these are the terms on which we will agree to modify the contract." The Committee having rejected the proposal for two years' notice, I trust they will accept the amendment of the honorable member for Bruce.

Mr. REES.—I move, Sir, That the words "subject to one year's notice being given on either side" be added to the honorable member for Bruce's amendment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I think, if we make the contract too stringent, we may lead to a difficulty, or to a breach of faith. I think five years is long enough. At the same time, if the Government of New South Wales and our Government could not agree to it, I would be willing to keep the contract as it is.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I think it will be hardly worth while to carry out the proposal of the honorable member for Bruce.

Amendment negatived, and original motion as amended agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the House. On the question, That it be read a second time,

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I wish to have it recorded that I dissent entirely from the course that has been adopted. In the first place, I object altogether to the Government not accepting the proposition made some months ago. Considering the action taken by the House last session on this subject, I think it has displayed a great deal of inconsistency in refusing to accept the amendment of the honorable member for Bruce.

Mr. MURRAY.—I think the Committee was rather misled by the Postmaster-General. If we dispense with the San Francisco Service altogether, the total cost by the Suez line would then only be £15,896.

Resolution read a second time and agreed to, "That in the event of the contractors for the San Francisco Mail Service being desirous of modifying the conditions of their contract, and in the event of the Government of New South Wales deeming it expedient that the contract should be modified, this House would consent to such modification on the following terms:—(1.) That the service be direct from San Francisco to Sydney, calling at Honolulu and at Auckland, or at the Bay of Islands, at the option of the contractors. (2.) That the coastal service be performed by the Company by ten-knot boats, to be approved of by the Government. (3.) That the share of New Zealand contribution to the subsidy be reduced by £7,500 if calling at Auckland, or £10,000 if calling at the Bay of Islands."

ABOLITION.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I am aware that the House regrets that this debate has arisen, and I think the House further regrets that the despatch was laid on the table, and perhaps more strongly that the despatch was ever written at all. But it having been written, it having been laid on the table, and having become the property of the House, I do not see how the House can escape from the necessity of taking cognizance of it in a way that such cognizance will appear on the records of the House. I cannot understand the squeamishness of some honorable members in this House in regard to every allusion to Her Majesty's representative in this colony. I can imagine a possibility that might arise in the colony, in which and upon which it might be the duty of the representative House to consult Her Majesty, and ask that her representative might be recalled. In such a case it would be impossible to do so if the action of Her Majesty's representative was not to be discussed in this House. I am aware that a line has been drawn between the action of the representative of Her Majesty in regard to his Responsible Ministers, and in regard to his position as responsible to the Crown only; and no doubt, in the matter under consideration at the present time, we are considering a despatch for which the representative of the Crown is responsible to the Crown only. I can fancy that a case might arise in which the representative of Her Majesty might, unfortunately, lend himself to a scheme of great magnitude by which, with the assistance of his Responsible Ministers, he might hope to build up a monopoly in which he might be a great gainer, and in such a case it would be right for this House to consider such action and make such representations with regard to it as we should think fit. We all acknowledge that the despatch under consideration is ill-advised, and I think there is one special point which is ill-advised and which has not been alluded to yet, that is the extreme impolicy of it; because no one can deny for a moment that the member for the Thames has a greater following in this colony than any other one man in it, and any direct insult offered by any one, be he high or be he low, to that honorable member, is taken up far more strongly by those who follow him than by himself. The insults thrown upon the Superintendent of Otago and the Superintendent of Auckland by the Government, and upon one of them in this despatch, are calculated to exasperate the people of the North and South, and to make them forget, if possible, the duty which they owe to the Crown. Sir, it would have been wise if Ministers, in advising His Excellency, or in the part which they took themselves in this transaction—I say it would have been wise of them to remember that a large minority in this House must necessarily represent a very large section of the public. Many of us are of opinion that the minority in this House represent the majority outside the House; but, assuming that it does not, we must admit that the minority in this House is a sufficiently large one to represent a very large portion of the inhabitants of this colony. It is, therefore, madness for the Government to go on heaping insults upon the minority. I am aware that a division on a late occasion was taken advantage of to show that the country is against the policy—is very largely against the policy which is now under consideration; but Ministers ruthlessly ignore the fact that prominent members of the Opposition either refused to vote, or went into the lobby, with them on that occasion, so that there might not be a shadow of imputation cast upon them as in any way obstructing the Government. The division on the Counties Bill was no criterion of the feeling of members, no indication of approval of the county system as against the provincial system. It was not right to mislead the Secretary of State as he has been misled by the Government claiming a majority of votes as in favour of the Abolition policy. For these reasons I shall move, as an amendment, That this House regrets that the despatch from His Excellency the Governor to the Secretary of State, of the 21st June, 1876, laid upon the table by Ministers last night, is ill-advised.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, the amendment which has been moved gives me the opportunity of making some reply to what, I think, is the very unsatisfactory line of conduct pursued by the Government in reference to the despatch of which I have made complaint. I would ask this House to consider that the despatch I speak of was addressed by the Governor of this country to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, for Her Majesty's information; that it contained a private letter, written by an inhabitant of the town of Auckland to the Governor's Private Secretary, meant for the Governor's private eye, the expression being, "You can show it to Lord Normanby if you think fit." That, Sir, is the expression used in that letter. Well, this document was sent Home by the Governor to the Secretary of State. It is made a part of the public records in England, liable to be produced in centuries to come. That private letter has been made the basis on which the most serious accusations were levelled against myself, in language of no ordinary kind—in language such as I have never seen previously, I think, in a State document—in language such as I think I have never seen before come from a person holding such an exalted position as the writer of that despatch holds. Now, according to all the rules of justice and courtesy—I mean the barest justice to the poorest of Her Majesty's subjects—the letter which was made the ground of these accusations against myself ought to have been forwarded to me for my reply. That letter related to a conversation stated to have been held with me at least twelve months previously. The writer admitted that he was himself doubtful as to the precise words of that conversation, as any man must have been after the lapse of such an interval of time. As for myself I do not recollect anything about it as it is stated here. The words, in the order and connection in which they are put, were not used in that order and connection by myself. After I had denied the accuracy of the charges made against me, the simple reply I received was insult added to insult. The House was told by the Premier that, had I not known that the accusations contained in that letter were true, they would not have heard from me the speech that I had made. That was after my own denial of the accusation, and after some one or two other speakers also denied it on their own behalf. That gentleman spoke on behalf of the Governor of this colony; he spoke in his name. I regret that such a line of conduct should have been pursued. So much malevolence was exhibited by the honorable member who was representing the Governor, that when he read from my letter one extract, putting his own interpretation on it, he refused, even at my earnest request, to read a further extract which explained it. I believe, Sir, that probably so wrong an act as one individual bringing against another an accusation so unjust and so uncourteous was never before committed in any Assembly. The charges were two. One charge made in this despatch, in very strong language indeed, is to this effect: that, when the resolution in favour of abolition had been passed by the Provincial Council of Auckland, it "was only rescinded next day by a majority of one, at the direct instigation and dictation of Sir George Grey himself." The House has heard this night from three gentlemen a direct and positive refutation of that statement and of that accusation. The gentleman who proposed the resolution has told the House that he had never seen me when he did it. The gentleman who is next mainly concerned, assured the House that, at the time he did this, he had never conversed with me upon public affairs at all. Another gentleman pledged his word also to the House that this statement is positively untrue. Yet, Sir, that having been so conclusively proved by the mouth of three witnesses, and three witnesses who must have been thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, no expression of regret on behalf of the Governor has been made by his Responsible Advisers. They have remained in dogged silence, triumphing, I may say, over the wicked action they have performed. I think, Sir, such a proceeding will appear to be almost incredible

What was said in reference to that, and in reference to the other accusations made against me? I was told simply that the ordinary sources of redress were open to me if I desired them. Now, when that was stated, the honorable gentleman who stated it must have known that he was stating that which was not the case; that he was deliberately making a statement contrary to fact, which must have misled this House and the country. What poor redress was left to me in regard to Great Britain? What redress have I now against the impression which has been created there? Was anything more manifestly unjust ever before said? Any individual who chooses to throw aside all the rules which men generally follow with regard to justice, with regard to what is really the fact—I say any man who chooses to violate those rules, and to stand up boldly and make what assertions he pleases, of course passes our control. There are no means of dealing with such persons, except leaving them to that public reprobation which I have no doubt will fall upon them. Then another accusation was made against me, which was to this effect: I was distinctly charged, in words, with having been the first to spread a report of the most malicious character. What redress is now left to me against an accusation of that kind? How can I, under such circumstances, hope to obliterate from the minds of those at Home the impression that must have been created. Some months must now elapse before any letter I can address could reach such persons. For that also, on the part of the Governor, no single word of regret has been expressed? I would ask, Sir, how they pretend to justify those proceedings on their part, and what has been said by themselves. Sir, I would call your attention even to this: that whilst pleading against injustice done me, that I may see the contempt with which I am treated, the Prime Minister deliberately reads a newspaper, and will not listen to the defence I make, thus violating the rules of this House, the rules of courtesy, and, I must say, all rules of fairness, in the manner he always does. The accusation is first that I addressed a letter direct to the Secretary of State. I have a right so to do. I have been told that such a letter must go through the hands of the Governor if I expect attention to be paid to it. Now, it will be seen from the letter I wrote at the time that the matter on which I addressed the Secretary of State was urgent; and I believed, when I wrote that letter, that delay would take place in transmitting it to Her Majesty's Ministers and to the Queen, in order that advice might be taken from the Governor's Ministers, which, I submit, no rule of etiquette or custom of the service rendered necessary to be taken. According to the rules of the service, it was the duty of the Governor to have transmitted my letter with such remarks from himself as he thought necessary. I furnished him with a copy of the letter for that express purpose. He could have easily done it; and by next mail Ministers could have forwarded any report they pleased. As Superintendent of the province, I was in no way bound to send my letter through them, or to recognize them in any way whatever; and that they know perfectly well. The letter I addressed to the Secretary of State was one to which an immediate reply was required, for many reasons. It was not only required on account of the question I raised about the Queen's ships, but I raised most important legal questions upon points regarding which this House ought to receive information. Had the delay not taken place in the transmission of my letter, which resulted from the proceedings of the Governor, there is no doubt a reply might have reached the colony before this time, and this House would have been in possession of an opinion which they ought to have been put in possession of long since—the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. On that point I say further, Sir, that the Governor himself returned no proper reply to me. The question that I raised was that warnings were in circulation in several parts of the colony that the Queen's vessels were to be employed against Her Majesty's subjects here in the event of any difficulty taking place between themselves and the Colonial Government. It was said that I must have imagined them to be mad—either that one should advise the employment of the Queen's vessels or forces against Her Majesty's subjects here, or that the other would have taken the advice. I say, Sir, that when that was alleged they knew perfectly well that they were misleading the Home authorities. They knew perfectly well that upon a very minor occasion indeed in this colony, when a very partial disturbance took place, they did embark Her Majesty's troops on board a man-of-war, and did deliberately intend to use that man-of-war and Her Majesty's forces against the Queen's European subjects in this country. They knew that, but they concealed the fact. And, Sir, if they did not intend so to use the Queen's troops and so to use the Queen's vessels—I use the word "troops" as referring to the marines as an armed land force—why not at once have given me the assurance which they have now given? I think no sufficient answer has been given to that. Again, the excuse made to me for detaining from me the knowledge of what the Governor had written regarding myself on the information which he had received, was that he was anxious to wait until he had received an answer from Home, in order that he might lay the whole subject before this Parliament at once. I say this is no correct answer. I say they knew when they stated that, that they were alleging a flimsy excuse which they knew was not a fact. Except for the very late period this Parliament has been kept in session it would have been impossible for them to have done that. There was every probability in the world, when this letter was written in the month of June, that Parliament would not have been in session when the reply was received, and they deliberately attempted to mislead this House and the country in making the statement which they did upon that subject. They knew well that the reply could not have been received in time, and, Sir, in truth that was no answer at all. What reply is that to the injury that has been done to me at Home by the despatch they have sent there, an injury wanton in itself, and one against which it was impossible for me in any way to defend myself? This is no excuse whatever, and I believe they know that. If it had not been for the proceedings that took place in this House the other night, which enabled me to insist upon the production of this despatch regarding myself, which I suspected to be in existence from the fact that no notice had been taken of my letter, leading me to think that something unkind or ungenerous had been sent Home with regard to myself—except for these circumstances we would never have seen the letter of which we are now in possession. I have been said to have acted wrongly in saying that I have been subjected to the action of spies. I repeat again that such undoubtedly is the case. Can any one read the telegrams that were received by the Native Minister from the Waikato, and those letters which were sent down, and say that they did not contain exactly just such accusations as spies always furnish to tyrants—exactly such accusations as are never made against a free people who can obtain open justice and redress? Again, I say, in the case of this very letter, the whole thing is the action of a spy. What can be the action of a spy except to question you without warning you that he is about to betray any answer you may make, in his own language, to a higher power? What can the action of a spy be otherwise than to transmit secretly some statement against you of an alleged conversation of which you have no knowledge, to the Private Secretary of the person highest in authority in the country, that it may be secretly given to that person? What can be the action of a spy but then to send that information so furnished to the persons highest in authority in your own country—to your own Sovereign? I say that, throughout, the whole proceeding has been such as is followed by spies—an action discreditable, dishonorable to the Ministry here who have borne a part in it, and to the main instigator in the case. I appeal to any writer upon morals, to any writer upon history, to say whether these actions are not such as have always taken place where people have been attempting to oppress their fellow-countrymen. Look, Sir, at the history of ancient Rome. Look at the delators who filled the minds of the Emperors with suspicions, and advanced accusations against the Senators, and see if anything worse than this was ever done. Sir, it is to climb the backstairs of Courts to fill the ears of those who sit to rule their fellow-men with the poison of malice, to instigate them against those you treat as rivals, and who you know are exposing your wrong-doings to your fellow-countrymen. Such, I say, undoubtedly is the fact in this case. How an answer can be returned to that I know not. What excuse can be made for it I am incapable of conceiving. Some excuse was attempted to be made for several reasons by the honorable member for Wellington City, and it was with regret I heard some things he said. He instanced my recent telegram to the Secretary of State as something similar to what I said was done in Auckland; but I say that that was no excuse for the proceeding of the Government. What was there wrong or unbecoming in that telegram itself? I had been informed in June, for reasons which I believed, and from persons whom I believed, and throughout the colony warnings had been spread, that the Queen's vessels were going to be used against Her Majesty's subjects in the same manner as was intended to be done upon a previous occasion. I made representations upon that to the Governor, and he never denied the thing to me—he never told me I was mistaken; he never said it was not to be the case; and the other day, before I sent that telegram, I was informed that the same statements were made openly by the supporters of the Government in this city. I contend that, under such circumstances, it was my duty to state to the Home Government the fact that such warnings were still in circulation. He then went on to state that I could not have believed that disturbances were imminent. I state that I do believe that disturbances are imminent, and I believe it is himself and others who help to render such disturbances possible and probable. I believe he is the individual, and those who are with him who are following a course adverse to the interest of their fellow-countrymen. Believing that such was the case, I did my duty as a good subject in endeavouring to save the country from disturbances which threatened. I cannot think that he could conceive in his own mind, or that other honorable gentlemen could conceive, that the people could quietly submit to see the whole of their revenues taken from them, to find themselves placed in an inferior position to their fellow-countrymen—to find that institutions to which they are attached are in their belief unlawfully taken away, that their own Provincial Legislatures are not allowed to make terms with the General Government as to the conditions upon which they will give up their powers. I cannot believe that men should be subjected to such things, and that no danger of disturbance would exist. If so, then I can only say that the men who were spoken of in such a way are deficient in qualities which men usually prize. I say they must be deficient in self-respect, in love of liberty; in the feeling that they ought not to be taxed for the good of others, and not for themselves; in the feeling that their land and their revenues ought not to be taken from them without their own consent; in the feeling that, if they have prized charters given to them, they ought to struggle to maintain them. I judge of my fellow-men very differently from him. I can only say if I was a youth in New Zealand, such feelings must animate my mind; and I believe that such feelings do animate many minds, and that he is little aware, and those who act with him are little aware, in the injustice they are doing to their fellow-countrymen, of the feelings of bitterness they have created, and of what the probable outcome of such feelings must be. We were told it was absurd to say these things should be left to the Provincial Councils, because the Provincial Councils could not meet again. But that is the very question. I think, and many others think with me, that the Provincial Councils can meet; that there is no lawful impediment to their meeting. I think, and many others think with me, that the general law of the Empire ought to be followed out, and that such Legislatures ought not to be destroyed without their own consent. I believe that in the case of the inhabitants of Auckland, before they consent to come under this system of abolition as it is termed—abolition it is not, for such a term does not apply to what is about to be done—before they come under the new form of government to be imposed upon them, they have a right to state the terms upon which they will do so—that they will have compensation for the lands and revenue of which they are to be deprived, and, before they give up the rights they have, to make up their minds as to the terms upon which they will surrender those rights, or whether they will surrender them at all or not. I go further, and say that so great a desire to acquire these rights does exist in the minds of certain people in the colony, that the people of Auckland have a right to make a hard bargain, and get the best terms. I say that the attempts of that honorable gentleman and his friends apparently to deprive them of these privileges are the attempts of cruel men who do not feel for their fellow-countrymen as they ought to feel. Then I was told that I had acted wrongly in seeking the interference of a foreign Power. I wonder so little shame rests on men's tongues that they can apply such terms to the mother country. A foreign Power! The Power that gave us these institutions, and that took such care of us—is that a foreign Power? The Power that has a right to protect us in the enjoyment of these institutions—is that a foreign Power? They know it is not a foreign Power. Was it to a foreign Power they addressed this despatch to ruin me if they could? Was that a foreign Power? No, Sir, they knew it was a Power that we all reverence—that is the mother of us all. And that is the Power to which they forwarded accusations of this kind. When they forward such accusations themselves, they call it then a patriotic Government, and a Government to which we always look. But the moment we seek to have our rights maintained by that Power whose duty it is to do it, it is a foreign Power, and we are traitors for seeking sympathy there. I cannot understand such an argument. I feel that we who have been wronged, as the people in the north of this colony have been, have a right to appeal to the Empire; that we who feel that the rights we possess are being unjustly taken from us by men in power, that the land is being unjustly taken from the Native population by men who desire to acquire great wealth for themselves—we who believe that our revenues are unjustly spent—I say we have a right to appeal to that Power, and to seek for that redress which is denied us here; and the very fact of that redress being so denied us should animate our minds persistently to go to the source of justice from which redress can be obtained, and to seek protection from violence which may arise in this country. I contend that in doing my utmost to prevent violence arising, to prevent these reports being circulated, these threats being used, I was the real lover of peace—the man who really desired to secure for his countrymen the possession of those rights to which they are entitled. I still hope that this House will see that some justice is done in this case. I still hope that they will determine that a document of this kind ought not to be sent Home secretly against a fellow-subject in this country. I believe that, if a humble petitioner had laid a petition on the table of this House, complaining of such a thing having been done, and it had gone before a Committee, universal indignation would have been felt. But a political opponent, because he has endeavoured to stop the Government in a career which he believes to be wrong, and which I may say more than 100,000 people—perhaps 200,000 people—of this country believe to be wrong, because he crosses their desire to do that which they consider advantageous themselves—may be attacked in this manner without any means of redress whatever. I still hope, Sir, that the House will see some justice done in this Assembly. Altogether, I am not sorry that this has occurred, because now a new era will begin to dawn upon this country. Many men will now feel the truth of what I for some time have urged—that our Governors ought not, in the present state of this country, to be appointed as they are now. A man chosen from amongst ourselves would never have inflicted this wrong upon a fellow-countryman. A man chosen from amongst ourselves would have taken care that a Ministry which had advised him to perpetrate such a wrong, and had offered to assist him in doing it, were not allowed to remain in power without their conduct being made known to this Parliament. I say that if, at the commencement of this session, this fact had been made known to this House, I believe the course of the session would have been very different from what it has been. But, Sir, I see a bright future arising out of the mists which cloud my own mind at the present time, and out of the wrongs which this country is suffering under. Out of that vast expenditure which has been squandered in so reckless a manner, out of all those disasters, I see a bright light beginning to arise. I know that there will be a change in our form of government—that an end must shortly come to this state of things. The money is now nearly at an end; and when that money is finished, then also will finish that power which has perpetrated wrongs of this kind. I feel certain in my own mind that this very document, written about myself, will hereafter become in this country an historical document. The people will trace from a wrong of this kind reforms which will be beneficial to New Zealand—changes in our institutions which will secure the happiness of the future millions who are to inhabit this country. It is well that the real character of the men who are doing these things should have been brought to light as they have been in the present instance. I hope the House will rise to a consideration of what it ought to do on this occasion, and that it will leave an example behind it which will testify to future times that it did not fear to do its duty against the frowns of power, and that there are in it men capable of determining that justice should be done, and that, whoever the offender may be who has wronged his fellow-man, his offence shall be stamped with the reprobation it undoubtedly deserves.

HANSARD.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the honorable member for Mount Ida a few nights ago made a complaint with regard to certain discrepancies in the Hansard reports. The Chairman of the Reporting Debates Committee had called upon the chief of the reporting staff to offer an explanation, and that explanation was embodied in the following letter, which he would request the Clerk to read:—

"Hansard Office,

"13th October, 1876.

"SIR,—In regard to the questions raised in the House on Wednesday, with regard—(1.) to the omission from Hansard of any report, in Committee on the Education Boards Bill, of Mr. Stafford's motion for the addition of Mr. Belfield's name to the Canterbury Board; (2.) to the omission from Hansard of the speeches of Mr. Fitzroy and Mr. Whitaker on the question of privilege on the 29th September; and (3.) to the correction or non-correction of Mr. Wakefield's speeches on the same occasion,—I have the honor to say,—

"(1.) Amendments of Bills in Committee are only recorded in Hansard when a division is taken; and no division was taken on Mr. Stafford's motion, therefore it was not recorded.

"(2.) Mr. Fitzroy's and Mr. Whitaker's speeches were accidentally omitted. I took these speeches as well as some of those which preceded and followed them, and am entirely to blame for their omission; but whether in the hurry of business I omitted to write them out, or, having written them out, mislaid the copy, I cannot now say. My recollection is that I wrote them out; but I cannot find the copy. Certainly it never reached the printer.

"(3.) Mr. Wakefield did not correct his speeches. The reports in the proof-slips and in the published number are the same, with the exception of one or two typographical corrections made by the press reader. The report is a verbatim report of what Mr. Wakefield said.—I have, &c.,

"C. C. N. BARROW."

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

CLASS II.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

Resident Magistrates' Courts, £25,151 12s.

Mr. REES would call the attention of the Government to the fact that the Resident Magistrates' Courts in many instances did not give satisfaction to the public. Of course, some of the gentlemen who acted as Resident Magistrates were good and efficient officers; but in the out-districts the way in which justice was administered was not at all satisfactory. Complaints were made to the Government, and even to the House; but they had not been attended to for years past. It was quite evident, both to the profession and to the public, that some better system of management in regard to these Courts should be introduced, in order that the ends of justice might not be defeated. He did not know the gentleman who filled the position of Resident Magistrate in Wellington; but he had heard from professional friends and the public that there was often a good deal of dissatisfaction felt on account of the judgments which were given in that gentleman's Court. He knew that in other places the Resident Magistrates did not give general satisfaction; and he had no doubt that he would be borne out in that by the Minister of Justice and the Postmaster-General, who were both professional men. Very bitter complaints were made of the enormous powers which were possessed by Resident Magistrates, and of the arbitrary way in which those powers were exercised. He would suggest to the Government that they should repeal that clause in the Resident Magistrates Act which gave the Resident Magistrate the power to refuse an appeal when he thought proper to do so. If any discretion at all was to be allowed, it should be strictly defined as a discretion to be exercised in such a way as was consistent with law and justice. At present, the law relating to appeals was of the most unsatisfactory nature. While referring to Resident Magistrates, he might state that a short time ago a case was being heard by Mr. Barstow, the Resident Magistrate of Auckland, and one of the professional gentlemen engaged in the case quoted in support of his argument a judgment of Lord Chief Baron Abinger. The Resident Magistrate however paid no attention to this authority; in fact, he refused to allow it to influence him in the slightest degree, because, as he said, he had heard that Lord Abinger's judgments had often been questioned. Honorable gentlemen might imagine what great power a Resident Magistrate in an outlying district would possess, especially when there was no appeal from his decisions. He had received letters asking him to bring this matter under the notice of the House. People would not go into the Resident Magistrates' Courts in many cases because they knew that if they happened to be on unfriendly terms with those in power they would not be able to get justice. The fact was, that it was never known merely from the facts and law how a judgment would go. Some of the Resident Magistrates had had no legal training whatever, and consequently they were often not in a position to give really proper judgments. He held that there ought to be some stricter system of administering justice in those Courts; and he was also of opinion that the Resident Magistrates ought to be changed about from place to place periodically. They ought not to be allowed to remain so long in any one place as to get surrounded by friends or enemies. He did not accuse those gentlemen of doing wrong intentionally; but the fact was, that great dissatisfaction existed in connection with the present administration of the law in the smaller Courts. Of course, some Magistrates were good men, and men who were determined to do strict justice; but, on the other hand, it was well known that in a great number of districts there were persons acting as Resident Magistrates who were to some extent prejudiced, and who did not give that time and attention to cases brought before them which ought to be given where the people had no appeal. He hoped the Government would take some steps to rectify what was growing into a great public abuse. He was of opinion that the Resident Magistrates should all be men who had had legal training.

Mr. WHITAKER said he quite agreed with the honorable member who had just sat down when he said that the administration of justice in out-districts was of a rough character. He agreed with the honorable gentleman that those who occupied the positions of Resident Magistrates should be professional men; but that would involve a very large expenditure. He did not suppose that there were half a dozen positions in the colony which professional gentlemen would accept. In a young country like this, there was no doubt very great difficulty in administering justice in the out-districts. He had heard complaints of the kind referred to by the honorable gentleman formerly, when he was in office, and he had always investigated them; and, when he found the Resident Magistrate to be in the wrong, he had never found any difficulty in setting things right. There was only one way of remedying the evil complained of, and that was by appropriating a sufficient sum of money to procure properly-trained men for the positions. But this would entail such an expense as to be practically impossible.

Mr. PYKE denied that any such complaints could justly be made about the Resident Magistrates in the outlying districts. The difficulty the Government had experienced there had not been caused by complaints against the Magistrates or Wardens; the difficulty had been that whenever they endeavoured to shift a Warden from one locality to another, the people opposed such removal. There might be some parts of the colony where justice was improperly administered, but he objected to the remarks of the honorable gentleman being made to apply to the whole colony. To say that the people looked upon the Magistrates as corrupt, as persons who favoured their friends, was a very serious charge. If there were such cases, they should be immediately inquired into. Magistrates who acted in this way should not be "shifted;" they should be dismissed from the service.

Mr. BOWEN said it was difficult to draw the line as to where the Government should interfere in questions of complaint as to the performance of the judicial duties of Resident Magistrates. It would not do to make the Executive Government a Court of Appeal; and he for one would discourage it as long as there was a superior Court to appeal to. As to the large body of Magistrates, he must say that they administered justice with advantage to the country at large, but for many years to come it would be difficult to get trained men to fill all these positions. A thoroughly efficient Magistrate should have a thoroughly sound discretion and a thorough knowledge of the law; and such men were difficult to get, and could not be got under present circumstances. It did not follow, that because a man was a lawyer, therefore he had the discretion necessary for a Magistrate entrusted with large judicial powers. If a lawyer of high attainments could not be obtained, it was better to have a man of good attainments who was not a lawyer. It would, however, be necessary to introduce amendments in the Resident Magistrates Act, especially with regard to appeals; and he hoped the Government would be able to submit some amendments of that sort to the House.

Mr. WASON drew attention to the item "Resident Magistrate, Christchurch, Leeston, and Ashburton," and reminded the Minister of Justice that a petition in reference to this matter had been presented to the House this session. The distance this Magistrate had to travel was far too great, and it was absolutely impossible he could perform the work. It was necessary, therefore, that an additional officer should be appointed; and although it could not be expected that the Government should pay a salary of £400 a year to maintain another Magistrate in the district, it was not too much to ask that they should provide a sum of £100 a year, for which sum one of the Justices would no doubt undertake the extra work.

Sir R. DOUGLAS pointed out as a curious circumstance that the Resident Magistrate at Whangarei resided at Whangarei Heads, and that the Court was without a clerk. The drawback of all this was that it caused great inconvenience to the inhabitants. He would ask the Minister of Justice whether he could not direct the Resident Magistrate at Whangarei to reside there instead of at the Heads.

Mr. BRANDON said he did not frequently visit the Resident Magistrate's Court at Wellington, but he knew that there were few appeals against his decisions; and although he had very difficult duties to perform, he acquitted himself very satisfactorily.

Mr. LARNACH noticed that the Chief Clerk in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Dunedin was put down for an increase of £25, while the Clerk at the Police Court, who was his senior officer, although he received the higher salary of the two last year, now received £25 less. He would like to know upon what principle this change was made.

Mr. BOWEN said the £25 was not an increase. Formerly the Chief Clerk held another office, which was found to be incompatible, and the salary of the two offices had now been amalgamated.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that, though the Police Court Clerk was the senior officer, there might be very good reasons why the Chief Clerk should receive the higher salary.

Mr. PYKE hoped the Government would take the case of the Police Court Clerk into consideration. He was an old officer and a good officer; and if it were not for his extreme fitness for his office, the business of the Court could not be got over at all, because every day fresh Justices, knowing little or nothing of the law, took their seats on the bench, and trusted entirely to the Clerk to see that things were done properly.

Mr. BOWEN, in reply to the questions of honorable members, was inaudible in the gallery.

Mr. HISLOP referred to three points as to which he thought the Resident Magistrates Act was capable of improvement. First, it had been admitted by the Minister of Justice that Resident Magistrates had more power in one particular respect than was vested in any other judicial officer. Secondly, it had been decided by the Supreme Court that there was no appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate given in cases of interpleader, a description of action which invariably involved minute questions of law. The third point had reference to the time within which cases of appeal must be settled.

Item, £25,151 12s., agreed to.

Wardens' Courts, £9,069 8s. 9d.

Mr. GIBBS drew attention to the fact that no allowance for travelling expenses was put down for the Resident Magistrate at Collingwood, who had to travel a great deal.

Mr. BOWEN said that these items were all taken from the provincial estimates.

Mr. PYKE suggested that the item be reduced to £8,369 8s. 9d. The items he desired to be struck out were, one "Chinese Interpreter, £200," and one "Warden, £500." There were too many Wardens. In the district of Wakatipu, there were two Wardens. The second appointment had been an unnecessary one, and might advantageously be dispensed with. The consequence of having two officers where one would be sufficient was, that they had not enough to do to keep them employed. The items might well be saved.

Mr. BOWEN said these services were taken from the provincial estimates. He would look into the matter; and, if it were found possible to remove one officer, it would be done.

Mr. MURRAY asked if the Government had increased any of the provincial estimates.

Mr. BOWEN replied in the negative.

Mr. KENNEDY thought it was necessary that Wardens should be periodically changed. A feeling existed on the gold fields that such a course would be an advantage.

Mr. DE LAUTOUE said that a few years ago the Wardens of Otago held no sinecures, and especially at Clyde. Recently, however, they had had all sorts of duties cast upon them, and their time was fully taken up. They acted as Land Officers, Licensed Commissioners, and in many other capacities. It would be a pity, therefore, to adopt the suggestion of the honorable member for Dunstan.

Mr. WOOLCOCK believed that these estimates were copied, in some parts, from the provincial estimates; and he presumed the Government would endeavour to make all possible reductions, so as to secure the efficiency of the service at the lowest possible expense.

Mr. REID believed it would be possible to dispense with one of the Wardens on the gold field referred to. One of them was at Home on leave of absence; and his salary must be provided for.

Mr. LARNACH observed that the Warden and Resident Magistrate of Collingwood was put down at £150, and the Warden of Totara, Kanieri, and Arahura at £100. He would like to know if they were employed in any other way.

Mr. BOWEN said both of them were employed as Resident Magistrates, and were paid by the General Government. The Warden at Collingwood was also Collector of Customs and Portmaster.

Mr. LARNACH said it was inconvenient to have the salaries paid to an officer appearing in different parts of the estimates. The total emoluments paid should be put under one heading.

Mr. BOWEN said that was done in the estimates of original Government departments; but there had not been time to do this in the case of Provincial estimates adopted for the next six months.

Item, £9,069 8s. 9d., agreed to.

Petty Sessions Courts, £300.

Mr. SHEEHAN suggested to the Government the desirability of doing away with the Petty Sessions Courts. The money ought to be spent in paying travelling Magistrates. The practical work of administering justice ought to be left to those actually acquainted with it, and not to Justices of the Peace in country districts, who for the most part were unable from want of experience to discharge such duties.

Item, £300, agreed to.

"The Coroners Act, 1867"—Fees and Expenses on Inquests, £2,200, agreed to.

Police, £39,462 12s. 9d.

Mr. SHEEHAN pointed out that the rates of pay of men in the various provinces varied very much. He thought the pay should be uniform throughout the colony.

Mr. REES said the number of constables in Auckland was less than in other parts in proportion to the population; but that was owing to the fact that the province had not been able to keep a large police force. He thought that would be found to be the reason why there had been these special constables.

Mr. HAMLIN said the rate of pay was so small that only a very inferior class of men could be obtained as special constables, and they would not devote a fair amount of time to their duty.

Mr. BARFF drew attention to the items throughout the estimates for Inspectors of Weights and Measures. In Westland, they had only one set of standard weights and measures. They formerly had an Inspector of Weights and Measures, but his services had been dispensed with, and the matter was now handed over to the police. He was able to say that, since the police had been inspectors, they had not paid one visit of inspection. He did not blame the police for that, for, as there was only one standard set of weights and measures, it was impossible for them to carry on the inspection properly. He would ask whether it was intended to provide additional standard sets, and to pay the expense of travelling about with them. The former Inspector had been compelled to give security to the extent of £500 for the safe custody of the standards.

Mr. WOOLCOCK said the services of the Inspector of Weights and Measures had been dispensed with in Westland. The result was that a considerable saving had been made, and the service was carried on in a very satisfactory manner.

Mr. BARFF repeated the statement that not one visit of inspection had been made.

Mr. GIBBS said, in Nelson, the law was that weights and measures should be stamped as correct, and the people had to take them to the Inspectors. He apprehended it was not intended that these officers should travel all round the country to make their inspection.

Sir R. DOUGLAS felt very much inclined to move that the amount for Auckland should be struck out. The Inspector did nothing at all. He was supposed to visit the out-districts, but he never did so.

Mr. ANDREW said there appeared to be great discrepancies between the amounts of salaries paid to the various Inspectors. In Auckland, the amount was £327 15s.; in Hawke's Bay, £5; in Canterbury, £200; in Otago, nothing; and in Wellington, nothing. In Wellington, the Inspector was appointed by the Provincial Council, and they had a very efficient officer; but no provision was made for him.

Mr. BOWEN pointed out that the Committee was considering the police estimates only, and the Wellington Inspector was not attached to the police. With regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Hokitika, he would have the matter inquired into, and the Government would see that the inspection was efficiently carried out. He must repeat that the Government had taken the provincial estimates for this year of departments taken over, having no other data to go upon.

Mr. MACFARLANE said he had never been able to find the Auckland Inspector of Weights and Measures.

Mr. SWANSON could very soon find the Inspector in Auckland. He had a very distinct opinion that the inspection of weights and measures should be conducted by the police, for in that case every policeman would be an inspector. It was a question of detecting crime, and should be in the hands of the police.
